15. The Chairman, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 31, said that the International Refugee Organization had reported that the only real remaining problem was the placing of 4,000 TB cases and their 2,000 dependents. There was a possibility that institutions in Germany and Switzerland might be found which could provide care for these hard-core cases if two conditions could be met, namely, additional financial assistance beyond IRO's present resources and a reasonably firm undertaking to accept cured patients for immigration from the countries providing temporary admission and hospitalization. IRO hoped that several countries would contribute to this scheme and gave tentative figures of $1.5 million and 1,000 immigrants as a possible Canadian contribution.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, November 28, 1950, IACI Doc. No. 6).†

16. Mr. Ford suggested that this seemed to be a sensible way of disposing of the hard-core problem and that serious consideration should be given to the possibility of extending some assistance.

17. Dr. Davidson suggested that before any such scheme were approved, care should be taken to ensure that the TB cases in question were given active treatment in order to ensure that positive cures were effected as rapidly as possible.

It was further suggested that Canada's contribution might be limited to an undertaking that 1,000 TB cases would be accepted provided a cure had been effected without extending any financial assistance whatever to the plan.

18. The Secretary to the Cabinet said that it might be preferable for Canada to contribute more towards the movement of acceptable displaced persons thus leaving more IRO funds available for the hard-core problem.

Some consideration might also be given to making use of Canadian credits in blocked foreign currencies for the purpose of lending financial assistance to the proposed programme.

19. Colonel Fortier pointed out that, unlike the United States, Scandinavian countries and others, Canada had not made any specific contribution towards the hard-core problem and it might therefore be difficult to resist any reasonable request in this respect.

20. The Committee, after considerable further discussion, agreed that the detailed IRO proposal in this respect, when received, be submitted to the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance for consideration and report.

IV. DEPENDENTS OF DISPLACED PERSONS; ESTABLISHMENT OF IRO TRANSIT CAMP

21. The Chairman said that in view of the early termination of IRO activities and the present situation in Europe, it was desirable that dependents of displaced persons should follow the heads of families to Canada with the least possible delay. In this connection IRO had suggested that it would be prepared to operate a DP transit camp in Canada provided the Canadian Government supplied the accommodation and facilities for 1,600 to 2,000 persons. The worker would pay on a per diem basis for the maintenance of his dependents in the transit camp and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration would assist in the collection of payments. IRO would contribute up to an agreed limit if necessary to meet deficits. The dependents would be expected to leave the camp after a maximum period of four to six weeks. The Department of National Defence had agreed to make a former air force station at St. John's, Quebec, available for the establishment of such a transit camp.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

22. Colonel Fortier said that such a transit camp would serve a useful purpose since many DPs would not agree to migrate to Canada unless they could bring their families with them. However, the transit camp envisaged by IRO would probably be too small to meet real needs. It had been estimated that it would cost approximately $100,000 to fully equip the RCAF station at St. John's as a transit camp.

23. Mr. Dawson said that it would be unrealistic to expect that DP families could be moved through the transit camp in less than three or four months.

IRO officials had recently intimated that the 16,000 DPs which the Department of Labour would bring to Canada during 1951 represented an actual saving of approximately $2 million to IRO since transportation costs would be that much higher if these DPs were sent to Australia or New Zealand. In the circumstances, it was suggested that Canada might agree to provide the accommodation, if available, on the understanding that IRO would undertake to equip and administer the camp.

24. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that the International Refugee Organization be informed that Canada might be prepared to provide suitable accommodation, if available, for the purpose of establishing a transit camp for DP dependents on the understanding that IRO would assume all other costs including staff, equipment and administration.

IMMIGRATION; CAMP FOR DEPENDENTS OF DISPLACED PERSONS

35. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reported that the International Refugee Organization had proposed establishment of a camp in Canada to which might be brought dependents of persons coming forward under their auspices. The suggestion was that the R.C.A.F. station at St. Johns, Quebec, be made available and that it be staffed and equipped by the Organization. It was expected that there might be 1,600 - 2,000 persons in such a camp at any one time and that they would remain for from four to six weeks after arrival. The purpose would be to move such persons from I.R.O. responsibility in Europe and encourage them to come forward to Canada.

36. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that the camp at St. Johns had been declared surplus some time previously but that, in the altered circumstances of the present international situation, the Department of National Defence would be reluctant to have it used in such a way that they could not take it over quickly. It might be made available on the understanding that it could be taken back on three months' notice.

37. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada had not taken any of the hard core of displaced persons who were a continuing burden on a number of European countries. The displaced persons that had been moved to Canada had always been persons who could normally be regarded as potential assets. A number of European countries felt that Canada and other countries might do something to meet the problem. The United States had received some displaced persons of this sort.

38. The Cabinet, after discussion agreed that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration ascertain whether the International Refugee Organization would wish to establish a camp for dependents of displaced persons at St. Johns on the understanding that the camp would be turned back to National Defence use on three months' notice if required; further consideration to be given to the establishment of the camp after the views of the Organization were available.

Le sous-ministre adjoint des Finances
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, April 29, 1950

Dear Sir,

I have your letter of April 25th† requesting my views on the administrative and financial matters to be discussed at the forthcoming World Health Assembly. As you know, we have been seriously handicapped by the fact that documentation on these questions was not received until late last week. In the circumstances it has not been possible to give them as much attention as we would like. The following observations are, therefore, necessarily confined largely to broad statements of principle, with examples selected at random to illustrate specific situations in which some of the principles might be applied. Because of their general nature, a meeting was arranged between Mr. Pollock of this Department, Doctor McCann, who is heading the Health Delegation, Doctor Cameron and Mr. Cleveland, to discuss some of the main financial issues which may arise at the Health Assembly. I hope that these arrangements, together with the documentation provided by Mr. Cleveland regarding the position taken by Canadian delegations at earlier Health Assemblies, will be adequate for the formulation of suitable policies during the forthcoming Assembly.

As you know, we have always emphasized the importance of sound programming and the development of efficient and economical administrative techniques in the Specialised Agencies. As far as I can see, our efforts in the WHO have had some success. The documents we have received give evidence of solid accomplishment. Many of the more questionable projects in earlier programmes have been eliminated. The problems of staffing and administration which troubled the Organisation in its formative stage are rapidly being overcome. However, even though the transition from a blueprint to a functioning agency is apparently being bridged quite successfully, the necessity for close scrutiny of the budget and programme continues. In fact, the reduction of organisational problems merely shifts our interest to new and even more difficult phases of WHO's activities.

The health needs of the world are almost limitless. Those experiencing these needs will not be easily convinced that because of current financial stringencies their requirements cannot be met fully. It is equally difficult to persuade a Secretariat, imbued with the ideals of the Organisation and spurred on by a Director-General as dynamic as Doctor Chisholm, that attempts to keep the programme within reasonable limits are not intended to inhibit its orderly development. Finally, a heavy preponderance of the votes in the Assembly is held by countries whose needs are great and whose financial contributions are small. It would be wholly unrealistic to fail to appreciate the way in which these circumstances combine to induce an expanding rather than a stabilised programme. Under the circumstances it is more important than ever that the Canadian delegation, and others in a comparable position, should continue to stress the need for priority programming and the economical and effective utilisation of resources. In practice this means the limitation of the budget to a level for which it is reasonable to assume that the necessary funds will be forthcoming. It requires emphasis on projects likely to bring immediate and tangible returns for the expenditures involved. It also requires effective co-ordination of all projects with those of other international bodies having related responsibilities, in order to avoid wasteful duplication of activities. Most of these principles are not new. They merely represent the logical extension and continuation of policies followed by earlier Canadian delegations.

This year the Health Assembly is fortunate in having an unusually good report from its Standing Committee on Administration and Finance. This report, which has been adopted by the Executive Board (Official Record No. 26), includes many useful recommendations. It will only be possible to provide detailed comments below on a few of the recommendations. However, I believe that in most cases their adoption by the Health Assembly would constitute a useful step toward sound administrative and financial practices.

There is one important exception to which I would like to draw your attention. Past Assemblies of the Health Organisation have stressed the need for rapid decentralisation of activities by the establishment of regional organisations. This principle is again endorsed in the Report of the Executive Board, as well as in the budget and the Report of the Director-General. It has been the Canadian view that, although there should be an orderly and reasonable extension of the facilities of the Health Organisation to all countries, and especially to those which are "underdeveloped", it is desirable that the areas and headquarters of these regional groups should not be determined too hastily. At this stage of its existence, the WHO cannot afford to dissipate its meagre resources on an unduly elaborate regional structure. The Canadian delegation should not hesitate to express its misgivings on this matter.

In general, it is encouraging to note the growing sense of realism reflected by the Reports of the Standing Committee and the Executive Board. As you know, there have been strong differences of opinion in the past on the proper functions of the Executive Board and its correct relationship to the Director-General. The Director-General has, I understand, insisted that programme preparation is his responsibility, and that the Executive Board should limit itself to technical advice on the medical advisability of the programme. I do not think that this conception of the role of the Executive Board is consistent with the long-range interests of the Organisation. While the responsibility for programme and budget preparation is clearly that of the Director-General, the Executive Board should not be restricted to general expressions of medical opinion. Programme preparation and budget evaluation are closely related. The programme must always be framed with an eye to the financial resources likely to be available. In this connection, the Australian delegation has already submitted formal proposals which would alter the character of the Executive Board and give it greater executive and financial responsibilities. As indicated in earlier correspondence† with you on this matter, we are prepared to support this Australian proposal. However, if the Australian proposal is not adopted, it might be worthwhile considering a workable compromise based on it. This might take the form of a directive by the Assembly similar to that adopted last year instructing the Executive Board to give more attention to the financial implications of the budget and programme. The Assembly should also commend the very useful work of the Standing Committee on Administration and Finance. Its report this year seems most useful and the Canadian delegation should support a continuation of its efforts.

However, whatever decisions the Health Assembly may come to regarding the appropriate relationship to be maintained between the Director-General and the Executive Board for the future, the delegation should support the recommendations (in paragraphs 1 to 21 of the Report of the Standing Committee) for dealing with the financial situation during 1951. Past Assemblies have approved large programmes in the expectation that the required funds would be forthcoming from the contributions of Member States. These expectations have not been realised. The withdrawal of the U.S.S.R. and its satellite states from the Organisation and arrears in contributions by others have placed the Organisation in a precarious financial position. Despite programme cuts, it has only been possible to maintain the present level of activities by heavy withdrawals from the Working Capital Fund and from other resources inherited from UNRRA etc. We have already informed you of our belief that, regardless of the legal position, there seems to be little likelihood that the U.S.S.R. will liquidate its obligation to the WHO. The correspondence† on this question will, I understand, be made available to the delegation. I would, however, stress again that the situation caused by these withdrawals and other arrears in contributions is serious and must not be ignored. The apparent inability to induce or force the U.S.S.R. and its satellites to make their payments increases the necessity for measures likely to induce other delinquent governments to bring their contributions up to date. The WHO has already amended its Constitution to deprive members more than two years in arrears of voting rights. This provision should be automatically enforced. Similarly, we believe that countries seriously in arrears should not be permitted membership on the Executive Board or on other important committees of the Organisation. The Canadian delegation might discuss with others the advisability of requesting the Executive Board or a special committee established for this particular purpose to examine and make recommendations to the next Health Assembly on the question of arrears. In any event, it is essential that maximum expenditures for 1951 be limited to a rate which the Organisation can reasonably expect to finance out of current contributions, the special UNRRA Fund and other sources of income. This would be consistent with the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly urging international organisations to limit their programmes to the amount of funds which they may reasonably expect to receive during the year. The Standing Committee's recommendations for dealing with this situation should be supported strongly, or even strengthened.

The largest part of the expenditures of the Organisation will, of course, be required for staffing and maintaining those sections of the Secretariat which are servicing technical projects. Decisions as to the projects which are most useful must necessarily be made by delegation specialists conversant both with their medical value and relative cost. However, on the purely administrative side there will be many other opportunities for economies within the budget. The following are a few random examples to indicate the kind of recommendation which should be supported. There will, of course, be many others of equal importance.

(a) An invitation has been received to hold the Fourth Health Assembly in Washington (see page 12, paragraph 35). This involves considerable additional expense beyond that which would arise if the meeting were held at headquarters in Geneva. It has always been the Canadian position that the annual conferences of the Specialised Agencies should be held at headquarters unless there are significant reasons to the contrary. I understand that there is a feeling that a successful conference in the United States would appeal to American public opinion and gain support for the Organisation. However, these and other arguments must be considered in relation to the additional cost involved. In the United Nations itself, it is common when considering meetings away from headquarters to look to the host state for the payment of all costs beyond those which would be required to hold the meetings at the permanent headquarters. Perhaps the Director-General might seek to induce the U.S. to absorb the additional expenditures which would be incurred in holding the Fourth Session in Washington.

(b) On page 13, paragraph 36, it is recommended that transportation expenses of representatives to meetings of regional committees should be limited to inaugural meetings. This seems sound. I agree with the Executive Board that for reasons of economy payments should not be extended to all regional meetings.

(c) It is suggested on page 16, paragraph 70, that it would be more economical to have longer meetings of experts' committees at less frequent intervals. With transportation costs representing such a high percentage of costs, the present principle of frequent meetings for short periods of time seems unduly expensive.

(d) On page 31, paragraph 185, it is recommended that home leave should be granted on a three-year basis instead of a two-year basis. We agree that this recommendation, which is based on the Report of the United Nations Expert Committee on Salary, Allowances and Leave Systems, is sound. It is economical and also reduces the adverse effect on efficiency which results from the considerable interruptions in the conduct of the affairs of the Organisation which are caused by home leaves at two-year intervals.

(e) Other references are made in paragraphs 184 to 194 to the Report of the United Nations Committee of Experts on Salary, Allowances and Leave Systems. The Report of the Expert Committee is now being examined in Ottawa. The Canadian Government is in general agreement with its recommendations and would be prepared to support their application to WHO. We are not entirely convinced, however, that the Expert Committee was fully warranted in the extent to which it recommends upgrading of senior staff. We would be inclined to rely on the judgment of the delegation, in consultation with others, to decide the upper limits which would be appropriate for salaries in the Organisation.

Another problem with which the conference may be concerned is that occasioned by the maintenance of proper geographical distribution in appointments to the Secretariat. Under Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter of the United Nations, staff must be selected on the basis of the highest competence, integrity and efficiency, with due regard to as wide geographical distribution as possible. The problem of reconciling the two concepts is a familiar one. It arises in most international bodies, even in the most technical organisations whose staffs must be obtained from countries with advanced technical standards. As indicated in paragraph 89, page 19, the World Health Organisation has experienced difficulties in recruiting staff in the past and foresees further difficulties when it tries to provide staff for the proposed Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance. If delegations insist, as they have in the past, that the principle of geographical distribution must be extended to recruitment for technical assistance activities, I believe that our delegation should not hesitate to point out the glaring inconsistency in such a position. It is clear that governments seeking technical assistance because of the dearth of trained personnel in their own countries cannot at the same time provide highly qualified technicians for international organisations.

On the question of the scale of contributions, there has been little change in the situation since the last Health Assembly. Therefore, instructions to earlier delegations are still applicable. In particular, we are disturbed by the implications of the continuation of the absolute financial ceiling on the U.S. contribution. We are anxious that a proper relationship be maintained between our contribution and that of the United States, United Kingdom and others, and are not prepared, because of the absolute ceiling on the United States contribution or for any other reasons that might be advanced, to pay more than a fair share of the expense of the Organisation. To date the United States Administration has not been successful in its efforts to have Congress remove the absolute ceiling from the U.S. contribution. The Canadian delegation should not hesitate to express its view that the continuation of this ceiling is inconsistent with the long-range interests of the WHO.

Yours truly,

R.B. BRYCE

A draft report† on the recent Third World Health Assembly has been received in the Department from the Delegation. As the report is of considerable length, a summary has been prepared in the United Nations Division.

In view of the unsatisfactory trend of WHO policy, I think you may wish to examine a copy of the summary which I attach; you may also wish to bring it to the attention of the Minister.[6]

Résumé du rapport provisoire sur la troisième Assemblée mondiale sur la santé

Summary of Draft Report of Third World Health Assembly

THE THIRD WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY

The word which seems to sum up the judgments of the Canadian Delegation to the Third World Health Assembly is "paralysis". The reporter speaks of the "malaise which now exists in WHO"; he says "the Assembly was relatively powerless to fix policy on programmes or budgets"; and again, "the policy-making Assembly was stultified by a vast amount of uncorrelated ideas and documentation". Throughout the entire report runs a thread of dissatisfaction and frustration generated by inability of the Delegation and others to control an imprudent general policy. This policy, conceived in idealism and egoism, appears to be driving the WHO into bankruptcy. At the same time, the reporter affirms the real achievements of the Organization, imperfect as its structure and functioning may be.

2. In the present transitional phase of its development, the WHO has planned an expanding programme of operations while apparently disregarding a contracting fund of revenues. This inconsistent behaviour is a consequence of the inability to maintain an objective balance between world health desirabilities and budgetary feasibilities.

3. The Assembly approved:

(1) The regular programme for 1951;

(2) A general programme for 1952-1956, including

(a) Development of traditional international services, e.g., health statistics,

[6] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Not Sent. C. G[lover], June 22/50. Hold for future reference.

(b) Programme of cooperative work with FAO, UNICEF, and others;

(c) The further provision of fellowships and training facilities;

(3) A programme of participation in the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme.

4. The examination of programme items was unsatisfactory because of deficiencies in coordination, support from the Secretariat for clarification, and statements of specific costs. The discussion of programme was marked by a good deal of political manoeuvring, haggling over special interests and uncertainty of policies, programme and budget of the TAP. Over strong opposition of receiving countries, the power of determining the types of technical aid was placed in the permanent specialized agencies. Against Canadian opposition, the principle of regional decentralization was established in future programming. As a general comment, the planning of programme appeared to be aimed at expanding the organizational structure of the Secretariat to give it "survival value". It was the Canadian Delegation's judgment that the programme was "too wide and too thin".

5. In analyzing the procedure of the Assembly, the Canadian Delegation judged that body to be incapable of arriving at major policy decisions because competent officers were lacking, the substance of ideas was lost in masses of documents, the paper work was over-organized, and finally, because there existed an unsatisfactory frame of mind in which Assembly and Secretariat faced each other as "opposition" and "government" with the Secretariat initiating and forcing proposals through the Assembly. As a consequence of Assembly impotence, many matters of policy were transferred to the Executive Board and it is expected that even the Director-General will be compelled to assume powers of formulating policy. The behaviour of the Secretariat led the Canadian Delegation to believe that the Director-General was only too happy at this prospect, and was in fact, encouraging it. As one means of correcting this perversion of functions, the Delegation requested the Executive Board to simplify and rationalize the documentation of the Assembly.

6. From a procedural point of view, the Delegation considered that the programme decisions were unreal. Anticipated revenue was exceeded by the budgeted programme to the extent of one million dollars; the final budget was never examined in detail; and priorities were not discussed.

7. In matters of administration and finance the Canadian Delegation sought unsuccessfully to have health projects abandoned in Communist countries with arrears of contributions; to decelerate the expansion of staff; and to rectify inequities in the scale of contributions, particularly in the per capita assessment of Canada in terms of a U.S.A. base.

8. In the constitutional phase of the Assembly deliberations, the Canadian Delegation supported an unsuccessful Australian attempt to change the Executive Board membership from personal to governmental status. After vehement interventions by the Director-General and the President of the Second Assembly, the resolution was defeated. The Delegation argued for a cautious decentralization of activities in accord with the regional tendencies predominating. In the report it expressed its dislike for a policy towards which states in a given region gave nothing while the increasing administrative costs were borne by a few of the external states.

9. The Assembly examined the relations of WHO with other specialized agencies of the United Nations and resolved to seek improved coordination through the parent body. It approved a set of principles to govern the relations of WHO with regional and national non-governmental organizations.

10. The reporter has attached a list of the representatives gathered at the Third World Health Assembly; it reveals the official position of each and contains brief, useful comments on their participation in the Assembly, which should be of value in planning for, and participating in future Assemblies.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 77-50 [Ottawa], March 7, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE FIFTH GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNESCO

The Fifth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO will be held in Florence, Italy, from May 22 to June 16, 1950. As the question of Canadian participation in UNESCO work is now under consideration by the Massey Commission, it is proposed generally to continue our representation along the lines that have been established in the past.

2. UNESCO is now in its fourth year of operation and its recent activities indicate that constructive developments have taken place in the General Conference and the Secretariat of the organization. The programme of UNESCO, which in the earlier years included many vague projects, now contains a number of well-defined priority tasks in the fields of education, science and culture. This new programme, incorporating many of the improvements that have long been felt necessary, will be discussed at Florence. It is, therefore, important that the Canadian Delegation to the Conference should be representative and sufficiently strong to suggest improvements in the organization which are judged desirable.

3. The Canadian Delegations to the last three UNESCO Conferences did not include representatives of non-governmental organizations and a good deal of criticism emanated, in each case, from the interested organizations in Canada. It has, therefore, been thought advisable to include persons drawn from Canadian educational, scientific and cultural organizations on the delegation to the forthcoming Conference. These organizations have been consulted and three names representing respectively educational, scientific and cultural groups are suggested on the basis of the recommendations made to the Government by these various organizations.

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, therefore, recommends that the Canadian Delegation to the Fifth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO should be headed by Mr. Jean Désy and should include the following:

Delegates

Senator Rupert Davies
Dr. M.E. Lazerte, or Dr. C.E. Phillips, Canadian Education Association (Education)
Mr. Garnet T. Page, Chemical Institute of Canada (Science)
Mr. Jacques de Tonnancourt, Canadian Arts Council (Culture)

Alternate Delegates

Dr. John E. Robbins, Dominion Bureau of Statistics
Mr. Sydney Pollock, Department of Finance
Mr. Paul Tremblay, Department of External Affairs

Adviser

An officer from a Canadian mission in Europe (Secretary).

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 25, 1950

FIFTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNESCO, MAY, 1950; GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

The instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the Florence Conference are now being prepared in the form of a commentary.

2. The principles underlying them are as follows:

Economy in the Operations of UNESCO

3. The extent to which the Secretariat of UNESCO is exercising the administrative economies called for by the General Conference is, generally speaking, satisfactory. The programme of UNESCO is approved by the General Conference, and once it goes to the Secretariat for implementation the sums placed at the disposal of UNESCO for each item of the programme are usually properly expended.

4. It is the Canadian view, therefore, that it is not in the execution of the UNESCO programme as much as in the preparation of the programme that savings could be effected. The Canadian Delegation will be instructed to stress the importance of limiting the expansion of UNESCO operations in new fields, in order that more attention may be devoted to the projects which are already under way.

5. It is considered, moreover, that substantial savings could be effected through a more adequate use of the facilities of well-established private international agencies which are pursuing similar aims to those of UNESCO. The Canadian Delegation will be instructed to recommend in particular the use of the facilities provided by the International Scientific Union and the International Centre of Documentation in connection with the natural sciences programme of UNESCO.

Administrative Efficiency

6. Although it is realized that the administrative efficiency of UNESCO is hampered by the frequency of sessions of the General Conference and the instability of its staff (due to the short term contracts that UNESCO offers), the Canadian Delegation will be instructed to express dissatisfaction with the manner in which correspondence with the member states is conducted. In particular, the delay by UNESCO in sending working papers for General Conferences has made it extremely difficult in Canada to consult the Canadian organizations interested in UNESCO work and to prepare detailed instructions for Canadian delegations.

Concentration of Purpose

7. A recurring theme in the communications received from the Canadian cultural organizations consulted upon the programme of UNESCO is that it is spread too thinly over a multiplicity of activities. Considerable efforts have been made by UNESCO in unifying the general programme of the Organization and establishing priorities among its various projects. The Canadian Delegation should encourage UNESCO to pursue its efforts towards a further concentration of resources. In this connection, the Delegation is to propose that very low priority ratings be given to such projects as: plans for a scientific and cultural history of mankind; the drafting of a statute on the freedom of the artist; the creation of an international institute of the press and information; plans for the education of maladjusted and handicapped children; studies of the media and techniques of international co-operation.

Closer Liaison with the United Nations and Other United Nations Specialized Agencies

8. The Canadian Delegation will be instructed to consider, in particular, the UNESCO programme in the field of the social sciences in the light of this principle. It is the Canadian view that the various studies of social tensions that threaten peace, sponsored by UNESCO, would be undertaken more logically by the United Nations Secretariat. Certain functions performed by UNESCO in the field of fundamental education would more properly belong to the World Health Organization.

Miscellaneous

9. The Canadian Delegation will be instructed to refrain from taking an active part in the discussion of UNESCO proposals to encourage the establishment of national commissions for UNESCO, as this matter is currently under consideration by the Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences.

10. UNESCO for the past two years has been conducting a limited programme of activities in Germany and Japan in agreement with the appropriate Allied authorities. The Canadian Delegation will be instructed to support UNESCO's activities directed towards the democratic re-education of the German and Japanese people.

11. I am attaching for your further information a more detailed summary of the instructions to the Canadian Delegation, which outlines the minimum objectives of our Delegation to the forthcoming UNESCO Conference.†

12. I should be obliged if you would indicate (a) whether you approve of instructions being prepared on the basis of the above mentioned principles; and (b) whether you agree that they do not need to be submitted to Cabinet — in conformity with the practice generally followed in the past.[8]

Extrait du rapport de la délégation à la cinquième session de la conférence générale de l'UNESCO

Extract from Report of Delegation to Fifth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO

CONFIDENTIAL Florence, June 1950

I. INTRODUCTION

The Fifth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO was held at Florence, Italy, from May 22 to June 17, 1950. It was attended by the delegations of 53 Member States, together with representatives of the United Nations and specialized agencies, and observers from a large number of international non-governmental organizations.

II. PURPOSE OF THE CONFERENCE

2. The majority of national delegations came to Florence convinced that the Fifth Session would be the most critical session of the UNESCO General Conference since its inception. The views of all delegations were based on fuller information supplied by the Executive Board against the background of experience gained in four years of UNESCO's activity. There existed, too, a determination on the part of most delegations, the Executive Board and the Director General to formulate, at this session, practical and effective lines of action. Although the impression had been gained in Ottawa that this conference would be primarily concerned with the mapping out of a sound basic programme, it rapidly became apparent that the Director General wished to consult the member states, in addition, on three major questions of policy. These questions are:

(1) What UNESCO's contribution should be regarding the maintenance of peace?

(2) How could the participation of member states in the work of UNESCO be intensified?

(3) Should the financial contributions of the member states be increased?

UNESCO's Contribution to Peace

3. This question gave rise to the most important debates of the whole Conference. The Director General's conviction is that UNESCO should not remain indifferent to the present ideological and political conflict between East and West. UNESCO should do more than encourage international cooperation amongst the various professional disciplines and its action should be fully integrated to that of the United Nations themselves.

4. The debate on this question was precipitated by the introduction of the Czechoslovak, Yugoslav and Belgian resolutions which in one form or other wish to reaffirm UNESCO's concern with the problem of peace. When it became apparent that the weight of the opinions expressed in the General Conference was opposed to an all-out effort for peace, the Director General handed in his resignation.

5. Towards the end of the conference, a resolution introduced jointly by the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Brazil, Ecuador, Egypt, India and Italy, instructed the Director General to prepare a programme, for the next session, tending more directly towards the maintenance and consolidation of peace. The vagueness of this resolution, however, makes it doubtful that the Director General will be satisfied to continue in office, as he agreed to do so only with the understanding that UNESCO would fulfil what he considers its primary responsibilities.

6. When the question of the election of the Chairman of the Executive Board came up, the conflict between UNESCO's active role for peace and a long-range programme based on intellectual cooperation, influenced the choice of the Chairman of the Board. The two candidates proposed for the chairmanship were Professor Carneiro of Brazil, and Count Jacini of Italy who acted as the President of the General Conference at this session. Professor Carneiro was the spokesman of those delegations who argued that UNESCO should not enter into the political arena and thus concentrate its efforts on an endeavour which is the prime responsibility of the United Nations themselves. A good many members of the Board considered, therefore, that a vote for Professor Carneiro would be a vote against the Director General. Professor Carneiro was proposed by France, and his nomination was seconded by the United Kingdom. Count Jacini was proposed by Mexico at the instigation of the United States. When the vote was taken, 8 members of the Board voted for Professor Carneiro, and 10 members for Count Jacini. As this slim majority did not appear to give the Chairman of the Board the moral satisfaction that he required, it was unanimously agreed to cancel the vote, and another vote was taken with a view to giving Count Jacini the appearance of having been unanimously elected. At this second vote all members of the Board voted for Count Jacini, except for one abstention. It is apparent, therefore, that the forces in favour of and against the Director General's opinion are equally balanced, and this fact is perhaps not a favourable omen for the stability of the organization during the next year.

Participation of the Member States

7. The Director General also sought the opinion of the General Conference on the possibility of increasing the participation of the member states in UNESCO's activities. He argued that there were very definite limitations to what the Secretariat could independently achieve and that member states had an unfortunate tendency to expect miracles from UNESCO, while they were reluctant to match UNESCO's efforts at home. The Executive Board supported the position taken by the Director General on this point, and various proposals were submitted to the Conference aiming at an increased participation by the member states in UNESCO's undertakings. A series of resolutions concerning national commissions were adopted which should bring about a closer integration of their work with that of the Secretariat. It remains to be seen, however, to what extent the member states will abide by the recommendations of the General Conference and take the action suggested by the Director General. With this qualification, it would seem that the Director General has achieved the purpose he had in mind regarding this matter.

Financial Contributions of the Member States

8. The Director General was not satisfied with the Executive Board's refusal last March to support his request that member states be asked to increase their contribution to UNESCO. He hoped that if the programme that he presented were considered adequate, the dimension of the tasks that UNESCO was instructed to perform by the General Conference would convince member states that the financial means of the organization were totally insufficient. It became evident during the conference, however, that no government was prepared to increase its contribution. The compromise solution reached was that the member states will continue to be assessed an amount which, if it were to be paid by all members, would provide for the full budget of the organization. In view of the fact that China and other members will almost certainly fail in their payments, the Director General has been authorized to use certain surplus monies including the surplus of 1947, the increment resulting from the recent admission of new member states, and the additional funds which have become available owing to the devaluation of the pound. In this manner the budget of UNESCO will amount to $8,200,000, a sum which would not have been available for next year's budget if the financial regulations had been strictly adhered to. It was also decided by the General Conference, at the suggestion of the United States delegation, that UNESCO could call upon private and public sources for certain specific projects of primary importance, e.g. programme activities in Germany.

III. THE CONDUCT OF THE CONFERENCE

9. In retrospect the work of the various commissions and committees of the conference is over-shadowed by the issues high-lighted by the Director-General's resignation. Before this event, however, delegations were saying that good work was being done in the various bodies. Although the three fundamental issues mentioned above were carefully avoided until the Director-General resigned, most of the other problems which confronted the session were thoroughly examined and the results in those fields may be considered worthwhile, both from the point of view of the organization as a whole and from the Canadian point of view.

Programme

10. The Programme and Budget Commission of the conference has the largest and the most difficult task, which concerned in particular two principal documents: the basic continuing programme of UNESCO and its programme for 1951. The Director General attached special importance to the approval by the General Conference of the basic programme and to the concentration of purpose on which considerable work had been done by the Secretariat. In the Commission's discussions too many long-winded statements for home consumption were made, too many questions were asked whose answers were already on record, and far too many new resolutions, most of which were predicated on the assumption that UNESCO is a milch-cow, were introduced. Comparatively few delegations included men familiar with UNESCO's work in education, science and culture; for example, only a handful of persons competent to discuss the programme in natural sciences were present and the discussion of this part of the programme almost floundered when other delegates stepped on unfamiliar ground. It was the secretariat representatives and the programme specialists on a few delegations who "carried the ball" in the Commission. But even their guidance was a mixed blessing for many of these persons often seemed to lack an understanding, or even worse, purposely chose to disregard, the financial, technical or other considerations which would have had the effect of limiting or delaying the introduction or extension of their own pet projects. Many delegations appeared completely unwilling to take unpopular stands against obviously low priority or even nonsensical proposals. As a result, projects like the "Friendship Flag" were adopted by substantial majorities. Other proposals were presented involving international support for projects which unquestionably should have been supported out of national resources.

11. This inability of the Programme and Budget Commission to relate programme activities to the financial means of the organization showed itself in the failure not only to establish priorities within the current programme but also to deal effectively with the mass of conference resolutions (over 100) urging new projects, which began to arrive the first day of the session and continued to be submitted almost to the closing day.

12. To meet the failure of this and previous sessions of the General Conference to establish priorities, the Canadian delegation put forward a resolution on concentration of purpose. This resolution, which is attached as Appendix A,† went further than a United States proposal to add certain basic objectives to the basic programme, by suggesting that the Director General be given full authority to determine an order to priorities among the various projects of UNESCO. This proposal, of course, raised a major issue, the discussion of which was particularly delicate at the time when the resignation of the Director General was under consideration. It was thought advisable by the Canadian delegation not to press for a full debate, and to ask that it be reported upon at the next General Conference.

13. In addition, the Canadian delegation met with a large measure of success with respect to the "minimum objectives" which it had been instructed to seek with respect to the programme. Appendix B† of this report lists the various objectives set for the delegation, and the results achieved. Detailed accounts of Canadian participation in each programme field have been prepared by members of the delegation and will be suitable for inclusion in the report to be prepared for the national cooperating organizations. General[ly] speaking, the Canadian delegation adopted an attitude of critical enquiry rather than of opposition.

VII. CONCLUSIONS

74. The Fifth Session of the General Conference of UNESCO has been described by Torres Bodet as a conference of definition rather than a conference of decision. However, even if the delegations had been able to take decisions — and obviously they were not in a position to do so — on such grave issues as to whether UNESCO should become the cultural propaganda arm of the United Nations; whether UNESCO should at all costs retain its character of universality; whether the budget should be increased; to what extent member states' participation could be intensified, it must be admitted that the Director General did not provide the General Conference with sufficiently detailed information on what he meant by "a more active policy for peace". The General Conference could, therefore, do little else than instruct the Director General to present to the Sixth Session suggestions on the manner in which UNESCO's activities would tend more directly towards the consolidation of peace.

75. The member states must, in the meantime, give some thought to the future orientation of the organization.

76. As far as Canada is concerned there is an additional problem; not only must we consider the main issues raised in this conference by the Director General but we must also face the older question of whether our level of participation in UNESCO, as it exists at present, is sufficient. There is more urgency, now that UNESCO appears to be moving towards new goals and tends to be regarded as a cultural instrument for peace, to reconsidering the traditional minimum participation policy that Canada has been following so far.

REPORT ON WASHINGTON DISCUSSIONS
RE FLOATING THE CANADIAN DOLLAR
SEPTEMBER 28-30, 1950

1. In accordance with Mr. Abbott's instructions, I saw Mr. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, on Friday, September 29 at noon and explained to him the reasons which had led the Minister of Finance to the conclusion that Canada should give up the existing exchange rate for the Canadian dollar without for the time being fixing a new one. The explanation was along the following lines.

During the last few months there has been a very heavy speculative inflow of U.S. funds to Canada. The speculation has been based upon the expectation that the Canadian dollar would soon be restored to parity with the U.S. dollar. Articles encouraging such thoughts have become very common in the press in recent months, including N.Y. Herald Tribune, N.Y. Times, N.Y. World Telegram & Sun, Journal of Commerce — and even Walter Winchell has told his 3 million radio listeners that this is what they may expect. Investors and others have sought to profit from the anticipated move in our exchange rate in various ways — by converting U.S. funds into Canadian and collecting the 10 per cent premium and buying securities, mainly Government securities, or simply leaving the money on deposit, in the expectation in many cases that when the rate was changed they would sell the securities and cash in on the profit. The speculative movement has of course affected Canadians as well who have sought to derive the maximum benefit from the anticipated change or protect themselves from its adverse consequences, e.g. importers, exporters, inter-company accounts.

The result has been a very sharp increase in our gold and U.S. dollar holdings.

Position	Change
End 1949	1,117
May 30, 1950	1,182
June 30	1,255	73
July 31	1,320	65
Aug. 31	1,504	184
Sept. 27	1,797	295

This speculative movement started in June. Our reserves went up $75 million in that month and $65 million in July. While we welcome the inflow of capital for productive purposes, a hot money inflow is not welcome. For one thing it is costly — we pay on the average, say 3 per cent on the funds invested and we earn only 1 1/4 — for every $100 million capital inflow of this sort we are therefore out of pocket nearly $2 million. However, in spite of this and the other disadvantages of a hot money inflow, the first decision of the Minister was to ride the thing out in the hope that the inflow would peter out.

But far from petering out, the inflow has constantly stepped up in tempo. In August it was 184 million and so far in September over 300 million and it doesn't show the slightest sign of abating.

In the last 3 months alone we have added over $550 million to our reserves. As our current account surplus has been negligible the whole of this can be attributed to capital inflow. To get some idea of the magnitude of the problems this has created for us and to convert this into equivalent American terms you should multiply this figure by about 18 which is roughly the ratio of the American national income to the Canadian. It is as though the United States was called upon to add $10,000 million to her monetary gold stocks in a 3 month period, and this without any sign of the movement tapering off.

The Minister has become increasingly concerned with the inflationary consequences of this speculative inflow of funds. It is his opinion that the present situation calls for anti-inflationary fiscal and credit policies, that our economic and financial policies should be based on the assumption that the cold war will last for many years and that a strenuous effort will be called for for some time to come. This attitude is reflected in the recent tax increases imposed at the special session of Parliament in order to retain a budgetary surplus in the face of large defence appropriations.

The massive inflows of funds threaten this anti-inflationary policy. Those who sell bonds to American investors come into possession of cash which they wish to re-invest. A downward pressure on interest rates is exercised at a time when this is least desirable.

The Bank of Canada has done its best to offset the inflationary consequences of the inflow of funds and it has managed to keep the banks' cash reserves from rising by more than $5 million since June 30, even though inflow of funds requiring to be offset exceeded in amount the total deposits held by the commercial banks with the Bank of Canada on June 30. But in spite of heavy sales of securities all the Bank of Canada has been able to accomplish on the long term side has been to prevent interest rates from falling by more than a fractional amount. For example our 3's of 66 which were selling on June 30 at 102 1/8 to yield 2.78 are now selling at 102 7/8 to yield 2.70. And even this modest result has been accomplished by acting extensively in the field of short term rates where more ammunition was available. These rates have been pushed very high, e.g., the 3's of 53/56 are yielding 2.45 per cent for a 3 year security.

The inward pressure of funds shows no signs of abating and the Minister has reached the conclusion that we can't go on on the present basis. Something must give. In a sense we have the bear by the tail and we have to let go. The only question which arises is where will we wind up when we do let go.

All the speculation is that we will return to parity with the U.S. dollar and that is in fact the only fixed rate worth considering. Any intermediate point such as a 5 per cent premium on U.S. funds would be regarded as the first bite of the cherry and would encourage further speculation.

A return to parity would in fact put an end to the speculation and it would help deal with the inflationary situation which is causing the Minister concern. At the same time the Minister has reached the definite conclusion that he could not recommend this course of action to his colleagues.

His main reason for reaching this conclusion is that there is nothing in Canada's current account position in relation to the rest of the world which would justify him in arbitrarily raising the value of the Canadian dollar by 10 per cent at this time. Our over-all international trade position is worsening and not improving. In the first 8 months of this year we had an over-all trade deficit of $17 million compared with an over-all surplus of $83 million in the same period last year — a worsening of $100 million. Our estimated over-all current account surplus for 1950 is only $70 million, compared with $180 million in 1949 and $472 million in 1948. With the further relaxations which are planned in import restrictions and in travel restrictions it would not be surprising if our current account surplus disappeared entirely in 1951.

A return to parity would inevitably be followed by sharp losses of exchange. The speculative capital would be withdrawn, the leads and lags would be reversed and our current account position, already none too good, would worsen and might even run a deficit. It would soon appear and might in fact be the case that we had chosen the wrong rate. The speculative pressures would start operating against us and we might soon be up against the necessity of considering another arbitrary 10 per cent change in the exchange rate.

In thinking of the possibility of returning to parity the Minister is naturally influenced by the experience following our return to parity in 1946. Very soon after that we began to lose reserves rapidly and when they got down to $500 million very drastic action was taken to restrict imports, ration travel, etc., etc. Basically the loss of reserves was due to the fact that the amount of credit we extended to the British, French, etc. to help in reconstruction after the war was in excess of the current account surplus we produced. Nevertheless in certain quarters the entire blame for all the difficulties which arose in those years was attributed to what was described as the arbitrary action of the Government in July 1946 in establishing the Canadian dollar at an "unrealistic" exchange rate. The criticism which was engendered was bitter and extreme and Mr. Abbott feels that he simply could not face Parliament and the public and again announce a return to parity unless he were thoroughly convinced that this was the right rate for Canada. He is not convinced of this and consequently he is not able to recommend this course of action.

This leaves the position then that the present rate cannot be maintained, we are being forced off it by forces too big for us to cope with, and the Minister feels that he cannot in good conscience take the responsibility for recommending parity, the only alternative fixed rate worth considering. By elimination he has come to the conclusion that the only course open to him is the one he intends to recommend to his colleagues tomorrow — to abandon the present rate without immediately fixing a new parity. The exchange rate would then be determined by the forces of demand and supply as in a free market, subject to this — that in present circumstances the Minister would not expect the Canadian dollar to fall below the present level nor would he contemplate allowing it to rise above parity with the American dollar, and the resources of the Exchange Fund would if necessary be used to accomplish this. The hope of the Minister would be that in due course conditions would show sufficient promise of stability to enable him to fix a definite exchange value for our currency.

You may imagine that Mr. Abbott did not reach the conclusion he did without a great deal of searching of mind and conscience. The exchange system he intends to recommend to his colleagues is not fully in accord with the Articles of Agreement of the Fund, and he is very conscious of this. He does not feel that we are entitled to ask the Fund for its approval when I take the matter up with them tomorrow but he does feel entitled to hope that the Fund will consider our position objectively and in a spirit of understanding rather than one of irritation and resentment.

He feels entitled to hope this because he firmly believes that if you look at the substance of what we are doing it is fully in accord with the purposes and policies of the Fund in which Canada still fully believes. In conjunction with this change the Minister intends to announce certain very important relaxations and liberalizations of our exchange arrangements. He will announce the termination at or near the beginning of 1951 of all remaining import restrictions imposed in 1947. At one time these kept out dollar imports to an amount exceeding $300 million. He will also announce that he has instructed the Foreign Exchange Control Board to liberalize the travel arrangements, and in fact it is intended, within the next fortnight, to eliminate all restrictions on travel expenditures by Canadians in the United States. The new exchange arrangements contemplated will also do away with the unofficial exchange market by merging it with the regular exchange market. This will do away with the dual exchange rate system which has been in effect since the beginning of our exchange control and will enable Americans in a position to withdraw capital from Canada to do so at the same exchange rate as is applied to all transactions.

2. Mr. Snyder listened attentively and sympathetically to this exposition. He reacted as expected to the statement that the increase in our reserves from June 30 to September 30 was equivalent in American terms to an increase of $10,000 million in monetary gold stocks; he found the short-term rates on Government securities in Canada high; he remarked on the fact that one could not scientifically determine what was an appropriate exchange rate; and he expressed puzzlement (just before I told him what course of action was proposed) as to what a country in this position, i.e. driven off its present rate and unable to fix a new one, could do. At the end of the exposition, he thanked me for the advance notice and explanation and said he would get in touch with me in the course of the day if anything occurred to him.

3. After the discussion with Mr. Snyder I was able to get Frank Southard, the U.S. director on the Fund, to have lunch with me and I covered the same ground with him. He asked a number of searching questions but he was impressed with the magnitude of our problem and was receptive and sympathetic. He told me later in the day that at the meeting with Snyder and Martin which took place immediately after lunch, he (Southard) expressed the view that looking at the matter from an exclusively American standpoint the floating rate was preferable to parity. Parity, in his judgment, would have been regarded as more of a reflection on the U.S. dollar and as indicating a desire of the Canadians, "our best friends", to exploit the defence effort of the United States by getting better terms of trade. Southard repeated these views at the Fund Board the next day when he also made it clear that if the Canadian Government had decided to restore the currency to parity with the U.S. dollar, his Government would not necessarily have opposed the move. Southard was at pains to make it clear to me that U.S. support was based on the thought that the floating rate was a transition to a fixed one, and not a new exchange policy.

4. The discussions with the staff of the Fund regarding our exchange problem were started in Paris on September 9 when Mr. Towers and I saw the Managing Director, Mr. Gutt, and told him of the speculative inflow of funds and of the difficulties in fixing a new rate and put him on notice that the Canadian Government might decide to let the rate float. Gutt reminded us of the discussion regarding the Belgium exchange rate in September 1949 and of our opposition to the Fund approving the Belgian plan. We recalled that our opposition had been directly towards the Fund formally approving an action which was illegal under the Fund Agreement and that we had not argued that the Belgians should not follow this course of action if they thought it the best one for them — and we said that for the same reason we would not propose (should the occasion arise) to request Fund approval in our own case. Gutt remarked that he did not see how the United States could oppose in view of their favorable attitude in the Belgian case and that he thought "it would be all right". In reply to his question whether the information was entirely for himself, I first replied yes. On discussing this question again with Mr. Towers, however, we reached the conclusion that this should be withdrawn and I saw Gutt the next day and told him that we felt that it would not be right to limit his discretion in this way and at the same time I stressed the need for absolute security and expressed the hope that he would restrict the knowledge to the smallest number necessary. Gutt was clearly embarrassed at being given discretion in the matter and said that he could not trust Overby not to inform the U.S. Treasury but on the other hand he welcomed the opportunity to discuss the matter with Bernstein.

I phoned Gutt on Wednesday, September 27 to say that I would probably be asking him on Friday to summon a meeting of the Board for Saturday to discuss action along the lines of our Paris discussion. I indicated that I expected to arrive on Thursday night and see the Americans Friday afternoon. He phoned back a few hours later to say he was concerned at the shortness of the notice we were giving to the Americans and the British as he thought the discussions in the Fund would be easier if more time were given. I undertook to have the time arrangements reviewed in the light of his advice.

Gutt phoned me again on Thursday morning to say that Bernstein, who was with him, was greatly upset at the proposed action and we arranged to meet that night in Washington. I told Gutt he could have any members of his staff he wished present.

The Thursday night meeting was attended by Gutt, Bernstein, Horsefield and Gold. It soon became apparent that the other members of the staff thought we had informed the Fund of our intentions only on Wednesday and I was of course obliged to refer to the warning given Gutt in Paris on September 9. The staff members deplored our proposed action and felt that it was very injurious to the Fund, because it threatened a general breakdown of discipline. Bernstein also argued that if the action was justified then world conditions were in fact too unstable for the Fund to work and the best thing the staff members could do was go back and do something in their own countries. He also argued that the floating rate would be bad for Canada and would not solve our problem, which could only be met by direct controls over the inflow of capital. We were, in his opinion, doing great injury to the Fund without doing any lasting good to ourselves, merely for the sake of immediate relief from the inward pressure of speculative funds.

On Friday afternoon I attended, along with Keith of our Embassy, a meeting of the senior staff of the Fund where we went over the ground for about four hours. The staff were all hostile to the action and the cross-examination fairly arduous. It was apparent that some staff members thought Bernstein's idea of direct control over capital inflow undesirable or impractical, while Bernstein and others thought that the only other alternative which came up for discussion, namely, the creation of public debt in Canada in any amount necessary to finance the inflow of capital, was one which the Canadian Government should not be expected to follow. No member of the staff proposed that the exchange rate should be adjusted upwards to a new fixed level, though I believe that this view was in fact held by at least one senior officer of the Fund.

It was clear that the senior members of the staff were deeply resentful of what they regarded as the cavalier treatment of the Fund by Canada in giving so little notice and bringing the proposal before the Fund when it was virtually an accomplished fact, and I felt it necessary before leaving Washington to make sure (without I hope contributing to the difficulties between Gutt and Overby) that the main operating officials of the Fund knew that we had in fact given the Managing Director three weeks warning.

5. The Fund Board meeting took place on Saturday morning, September 30 and lasted, with some interruptions from 10 to 2. I began by outlining the position along the lines indicated in paragraph 1 above. There was then a recess to enable the members of the Board to read the staff paper "Canada: The Problem of Capital Imports", copy of which is attached.† This paper had to be put together in a very short time and it falls short of the normal quality of Fund documents.

After the recess I was invited to comment on the staff memorandum. I said that I had already informed the Canadian Government of the alternative courses of action (creation of public debt in required amounts and direct control of capital inflow) which the staff recommended for consideration, and that these had in fact been reconsidered but did not carry the judgment of the Minister of Finance. The objections to continuing to finance the inflow of capital through creating public debt without a corresponding increase in productive assets were: (a) the complete uncertainty as to the amounts which might be involved, (b) the foreign exchange cost, (c) the budgetary cost and (d) the loss of control of domestic monetary conditions and the creation of inflationary pressures. I described the objections to the proposal for capital import control as being (a) technical — the difficulty of distinguishing between speculative and productive inflows, the problems (including the problem of border control on Canadians) that would be created by the emergence of a premium on Canadian dollars in the unofficial market which would be the inevitable result of our instructing our banks not to buy U.S. dollars without reference to us, as we should be obliged to do, (b) substantive — the close and pervasive connections between the Canadian and American economic systems which had operated to the advantage of both countries; the fact that we might continue to want U.S. assistance in helping develop our natural resources; and the difficulty of turning capital on and off like a tap or having an attitude friendly towards certain types of capital inflow and hostile to others, in view particularly of the difficulty referred to above in distinguishing between them, (c) psychological — the general trend of governmental and public opinion in Canada is away from controls and it would be difficult to explain using powers given according to the preamble of the Foreign Exchange Control Act for the purpose of controlling capital exports, for the precisely opposite purpose.

Bernstein then made the case for the staff. He began by saying that the principle of the Fund was that exchange rates are not to be used as an instrument of domestic monetary policy and that had as a corollary that a country must find some other means of protecting itself from disturbing forces originating abroad. He did not think that what we were proposing would meet our problem. We wanted to avoid deliberate appreciation because of its affect on the balance of payments yet we would get appreciation to an unknown extent; we wanted to avoid using short term capital inflow to finance a current account deficit, yet we would be doing this to an unknown extent; we wanted to avoid accumulating the inflow of hot money, yet this would happen to an unknown extent. We must hope that a small appreciation would cut off the inflow and have but minor effects on the current account and that any residual dollar inflow could be dealt with by open-market operations. These were uncertain hopes, and we should act on the principle that policy should be adequate to meet the problem that will arise under the most unfavorable assumptions. He agreed that parity should be rejected and thought the creation of public debt and offsetting open-market operations unsuitable in view of the large magnitudes involved. Therefore he came to the recommendation regarding capital inflow, arguing that at least it was worth a try. In any case it was a dangerous policy for a government to allow the exchange rate to be primarily affected by capital movements of a speculative character — particularly for Canada such a course meant continued uncertainty in exchange policy.

The members of the Board were then asked to express their opinion. Southard (U.S.A.) said the case for the Canadian action had been made out in a detailed and persuasive way. He had feared that a restoration of our exchange rate to parity with the U.S. might be in mind and he preferred the idea of letting the rate find its own level. Referring to Bernstein's remarks, he said that I had not claimed that our proposal would solve our problems, but if it didn't no doors would have been closed. His own hunch was that we could so manage the rate as to bring speculation under control. Even if we were driven to some form of capital import control in order to get back to a fixed rate, this would stand a much better chance of public acceptance after we had made this experiment. He shared my views regarding the desirability of avoiding interfering with the economic relationship between Canada and the U.S. in this way if at all possible.

Crick (U.K.) said that the Canadian Government had made out the case that their domestic monetary situation was being distorted by violent capital inflows and in his opinion we could not be expected to go on indefinitely buying all U.S. funds offered at the fixed rate. The floating rate proposed involved a degree of exchange instability which might produce difficulties for the U.K. but the U.K. Government was sure we had arrived at our decision after full consideration of all the difficulties involved including the difficulties to other countries. As to the alternatives proposed by the staff, open market operations to offset inflationary effects was feasible for small inflows but not for such massive ones; and the control of inward capital movements was an unknown field — he could not conceive of the Canadian investment economy being so divorced from the U.S. investment economy. In the circumstances the U.K. Government would not question the decision the Canadian Government felt obliged to take.

Beyen (Netherlands) remarked that this was the third case of the kind the Fund had faced — Belgium, which had not acted on the approval given, Mexico, and now Canada. He thought it no accident that the two countries which had been forced to let their rates float were the neighbors of the United States. He thought I had made out a strong case that this was a special situation and felt that the Canadian Government had to decide what responsibilities it was willing to take. For his part he did not think that capital import control was feasible in our situation nor that we should be expected to go on indefinitely creating public debt to finance additions to reserves.

Gutt intervened at this point to say that Beyen's remark that the Canadian Government had to decide what responsibilities it would take seemed to represent the negation of the Fund concept — the Canadian Government had responsibilities under the Fund Agreement too. Beyen replied that this was true, but if the Canadian Government came to the conclusion that in order to cope with a serious problem it had to follow a certain course of action the Fund was not entitled to insist that alternative courses should be followed unless it could clearly demonstrate that they were preferable, and this the staff had failed to do.

Falaki (Egypt) found the Canadian exposé and replies convincing, de Lavergne (France) thought the proposal commendable, in view of the difficulties of the alternatives, Santaella (Venezuela) thought a strong case had been made out. Joshi (India) wondered whether this meant that any country faced with a similar situation could feel entitled to act in the same way.

6. Various proposals were put forward for the wording of the decision. Southard said he would like to use language similar to that which he had proposed and the Board had (on division) adopted in the Belgian case in September 1949. This would have described the Canadian action as "appropriate" and given the Board's formal approval. All the members of the Board who spoke except the U.K. and India said they would support this language. The U.K. suggested that the Fund should recognize the difficulties of the situation in its decision. The staff proposed language much less favorable than they had themselves put forward in the case of Belgium — that the Fund should merely take note and request us to remain in consultation. I said that it was clear that the consensus of opinion in the Board would be to describe the Canadian action as appropriate and formally approve it, but that it seemed to us that the decision should be formulated in a way which would not divide the Board but which all could approve. We would therefore suggest that the language should follow the general line which the staff had proposed in the Belgian case. This suggestion was adopted and the decision was as follows:

"1. The Government of Canada has informed the International Monetary Fund that in order to cope with large inflows of capital it has decided for the time being to allow the foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar to fluctuate and therefore will not ensure that exchange transactions within its territories will be based on the par value established with the Fund.

2. The Fund recognizes the exigencies of the situation which have led Canada to the proposed plan and takes note of the intention of the Canadian Government to remain in consultation with the Fund and to re-establish an effective par value as soon as circumstances warrant."

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND[9]

The Canadian dollar was unpegged on Monday, October 2nd. The previous Friday Rasminsky went to Washington to tell our story to those concerned. He gave an account of his discussions at the last meeting of the Foreign Exchange Control Board (which I attended as your alternate); he has now sent us a long document giving a play-by-play account. I doubt you will want to go through this document but the following points should be called to your attention:

(a) The suggestion that Canada did not give reasonable advance warning to the Fund is quite untrue. Towers and Rasminsky told Gutt what was in the wind when they met him in Paris at the Fund meetings during the first half of September. Gutt, on his own responsibility, decided to tell none of his staff. Thus, when Rasminsky arrived in Washington to break the news, the staff believed that this was our first warning to the institution. Rasminsky (not Gutt) indicated to them what had taken place in Paris; in the meeting of the Executive Directors on Saturday Bernstein, Chief of Research in the Fund, and its most able officer, openly stated that Gutt did not have full confidence in his staff. Thus an already tense situation in the Fund was aggravated.

(b) What Towers and Rasminsky told Gutt in Paris was that the inflow of funds might force Canada to do something about the exchange rate and that the Minister of Finance, after consultation with the Prime Minister, had decided that it was not practicable — politically or economically — to establish any new fixed rate. Mr. Abbott was apparently very definite about this.

(c) It was on Friday night that Rasminsky told Gutt and the chief officials of the Fund what was going to take place. The officials were strongly opposed to the Canadian action. At the meeting of the Executive Board on Saturday they put forward various alternatives, including Canadian restrictions on the inflow of capital from the United States. Mr. Rasminsky tried to explain to them that their proposals were impracticable. (There is no doubt regarding their impracticability.)

(d) Before the meeting of the Executive Directors Rasminsky called on Mr. John Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, and got a most sympathetic hearing. Snyder was completely convinced that the proposed Canadian action was right in all the circumstances.

(e) In the subsequent meeting the Executive Directors were unanimous in agreeing with the Canadian action and overruled the objections and alternatives put forward by the staff of the Fund. The impression given in the newspapers that the Fund really opposed the Canadian action is quite untrue. It appears that Fund officials, talking to newspapermen, have fostered this impression.

2. The question arises: where do we go from here? Two officials of the Fund have visited Ottawa to explore the situation. I attach two brief memoranda:

(a) A memorandum that I wrote on October 18th, and

(b) Some comments by Mr. Reid dated October 20th.

You will see that Mr. Reid suggests that you might like to discuss the question with me.

3. If you think that the matter should be pursued by this Department it could be done in either of two ways. I could explore it informally with Rasminsky and others. Alternatively you might like me to draft a letter for your signature to Mr. Towers suggesting that it should be explored at the next meeting of the Foreign Exchange Control Board.[10]

Two officials of the I.M.F. have been in Ottawa for the past few days. They came with misgivings and I believe that when they left they were pretty discouraged.

2. Canada's abandonment of a fixed par of exchange is directly contrary to the Articles of Agreement. In his public statements Mr. Abbott has suggested that the rate is being allowed to go free for the time being with the implication that at some future date, when the rate has settled down, a new par will be established. However, when one gets down to brass tacks I doubt whether there are many officials here who would recommend the establishment of a new par in the visible future; I further doubt that the Government would accept such advice even if it were given.

Note: I discussed this with Mr. Heeney on Nov[ember] 11th[.] He approved of the first alternative in para[graph] 3. A.F.W. P[lumptre] Nov[ember] 13/50.

3. This is what the two visitors from the Fund have in effect found out. They go back to Washington wondering whether Canada will ever again be a member of the Fund in good standing. They regard this as a severe blow — perhaps even a mortal blow — to the Fund; Canada has from the very beginning been regarded as one of its great sources of strength.

4. I discussed with the two visitors possible changes in the Articles of Agreement. They took a completely defeatist line saying that a change was impossible. I doubt that this is true. The sort of change that would make our position tenable would be one which allowed an exchange rate to fluctuate appreciably around the fixed par. At present it must be tied to within 1% of par. This might be extended to 4 or 5% in either direction. Thus, if the Canadian par were taken at 95 cents (U.S.), the Canadian dollar could be allowed to swing up to parity and down to 90 cents.

5. The Fund officials said that no other country in the world needed this sort of elasticity; Canada's position was unique. Again I doubt that they are right. I can certainly imagine conditions in the future when the United Kingdom would be quite happy to have similar elbow-room. The same goes for some of the Continental countries.

6. Assuming there is no change in the Articles of Agreement, a way out might be found in the following direction — although it would not bring us back into complete conformity with the Articles. We might fix a new parity of say 95 cents (U.S.) and then state that we could not maintain the 1% limit in each direction; instead we were going to have to operate on a 5% limit. It would be far more easy for the Fund to approve this policy, which involves the establishment of a Canadian par of exchange and a mere stretching of the limits on each side, than the present position in which there is no par established at all. I do not know what other Canadian officials would think of this plan.

7. However, I do feel concerned about Canada's relationship with the Fund and indeed about the whole future of the Fund. I feel sure that what is really needed is a shakeup in the Articles of Agreement, but there are all sorts of entrenched differences of opinion, particularly between the United States and the United Kingdom, as to what sort of changes ought to be made. Under these circumstances it seems pretty unlikely that any change in the Articles is likely to be achieved.

8. Since this memorandum contains my personal and tentative ideas, I would be grateful if you would not give it any circulation. However, I would very much appreciate your guidance as I would like to discuss these matters with officials of other Departments in the near future.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND: YOUR MEMORANDUM OF OCT. 18

On general political grounds I agree with the line which you take in your memorandum.

2. We have in general a good reputation in the world of living up to our international engagements and it is, I think, particularly important that we should live up to our international engagements when these are embodied in multilateral treaties which have the character of international constitutional acts setting up organs of the international community.

3. It is not only that we wish to preserve our reputation but that it is not in our national interest to establish precedents which would make it easier for other countries to depart from their international undertakings.

4. It is therefore most unfortunate that Canada has been put in a position by the recent abandonment of a fixed par of exchange where it has committed what I understand to be a breach of the undertakings which it gave by becoming a member of the International Monetary Fund.

5. It seems to me that the only way we can re-establish our position would be to press as soon as possible for the necessary changes in the Articles of Agreement, particularly if we can argue that these changes in the Articles of Agreement are not only required in order to legitimize our action but that they are desirable in themselves. Even if we do not meet with success in our efforts to have the changes made, we will at least have given some indications of good faith and we can then go on as a second best to do what you suggest in paragraph 6 of your memorandum.

6. If your ideas meet with any favour in your informal discussions with officials of other Departments, I assume that our first step would be to discuss the ideas informally with the British.

7. My general feeling is that the time has come during the next year or two for responsible countries to look again at the constitutions of all the specialized agencies in order to decide whether changes might not now be usefully made in their constitutions in the light of the experience of the five or six years since they were drawn up.

8. I do not know whether Mr. Heeney would agree with me on this and perhaps you would like to discuss the matter with him.

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 5, 1951

CANADA AND THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Some weeks ago you agreed with my suggestion that I might talk to Rasminsky about Canada's relationship to the I.M.F. I had a long talk with him yesterday. I explained that we were naturally rather disturbed that Canada, which had been such a firm supporter of international institutions in general and the Fund in particular, should continue in a position of failing to live up to all the articles of agreement. I asked whether he thought any change in the situation was likely or desirable.

2. There appeared to be four choices: to go back to a fixed par of exchange; to change the form of our infraction to one that might be more acceptable to the Fund; to obtain a change in the articles of agreement so as to take into account and legalize the position in which we found ourselves; and finally to go on as we are.

I. Return to a Fixed Parity

3. Rasminsky thought that this was most unlikely for the indefinite future. Towers was in Washington last month and indicated this situation both to the United States authorities and to officials of the Fund. Canadian officials would not be prepared to recommend a fixed parity and Ministers would not be prepared to accept such a recommendation — at any rate "until United States investment opinion was prepared to take a stable long-run view of the position instead of a mercurial short-run view".

II. A Change in the Form of Canada's Infraction

4. I suggested to Rasminsky that Canada's position might be more acceptable to the Fund if, instead of allowing our exchange rate complete freedom, we adopted a fixed par on say 95 cents (U.S.) and then said that we would keep Canadian funds within 5 per cent on each side of this par instead of the 1 per cent allowed by the articles of agreement.

5. Rasminsky agreed with me that this policy would be practicable for Canada. On the other hand he doubted that it would really improve our relationships with the Fund. He reminded me that the Executive Directors of the Fund had not condemned the Canadian action last September. Indeed they had accepted it readily and sympathetically. It was only the staff of the Fund that had been upset and their upset was caused primarily by the fact that they believed (wrongly) that Canada's first approach to the Fund on this subject had taken place only two days before the actual event.

6. Therefore the change that I was proposing could not really be considered much of an advance from the point of view of the Fund. Certainly in the eyes of the world Canada would still be breaking the articles of agreement.

III. An Attempt to Change the Articles of Agreement

7. I suggested that if we accepted the arguments Rasminsky had put forward so far the logic of our position should lead us to propose a change in the articles of agreement at the next meeting of the Governors of the Fund in September, 1951.

8. Rasminsky agreed that this would be a logical step. On the other hand he felt reluctant to take it for two quite different sorts of reason.

9. In the first place a change in the articles of agreement would have to be accepted by legislatures of all the member countries. Thus the whole of the articles of agreement would come up for consideration in all legislatures, including Congress.[11] The Fund had been under serious criticism in many countries for many reasons during the recent years and Rasminsky was reluctant to precipitate a review of its constitution and its actions in legislatures at this time.[12]

10. In the second place, the fact that the Fund was not in very good standing in the eyes of the public in various parts of the world was a reason why we need not be too worried if we were not living strictly up to all the articles of agreement. We would not need to be too meticulous about our status in the Fund.

11. Unlike the International Bank, which has shown an increasing readiness to make loans in difficult and changing circumstances, the attitude of the Fund has been niggardly and recalcitrant. It has been dominated by the United States which has had two main reasons for restricting its operations. The first reason is a fairly good one: the United States has been unwilling to see Marshall Plan-countries, which were receiving funds for reconstruction directly under ECA, obtain additional money from the Fund. The second reason is not so good: the United States has insisted that, before countries could obtain money from the Fund, they should put up convincing evidence of progress towards non-discrimination and convertibility. Most countries have been unable or unwilling to put up evidence satisfactory to the United States. Hence the resources of the Fund have remained largely unused.

12. Rasminsky has argued these points in meetings of the Executive Directors on a number of occasions. However, he has not had much support from other countries, not even from the United Kingdom. Canada has had to make the running. I feel sure that his failure to make progress in these matters must influence his view of the need for Canada to "regularize" its position in relation to the Fund.

It seems to me that unless there are most compelling reasons for change we should not at this early date begin amending the charters and constitutions of any of the international organizations established after the Second World War. While I recognize the dangers of rigidity, it seems to me essential that Arabs, Latin Americans and others learn the values of sacrosanctity in a constitution. The important thing is to make the constitution work. If we once admit that the constitution can be changed when we run into a problem, we shall have pulled the plug and find ourselves at the mercies of special pleaders of all kinds — not to mention crackpot world federalists. J.W. H[olmes].

13. Rasminsky added that there were some glimmerings of a change in the United States attitude. However, it is as yet too early to be sure.

IV. Go on as we are

14. If we reject all the alternatives discussed above we simply go on as we are. Rasminsky obviously feels that this is not too invidious a line to take. He relies on the readiness with which the Executive Directors accepted the Canadian action last September. However he adds, as a warning, that the United States did accept that action only on the understanding that it was temporary and that at some future time a new parity would be fixed.

15. Rasminsky also emphasized that, while we are infringing one of the articles of agreement, our actions since last September have been very much in accord with other articles and with the general spirit of the constitution of the Fund. Canada has removed all its quantitative restrictions on imports and has virtually removed restrictions on travel. We have approached nearer to a position of full convertibility of the Canadian dollar as a result of a number of relaxations in F.E.C.B.'s administrative rulings regarding capital movements by non-residents. Finally, except for some rapid movements a few days after the original action, the Canadian dollar has shown remarkable stability; it has in fact fluctuated within 1 per cent on each side of a rate of 95 cents (U.S.). Thus, looking back over what has happened and comparing our position in relation to the Fund with that of other countries, there are very few countries that are really in a position to throw any stones at us.

Conclusion

16. In conclusion it appears that Rasminsky and the others concerned are not at present contemplating any steps to regularize Canada's position in relation to the Fund.

17. I think that my talk with Rasminsky has been useful. In the first place it has brought me up to date on his thinking. In the second place it has indicated to him that this Department is concerned by the anomalous position of Canada in relation to the Fund. (He readily agreed that such a situation should be of concern to our Department). I feel sure he will keep this matter in mind in future discussions of the subject.

18. I do not think that any further discussions with F.E.C.B. or the Bank would be helpful at the present time but if you agree I will have a talk with Deutsch along the same lines as my talk with Rasminsky.[13]

Herewith is copy of the report of November 28th we have made to the Minister and External Affairs on the Third North American Regional Broadcasting Conference, Washington, 1950.

This is somewhat in the nature of a progress report as we have not yet received the documents and it may be that when they arrive, we will submit a more formal official report.

Memorandum from Deputy Minister of Transport (Air) to Minister of Transport

[Ottawa], November 28, 1950

I have pleasure in reporting to you that the Second Session of the Third North American Regional Broadcasting Conference which convened in Washington, D.C., on Wednesday, September 6, 1950, concluded its labours by the signing of the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement on Wednesday evening, November 15, 1950. The Agreement signed by me on behalf of Canada was also signed by representatives of the following countries in the Region:

Bahama Islands & Jamaica
Cuba
Dominican Republic
United States of America.

The Agreement was not signed by Haiti and Mexico, although the former, which had no representative present, followed the negotiations with keen interest and have indicated their intention of adhering to the Agreement.

The negotiations involved have been long and protracted, encompassing as they have the First Session which ran from the middle of September to early in December last year at Montreal, adjourning then to permit bilateral discussions between the United States and Cuba before reconvening in Washington. The deadlock in Montreal between those two countries was practically unchanged at the time of the opening of the Washington session, and Mexico's presence, with far-reaching demands, considerably complicated the situation.

The fundamental problems facing this Conference arose from the fact that radio broadcasting in the United States had developed so rapidly over the past twenty years that at the time of the First North American Regional Conference in Havana, Cuba, in 1937, the United States held a dominant role in operation of broadcasting stations, whereas Cuba, Mexico, Haiti, Dominican Republic, etc., had not developed as rapidly and did not possess the economic capacity to utilize additional facilities. There were 700 stations to be dealt with at the time of the Havana Conference, and the number of broadcasting stations now in existence in the Region is very close to 3,000.

Canada has fared very well since the 1937 Conference. However, the situation with respect to Cuba and Mexico has grown increasingly difficult because of the excessive interference created by stations in those countries to nearby areas of the United States of America. In essence, the result was that the small countries of the Region came to Montreal last year with demands for more frequencies, the only possible solution being that the United States reduce their use of broadcasting channels.

Canada, fortunately, went into both these sessions of the Conference in a favourable position in that we had been able to expand to full utilization the facilities afforded us by the foresight of the long term arrangements concluded at Havana; hence, our additional requirements were relatively moderate. This was providential, inasmuch as the long Canadian-United States border would make the problem technically insurmountable had we demanded additional frequency assignments. Cuba and Mexico, on the other hand, having relatively short geographical proximity to the United States, could seek adjustments on the basis of alteration of assignments to United States stations in restricted areas. Nevertheless, Canada had as well defined objectives the following:

(1) To secure recognition of the use of 540 kc/s as Canadian Class 1A priority channel and to secure International agreement assuring protection of this very important channel;

(2) To seek general improvement of broadcast reception conditions in Canada by the reduction, if possible, of existing interference. This includes protection against degradation of the existing radio broadcasting service by the acceptance of lower standards of interference levels between stations.

(3) To permit expansion of service to Canadian listeners by the use of Canadian Class 1A channels by more than one station in Canada, while at the same time not degrading these channels by permitting increased interference to our borders from stations in other countries. This was a vital requirement because of the peculiar pattern of our population distribution in the Western provinces, and would permit us to establish three or more new stations in the West operating on the same frequencies as Class 1A stations in Eastern Canada, thus providing better broadcasting coverage of Canada.

(4) To write into the Treaty recognition of certain special situations which had arisen in the assignment of Canadian stations to channels on which specific priorities existed for stations in other countries and where bilateral agreement had been reached on the continued protection to the Canadian stations concerned.

I am happy to report that we have achieved in this Agreement the major objectives we sought. Not only have we had written into the Agreement the acceptance of the principle of assignment of more than one station within a country to a Class 1A channel assigned to that country, but also the priority of existing Canadian broadcasting stations. I am also glad to report that, notwithstanding the marked increase in the number of broadcasting stations for which provision had to be made, any increase in the general interference level which may result therefrom may be considered negligible, insofar as Canadian broadcasting services are concerned. On the other hand, we contributed to the cooperation to improve broadcasting coverage in other countries, particularly Cuba, by renewing to that country the official recognition agreed to in the modus vivendi of 1946, of four existing stations whose signals on our border were higher than the general figure specified in the Treaty but where we were amply protected by having an adequate signal of our own in the area. Four years operation at this level since 1946 has indicated that it is not causing interference with Canadian stations.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the great desire of the United States to reach an accord with the countries concerned and the many sacrifices they made in their radio coverage patterns, particularly in the eastern seaboard, to accommodate the establishment of stations in Cuba. In like manner they were prepared to make major sacrifices to bring Mexico within the Agreement, although Mexican delegates, whose demands were exceedingly high, including the expressed intention of covering the major portions of the United States with interference-free signals, decided that they could not obtain sufficient concessions and withdrew from the Conference on Wednesday, October 18th.

I am glad to report that, on leaving, the Mexican Delegation expressed, privately, to the Canadian Delegation their continued high regard for Canada and their desire to cooperate with us in matters of mutual protection against interference.

The document which was signed at Washington consists of the Agreement proper and three Annexes, encompassing provisions to deal with the present advanced state of the broadcasting art within the Region and providing for orderly development in the future.

While fully protecting the sovereign rights of all countries concerned, the Agreement establishes control of interference created internationally between countries. Within the Agreement there is established recognition of existing priorities of stations and protection of the existing channel framework of clear, regional and local.

Part 1 of the Agreement deals with the presentation and scope of the Agreement; Part 2 — definitions of technical terms and channeling; and part 3 — procedure.

Under procedure, provision is made for the next pleni-potentiary conference to be held four years after the entry into force of the present Agreement. The Agreement further provides that in the interim, administrative conferences may be called to revise the technical standards applicable to the operation of broadcasting stations, if necessary. Provision is also made to deal with certain technical matters in Annex 2 by mutual agreement between governments concerned and is likewise made for the continuation of research and exchange of technical information in connection with the broadcasting services. The Treaty also sets up procedures for the notification of new broadcasting stations, changes in existing broadcasting stations, etc., and the ratification of adherence and accession to the Agreement which is to come into force upon being ratified or adhered to by three of the following countries:

Canada
Republic of Cuba
Mexico
United States of America.

The usual clause with respect to denunciation requiring one year before taking effect has also been incorporated.

Annex 1 appended to the Agreement consists of detailed procedures for Setting up of Conferences, the Composition of Delegations and the Procedures to be followed at Conferences. This annex also gives detailed procedures to be followed in Settlement of Differences, including a choice of Arbitration or reference to the International Court of Justice.

Annex 2 to the Agreement comprises essentially the technical provisions covering the operation of broadcasting stations and the assignment of stations to the various classes of channels. The procedures to be followed are set down for the investigation of interference and exchange of notifications. Detailed appendices to this Annex comprise lists of Priorities on Clear Channels and tabulated signals of permitted interference levels. Also included are graphs of Field Intensity versus Distance, Angles of Departure of Radio Waves, Ground Conductivities, Vertical Plane Radiations, etc.

The final Annex to the Agreement — Annex 3 — consists of a detailed list of all existing broadcasting stations in the North American Region, together with detailed notes establishing all special conditions of operations and protections for such stations. This list continues in effect priorities of protection of all the stations in the Region, such priorities having been in jeopardy since the termination of the last Agreement on the 29th of March, 1949.

While many compromises were made by the delegates from the United States and Cuba, the prolonged and arduous negotiations in which all delegations participated and which have resulted in the bringing into being of the Agreement, have created a feeling of success among the delegations present in Washington, which was ably expressed by the head of the Cuban Delegation — Dr. Jose R. Gutierrez. He pointed out at the final Plenary Session that this is the first time that a major radio conference has met since the World Telecommunications Conference of 1947, when mutual Agreement has been reached and that by so doing the countries of the North American Region have shown their ability to perpetuate under democracy an equitable way of life with equal opportunity to all countries, irrespective of size.

During the difficult negotiations between the United States and Cuba, able assistance was rendered by members of the Canadian Delegation in suggesting possible solutions to the problems confronting the other delegations. In this connection, Dr. Gutierrez of the Cuban Delegation expressed to us his high regard for the abilities of our officers and stated that their integrity gave the Cuban Delegation assurance of a fair and unbiased help in resolving the difficult problems Cuba faced.

In closing this report, I would mention, as I did in Montreal, the high caliber of the work of the Canadian Delegation led by the Controller of Telecommunications — Mr. Browne. Our officers worked well and hard, often into the early morning hours, to fulfil their part in the shaping of the Agreement. Senior Engineer Smith was active in the Technical Committees, ably assisted by Engineer Mather; the Chief Inspector of Radio — Mr. W.A. Caton — was active in the Juridical and Drafting Committees; and Miss V. Fisher performed the work of Secretary to the Delegation very efficiently.

I think, also, that special mention should be made of our contributions to the Conference, including the leadership of the all-important Drafting Committee by Mr. Gordon E. Cox, Second Secretary of the Canadian Embassy in Washington, D.C. The work of Mr. Cox was praised by the heads of the delegations from all countries represented.

I should also like to mention the assistance rendered by Mr. W.G. Richardson of the Engineering Staff of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, who took over the Chairmanship of the Technical Committee when pressure of work precluded Commissioner Hyde, the head of the U.S. Delegation, from carrying out his duties in this respect. Mr. Richardson diligently pressed the work of this important Committee to a satisfactory conclusion.

Although at times I was somewhat discouraged and apprehensive that no Agreement would be reached, it has given me, personally, deep satisfaction to have been selected as the Chairman of this all-important Conference and that we were able to bring it to a successful termination.

We believe that in the writing of this Treaty we have not only provided for the signatory countries, but have left the door wide open for the adherence of that very important member of our North American family — Mexico.

The final documents of the Conference will not be ready for a week or two because of the terrific pressure under which the final sessions were concluded and the inability to keep up with the work in the printing. A Continuing Committee of the Conference, chaired by Captain Cross of the United States State Department and made up of Mr. Gordon E. Cox of the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and Dr. Recardo Sarabasa of the Cuban Embassy in Washington, are handling details.

Respectfully submitted,
C.P. EDWARDS

GATT; MATTERS FOR DISCUSSION AT THE FORTHCOMING MEETING

1. Mr. Deutsch said that he and Mr. Isbister had recently had discussions in Washington with the U.S. representatives to the GATT meeting. One of the more important questions that had been discussed had been the handling of the problem of discriminatory import controls, on which a report had to be made by March 31.

The U.K. reply to the general questionnaire on the subject had been drafted to set forth both the details of the U.K. controls and also the justification and argument in relation to them. The reply had been presented to the U.S. authorities in advance and they had indicated that if it went forward as drafted they would be forced to challenge it. In view of the undesirability of having an open argument on the underlying policy at this stage, the United Kingdom had revised their report and it would now be purely factual. The United States would not, itself, raise policy questions in relation to it and would probably not follow up any action that might be initiated by other parties.

In part, the U.S. reluctance to go into this matter at the present time arose out of uncertainty as to what to do following the recent OEEC discussions in Paris. Mr. Hoffman had hoped to get agreement in relation to a clearing union, relaxation of quantitative restrictions on trade, dual pricing and the appointment of a "superman" to head the work of OEEC. Only in connection with the last had there been any success. In Washington there was now a large area of disagreement as to what U.S. policy should be in relation to discriminatory relaxation of trade restrictions and in the circumstances they wished to avoid having to take a definite position on the general question at the Geneva discussions.

A further question in which the United States would be most interested at the GATT meeting was the use of quantitative restrictions, whether discriminatory or not, for protectionist purposes. U.S. officials were of the view that a large proportion of present restrictions by European countries — they estimated about two-thirds — were imposed for protectionist reasons and went beyond what balance of payments considerations would justify.

2. Mr. Isbister said that he thought that the U.S. approach in connection with use of restrictions for protectionist purposes might be to raise points of detail in connection with the observance of the rules of GATT rather than to go at the matter from a broader and more general base. So far as the question of discriminatory relaxation of trade restrictions was concerned, there were two schools of thought among the U.S. officials: that which held that it would be desirable to press forward with relaxations, even though on a discriminatory basis, if a unified approach could be secured by the European countries and if liberalization within that area at least seemed a hopeful possibility; and, secondly, that which held that relaxation within a given area was not a step toward general liberalization but rather created a special bloc fenced off from the rest of the world which would be likely to develop a tendency toward isolation of a permanent character. One group in the State Department and ECA in general tended to favour the first view. The Treasury and a different group in the State Department were opposed to that attitude and adopted the second approach.

3. The Committee, after discussion, noted the report concerning talks in Washington on certain matters likely to arise at the Geneva meeting of GATT.

Geneva, March 24, 1950

Dear Wynne [Plumptre],

Our work here is rapidly drawing to a close, although the main questions, namely, Q.Rs[15] and balance of payments, have not yet come out of the working party stage, where the reports on those subjects are, at the present time, being debated word by word. The relatively rapid progress which has been made in dealing with these difficult matters is due, in large measure, to the fact that the examination into the use of the exceptions to the balance of payments provisions of GATT has been rather superficial. This is clearly unfortunate. But such are the facts of life under the present circumstances. We cannot, therefore, feel too frustrated when we realize that it is virtually impossible to ensure at this time a strict enforcement of those provisions of GATT. Most countries are still in balance-of-payments difficulties; the secretariat facilities remain, pending the decision on the I.T.O., utterly inadequate. Furthermore, the basic problem of trade disequilibrium is under discussion in many other forums and organizations; the prior American-U.K. agreement not to enter into the substantive questions raised by the report under Article XIV:1(g)[16] has also thrown a wet blanket over the whole proceedings.

Countries, however, are learning, perhaps against their will, to talk about their Q.Rs, and put some, if not all, their cards on the table. This is the first time that GATT has entered into this field. I think, for example, that the various individual submissions under XIV:1(g) are useful. They have been considered one by one in John Deutsch's working party. It was Claude [Isbister] who introduced the Canadian submission. He did an outstanding job. I must say that our GATT halo is bright and shiny and undented when compared with the halos which other C.Ps[17] are sporting this season.

This lifting of the first veil over Q.Rs is, I think, useful. For one thing, it has served to point up the various malpractices engaged in by certain CPs under the exceptions to the balance-of-payments provisions. This unveiling exercise is to continue. Although it is not envisaged that the Fifth Session (scheduled for November 9 at Torquay) will devote much time to an examination of Q.Rs and discriminatory practices, the proposal is now that at that session a questionnaire to be prepared by the Secretariat, pursuant to Articles XII:1(b) and XIV:1(g), will be approved and submitted to the CPs for consideration at their Sixth Session, which will probably take place about May or June 1951. By that time some of the dust might have settled so that some of the malpractices entered into by certain countries, and which are either condemned or prohibited by GATT, will stick out even more clearly. It might also lead to action in co-operation with other organizations, such as the Fund, along the lines of Article XII, paragraph 5, which provides that GATT shall institute discussions if there is a persistent and widespread application of import restrictions indicating the existence of a general disequilibrium which is restricting international trade.

At the moment, most CPs are not disposed to go that far. Hence the Secretariat draft conclusions based on submissions under XIV:1(g), and which establishes the existence of a "disequilibrium", will simply be disregarded. No one doubts, of course, that the disequilibrium exists. But everyone agrees that it would be premature to make this "determination" formally at this time. GATT is only concerned, of course, with trade Q.Rs. This organization could not, therefore, make that determination without full consultation with the Fund. The latter — or, more specifically, the Americans — do not want such a determination, which might, if it is logically followed up, impose on the Fund a decision that the U.S. dollar is a scarce currency.

As far as I can see, Torquay will be a major undertaking. 300 pairs of negotiations have already been listed. This is only a partial, preliminary figure, since only 17 out of about 40 possible participating countries have so far submitted the lists of countries with which they intend to negotiate. By way of comparison, 123 pairs of negotiations were completed at Geneva in 1947, and 147 at Annecy in 1949.

Yours sincerely,
LOUIS [COUILLARD]

POSITION AND PROSPECTS OF GATT

Mr. Plumptre has discussed the position and prospects of GATT with the three officials who have just come back from the GATT meeting in Geneva — Mr. Couillard, Mr. Deutsch and Mr. Isbister.

2. Some members of the Canadian group had approached the recent meetings with skepticism. They had wondered whether GATT was perhaps out of date; it was born in the days when people thought that the "post-war transitional period" was likely to last only a few years instead of running on indefinitely.

3. All our officials have come back reassured about the usefulness of the organization. The General Agreement sets up a code of ethics for international trade. The Contracting Parties seem to be seriously trying to live up to that code.[18] They are willing to give and take frank talk about each other's actions. They are gradually developing a system of checking up on countries that seem to be infringing the code.

4. All this seems to be taking place in a pretty satisfactory atmosphere. The procedures appear to be businesslike and practical. There seems to be little of the frustration which surrounds some of the other United Nations bodies. Much of the credit for this state of affairs apparently belongs to Mr. Wilgress himself.

5. The organization is handicapped by lack of staff. It only has about half a dozen officers; (translators and clerical staff are of course additional). This means that the Secretariat cannot do much in the way of preparing for meetings and that all the work has to be done on the scene when delegates arrive.

6. The organization also suffers from the uncertainty of its future. This is tied closely to the fate of I.T.O. Theoretically, of course, the two can be separated; GATT could stand on its own feet with its more limited membership and its less extensive field; indeed many people think that the more modest organization would really be preferable. On the other hand the provisions of GATT make up the greater part of I.T.O.; if I.T.O. were decisively defeated in Congress, it is difficult to know how much of GATT could be rescued.

V. REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO GENEVA

18. Mr. Couillard reported briefly on the disposition of the following items on the agenda of the Fourth Session of the Contracting Parties:

Item 1. Election of Chairman and Vice-Chairman

Mr. L. Dana Wilgress, Canadian High Commissioner to the United Kingdom was unanimously re-elected Chairman for another year. Mr. Max Sueteus (Belgium) was elected Vice-Chairman for the same period.

Item 2. Adoption of Agenda

Some preliminary opposition was encountered to the inclusion of the item (No. 14) dealing with the protective aspects of quantitative restrictions which had been suggested by the United States.

Item 3. 1950 Tariff Negotiations

(a) Fairly detailed consideration was given to an enquiry by Switzerland concerning its participation in the Torquay tariff negotiations. The problem visualized by the Swiss in connection with possible participation in the GATT was in most respects the same as that visualized in connection with their possible participation in the ITO. In both cases, the Swiss wanted a special waiver from the obligations of GATT with respect to the application of quantitative restrictions. The Contracting Parties were not in favour of permitting the accession of Switzerland on such terms. The hope was expressed that Switzerland would find it possible to accept GATT on the same basis as present members.

(b) A Resolution was passed unanimously approving in principle the extension on a firm basis of the tariff concessions negotiated at Geneva and at Annecy until January 1, 1954. This implies that the Torquay concessions will run to the same date. There was also general agreement that renegotiations of Geneva and Annecy concessions would be limited both as to scope and number. It is hoped that these decisions will have an important and beneficial effect on the Torquay negotiations.

Item 4. Notifications under Article XVIII

The discussions on this Article, which concerns import restrictions imposed to promote economic development, were very limited. Consideration of applications for measures under this Article had been long and acrimonious at Annecy.

Item 5. Rectification and Modification of Schedules

A Protocol of Rectifications was established which incorporated a number of corrections in the various tariff schedules to GATT.

Item 6. Status of the Agreement and Protocols

Certain countries have not yet signed a number of Protocols amending GATT. A Resolution was passed unanimously recommending to all Contracting Parties concerned that they should sign all Protocols as soon as possible.

Item 7. Application of Annecy Schedule XIV (Norway)

It was agreed that the Norwegian Government would be granted an extension from April 30 to June 30, in which to apply its Annecy concessions. This was made necessary because of an unexpected delay in the meeting of the Norwegian Storting.

Item 8. Australian Subsidy on Ammonium Sulphate

There had been a Chilean complaint that Australia was discriminating against Chilean nitrate in favour of domestically produced ammonium sulphate. It appeared that Australia had subsidized both products until July 1, 1949 when the subsidy on Chilean nitrate had been withdrawn. It was agreed that Australian action had not been contrary to GATT. On the other hand, Australia agreed to review the situation and to try to restore the competitive position of Chilean nitrate as it was before July, 1949.

Item 9. Review of Brazilian Internal Taxes

As a result of the protests about the discriminatory nature of certain Brazilian internal taxes on a limited number of commodities, the Brazilian representative agreed to recommend to his government that the taxes in question should be modified.

Item 15. Special Exchange Agreements and Procedural Arrangements for Their Implementation

A Working Party was established to consider the question of a Special Exchange Agreement for Contracting Parties not members of the International Monetary Fund and to work out appropriate arrangements with the Fund. The date of November 2 was set by which such a Contracting Party would enter into the Special Exchange Agreement if it was not a member of the I.M.F. by that date.

Item 16. Consideration of Proposals to Give Effect to the Provisions of Chapter VI of the Havana Charter

The United Kingdom proposed that Chapter VI of the Havana Charter, which dealt with inter-governmental commodity agreements, be brought into force provisionally prior to the entry into force of the ITO Charter. The United States could not accept this proposal. After a very brief debate the United Kingdom dropped its proposal.

Items 17, 18, 19. Administrative

The 1950 Budget was approved. Other decisions concerning the distribution and derestriction of GATT documents were taken. The Secretariat will publish a follow-up to the earlier publication "The Attack on Trade Barriers". It will continue, on a trial basis till November, the publication of its Monthly Trade Bulletin.

Item 20. Request of Director-General of UNESCO

Consideration was given to a request originating with UNESCO that, at the next tariff negotiations special consideration be given to the tariff treatment of educational, scientific and cultural materials. A group of experts met at Geneva under the auspices of UNESCO to review the Agreement on this question which had been elaborated at Annecy. This Draft Agreement will be considered by UNESCO at its forthcoming Conference in Florence. The Contracting Parties did not take any specific action.

Item 21. Customs Nomenclature and Regulations

Under this item a report was given by the French representative on the work carried out by the European Customs Union Study Group on customs nomenclature and regulations. No specific action was taken.

Item 22. Meeting Required under Article XXIX of GATT

Article XXIX requires that the Contracting Parties should meet before December 31, 1949 if the Havana Charter had not come into effect by September 30, 1949, to consider further action. It was agreed that the Contracting Parties would return to this item at a time to be determined later.

Item 23. Next Session

It was agreed that the next (Fifth) Session of the GATT would be held at Torquay beginning November 2, 1950. It is fully expected that this Session will be concluded before the end of December.

Item 24. Other Business

(a) A special waiver formalizing a change for a period of one year in the United States tariff treatment on potatoes imported from Canada was agreed to without any discussion.

(b) It was agreed that all Contracting Parties should submit a report on their subsidies (Article XVI) before the end of July, 1950.

19. Mr. Deutsch reported on the following agenda items (10-13) which had been discussed in connection with import restrictions imposed for balance-of-payments reasons:

(a) The imposition of discriminatory import controls by South Africa had provoked considerable discussion at the Third Session at Annecy. At that time, the International Monetary Fund had been unable to give a final opinion on the balance-of-payments problem and a report was not ready for consideration at Geneva. It was anticipated that a report would be submitted by the International Monetary Fund at a future session. A special situation existed in the case of South Africa since the import restrictions were designed to increase the flow of capital from the United Kingdom and at the same time to provide gold for the United Kingdom. The issues involved were not discussed in terms of the technical provisions of GATT and there was a feeling that the problem might better be considered in the tripartite discussions or under the auspices of the International Monetary Fund. For this reason, any decision on the matter was postponed for later consideration.

(b) Consideration was also given to the intensification of import restrictions by the Sterling Area arising out of the 25 per cent cut in dollar imports. Under the terms of GATT, such discriminatory intensification requires consultation with the Contracting Parties but a report by the International Monetary Fund is also required before consultation. Since the Fund was unable to prepare a report on the whole Sterling Area, the prior consultation had not taken place. At present, intensification of import controls has taken place in several countries in the Sterling Area where the condition of their balance of payments would not justify it, namely, Ceylon, Southern Rhodesia and probably Pakistan. The GATT is somewhat unrealistic in this connection since it does not recognize the existence of the Sterling Area and a solution of the problem will have to be evolved in some fashion at a later time.

(c) A report based on the replies to the questionnaire concerning discriminatory trade controls was being prepared for public release. With several exceptions, the quality of the replies of the questionnaire was poor, but it was made clear that subsequent reports would be subject to detailed scrutiny. There was some educational value in the process despite the inadequacies of many of the reports and it was planned to publish a report containing the replies of each country when the next survey was carried out.

20. Mr. Isbister reviewed the discussions which had taken place on quantitative import and export restrictions which had been imposed for protective, promotional or other commercial reasons (Agenda item 14). A large number of concrete examples of quantitative restrictions with protective effects were considered, many of which could not be justified on balance-of-payments grounds. For example, there were cases where export controls on raw materials were administered in such a way as to extract concessions relating to the import restrictions of other countries. There was a sharp and critical discussion of the tendency of countries to ignore the provisions of GATT when they attempted to alleviate balance-of-payments difficulties. It was noted that the discussion provided the United States with a useful indication of the progress of European economic integration and the problems involved. A number of countries had made complaints relating to restrictive practices in bilateral trade deals, but it was made clear that GATT did not encompass bilateral trade negotiations.

21. The Committee, after discussion, noted these reports.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE TORQUAY CONFERENCE
UNDER THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

This Conference, which is scheduled to open in Torquay, England, on September 28, will include (a) a third round of multilateral tariff negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and (b) the Fifth Session of the Contracting Parties which will open on November 2.

It is recommended that the composition of the delegation should be as follows:

Chairman of Delegation
Mr. L.D. Wilgress, High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom
Deputy Chairman
Mr. H.B. McKinnon, Chairman, Canadian Tariff Board
Representatives
Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance
Dr. C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. W.J. Callaghan, Department of External Affairs
Mr. A.L. Neal, Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. S.S. Reasman, Department of Finance
Dr. A.E. Richards, Department of Agriculture
Mr. B.G. Barrow, Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. H.V. Jarrett, Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. J.P.C. Gauthier, Department of Trade and Commerce
Secretary
Mr. H.H. Wright, Department of External Affairs

It is anticipated that the Conference will last for six months or more. However, it is not planned that all the members of the delegation will remain in Torquay continuously for the duration of the Conference. Mr. Wilgress, who has been re-elected Chairman of the Contracting Parties, expects to divide his time between London and Torquay.

Negotiations at Torquay will follow the same general lines as those at Geneva, 1947 and Annecy, 1949. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation should be instructed to follow the same general policies as on those occasions towards the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers and the elimination of preferences and discriminatory practices. It is also recommended that the delegation should, as in the past, participate in preliminary discussions in London with other Commonwealth countries.[19]

II. PROVISIONAL AGENDA FOR THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES

3. The Chairman explained that the provisional agenda for the fifth session of the Contracting Parties had been received. It was customary for the Committee to review the items on the agenda of the various sessions of the Contracting Parties in order to provide guidance to the Canadian delegation where necessary.

4. During the discussion of the agenda which ensued, the following views were expressed by various members of the Committee:

(1) Adoption of Agenda—(No discussion)

(2) Status of Protocols

[19] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 1 septembre 1950./Approved by Cabinet, September 1, 1950.

5. Mr. Deutsch said there was considerable uncertainty since so many protocols had not yet been signed; however, efforts were being made to have the protocols brought up to date.

(3) Tariff Negotiations

(a) Terms of Accession - (No discussion)

(b) Instrument to give Effect to Results of Negotiations - (No discussion)

(c) Procedure for Prolongation of Assured Life of Geneva and Annecy Schedules

6. Mr. Deutsch explained that certain technical and legal problems arise out of the fact that the binding character of the Geneva concessions expire at the end of this year after which modifications in particular concessions may be made. It is hoped that by the end of the Torquay negotiations the Geneva concessions will be rebound for a three year period (until 1954) as well as all present negotiations being bound for the same period. Canada will probably establish one schedule including the Torquay and Geneva bindings although each country can do what it wishes as to how they present their bindings. Further, until such a protocol is signed and ratified, a country can use Article XXVIII which permits changes to be made in the Geneva bindings. This could make for a hiatus after January 1st. However, to cover this gap, all countries will be asked to sign a declaration of intention that they do not intend to use Article XXVIII pending conclusion of the protocol.

(4) Consolidation of Schedules

7. The Committee agreed that an office consolidation be made.

(5) Schedule IX—Cuba: Report on Renegotiations with the United States

8. Mr. Deutsch noted that the United States and Cuba had disagreed when the Cubans wished to raise certain tariffs (particularly on textiles) bound at Geneva. During the summer the two parties have renegotiated and are now reporting back.

(6) Rectification of Schedules Consequent upon Adherence to the Brussels Convention for Tariff Nomenclature

9. The Chairman indicated that changes in tariff nomenclature will cause small changes in revenue. An ideal nomenclature has been worked out by the Europeans which the Germans have accepted.

10. The Committee agreed that Canada would be unwilling at this time to accept the new nomenclature which would necessitate a new tariff act and an immense amount of research.

(7) Review of Import Restrictions

11. Mr. Deutsch mentioned that a new draft questionnaire to obtain information on import restrictions would be submitted to the Contracting Parties. This report would be completed between the fifth and sixth sessions but considered at the sixth meeting. According to GATT there must be an annual review of this subject.

(8) Consultations on Recent Changes in Import Programmes

12. Mr. Deutsch pointed out that this item refers to action taken by Commonwealth countries (excluding Canada) in increasing import restrictions during the summer of 1949. It will most likely be turned into an examination of the present policy of sterling area restrictions on dollar imports and become the liveliest item on the agenda. The United States will probably advance the view that the British should begin to relax the restrictions on dollar imports using a part of the increasing dollar surplus for this purpose.

As further background, Mr. Deutsch mentioned that GATT had entered into consultations with the International Monetary Fund on the 1949 restrictions. The IMF proposed to report on the current situation as well and the United Kingdom had objected to asking for our support. The IMF report and recommendations dealt with both the 1949 and the 1950 situations suggesting with qualifications that the time might be ripe to adopt relaxations; the report was approved by a majority of the Fund Board. Mr. Deutsch indicated that Canada does not object to the substance of what is contained in the Fund Report. We had some misgivings of a procedural nature. Our position was that the IMF was not asked by GATT to report on the current situation and that it would have been better for the Fund to wait until asked; also that the IMF should have consulted first with the British as a matter of internal propriety in the Fund.

(9) South African Import Control

13. Mr. Deutsch mentioned that South Africa had conducted consultations regarding their controls at Geneva and Annecy. Although they are in the sterling area they did not participate in the general 25 per cent cut in 1949. Mr. Deutsch was of the opinion that this item could be handled easily since the South Africans had reorganized their whole system which was now considered less discriminatory.

14. Mr. Weeks agreed that we would have little complaint since the new restrictions were less severe than previously.

(10) Consideration of a Review of Quantitative Export Restrictions

15. The Chairman indicated that this subject may be of interest to Canada and the United States because of our discrimination against Iron Curtain countries and the favouritism existing between the United States and Canada as evidenced by the new 'Hyde Park Agreement'.[20] With reference to recent exchanges with the Canadian Delegation at Torquay it had been pointed out that there were escape clauses in GATT which permitted the use of the word "emergency" as a clear defence for certain action. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had confirmed the use of the escape clause referred to.

(ISCETP Docs. Nos. 50-42 and 50-43, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Canadian High Commissioner, London, October 17, 1950, and the reply, October 21, 1950)†

16. The Committee agreed that the prevailing international situation would justify the use of the expression an "emergency in international relations."

(11) Special Exchange Agreements

17. Mr. Deutsch referred to the perennial problem of New Zealand which country is not a member of the IMF even though all other countries involved have joined or are joining the latter organization. Since New Zealand has indicated that it will refuse to sign the special exchange agreement which GATT requires, it follows that, technically, they could be forced to leave GATT. He expressed the opinion that (a) we should try to find a modus vivendi to keep them in by postponing the matter, or (b) we should consider giving them a waiver on their obligations which is provided for by GATT. The departure of New Zealand from GATT would cause many difficulties owing to her participation in the imperial preference system. He thought, however, that New Zealand should not be let off completely but should be required to enter into a general undertaking not to frustrate GATT through manipulations in the field of exchange. Mr. Deutsch further mentioned that provision might be made for insisting on all new members of GATT becoming members of the IMF, although this arrangement would not take care of situations where members resigned from the IMF.

18. Mr. Weeks pointed out that the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce feels some concern about any weakening of the principles of GATT over this issue which might result in any individual member being in a preferred position.

19. The Committee, after some discussion, agreed that New Zealand should not be forced out and that a suitable waiver or postponement should be made available if necessary in order to bring about agreement. The possible position of members resigning from the IMF would be left until such a case occurred.

(12) Article XVIII - (No discussion)

(13) South African-Southern Rhodesia Customs Union

20. The Chairman said that further details would be requested on this subject.

(14) Australian Subsidy on Ammonium Sulphate

21. Mr. Deutsch indicated that this subject was another perennial complaint. However, at the last session, GATT had recommended to Australia that they patch up their differences with Chile and this has apparently been done.

(15) Draft Agreement on the Importation of Insecticides

22. The Chairman noted the suggestion of the WHO authorities that duties on insecticides should be waived, but that quantitative restrictions be kept on similarly to UNESCO recommendations. The relevant document had not yet been circulated.

23. Members of the Committee expressed doubts as to the desirability of the exceptional treatment proposed.

(16) The Continuation of the Trade News Bulletin

24. The Chairman explained that this bulletin was a fairly new monthly publication of which 12 copies were presently being received.

25. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that the members would advise the Economic Division of the Department of External Affairs of the desirability of continuing the publication. This would require a more careful examination as to whether its contents were a duplication of material readily available from other sources.

(17) Budget and Administrative Arrangements for 1951 - (No discussion)

(18) Examination of Actual Cases of Quantitative Restrictions Applied for Protective Purposes (Proposed by Belgium)

26. Mr. Deutsch indicated that this dispute arose between France and Belgium over fibre-flax grown near the common border of the two countries. The Belgians are claiming that the effects of GATT are being nullified by quantitative restrictions.

(19) Arrangements for the Continuing Administration of the General Agreement (Proposed by Canada)

27. Mr. Deutsch explained that since the ITO has not been put into effect the question is whether GATT will continue as a permanent institution if the ITO falls. There is foreseeable the continuation of GATT on a permanent basis requiring an executive organization, a small executive body and secretariat to deal with matters as they occur rather than having them accumulate for consideration at infrequent sessions of the Contracting Parties. Further, there is no adequate supervision of the agreements at the moment as well as no preparedness or means for meeting difficulties until they appear on the agenda as at present.

(20) The Scope of Article XXV: 5(6) and XXXV with Reference to Tariff Negotiations (Proposed by Cuba) - (No discussion)

(21) The Proposed European Iron and Steel Agreement (Proposed by France)

28. Mr. Deutsch was of the opinion that this item (the Schuman Plan) might prove to be a difficult subject on the agenda. The six countries involved would be asking for a preferential regime for iron, steel and coal in Europe. It was noted that Canada's direct export interest in the Schuman Plan is small.

29. The Committee agreed that issues arising at Torquay related to this subject be referred back to Ottawa for policy decisions because of the highly political and military implications involved.

(22) The Position of Indo-China in Relation to the GATT (Proposed by France and the United Kingdom) - (No discussion)

(23) Brazilian Internal Taxes (Proposed by Haiti)

30. Mr. Weeks reported that Brazil was beginning to relax their restrictions and import quotas.

(24) Rectifications to Schedule XXVI (Proposed by The Netherlands) - (No discussion)

(25) The Effect of the United Kingdom Purchase Tax on Certain Imports into the United Kingdom (Proposed by Norway)

31. The Chairman explained that the administration of the British purchase tax results in a measure of protection, since goods declared utility goods are free from tax; however, no similar imported goods are exempt. The matter had been brought to the attention of the U.K. authorities in the meeting of the Canada-U.K. Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs in June, 1950.[21]

(26) Inclusion in the Agreement of Articles from Havana Charter Dealing with Employment and Economic Activity (Proposed by Norway and the United Kingdom)

32. The Chairman expressed the view that this item sounded like additional escape clauses being introduced.

[21] Voir le document 724./See Document 724.

(27) Amendment of Article XX to Correspond with Article 45 of the Havana Charter (Proposed by the United States)

33. The Chairman indicated that this was probably intended for purposes of clarification. The only item referred to in the Charter but not in GATT were goods useful for "public safety".

(28) French Export Restrictions on Hides and Skins

34. Mr. Deutsch noted that the Americans are concerned with this matter and that Canada is also.

(29) Suggestions for Standard Practices in Import Licence and Exchange Control - (No discussion)

35. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the views expressed on the various items of the agenda covered.

Le chef de la délégation auprès de l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chairman, Delegation to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Torquay, November 16, 1950

Sir,

The following is a brief report on the activities of the Fifth Session of the Contracting Parties for the period November 2nd to date.

2. There are thirty Contracting Parties attending this Session: Syria, Lebanon and Nicaragua are not here. There are, in addition, seven acceding countries, as well as observers from El Salvador, Guatemala, Mexico, Venezuela, Switzerland and Yugoslavia, the United Nations, I.M.F. and the O.E.E.C. The latter is represented by Harry Lintott, Assistant Director-General.

3. In the fourteen plenary meetings which have been held to date all the agenda items which could be dealt with in this first series of meetings have been considered and either disposed of or referred to Working Parties, of which a total of ten have been established, as indicated below. It is expected that another three Working Parties will be established after consideration of those agenda items which for the moment have been deferred.

4. Item 1—Adoption of Agenda. The Agenda (document GATT/CP.5/1/Rev.4, November 10, attached)† was approved without any substantial change or difficulty.

Item 9 of the Provisional Agenda (GATT/CP.5/1/Rev.2, of November 2), dealing with South African import controls, was dropped. It had been agreed at the Fourth Session that this question would be discussed at this time after receipt of a report from the I.M.F. dealing with the discriminatory aspects of the South African import restrictions. The I.M.F. reported that their report was no longer pertinent since the South African import restrictions would undergo substantial modifications effective January 1, 1951. In the light of these facts, the Contracting Parties did not object to removing the item from the Agenda, although it was apparent in the brief discussion which took place that the United States were caught off base. It is not clear whether the United States will suggest that the Contracting Parties request a revised report from the Fund.

You will note that the Czechoslovaks have not sought the inclusion of an item on the alleged discriminatory application of export controls (your telegram No. 1586 of October 17th and our telegram of October 29th).† They did not raise the question when item 10 was discussed. They did propose, under item 13, that the standard practices extend, wherever appropriate, to exports as well as imports. Technically item 13 does not provide for discussion of discrimination in export controls.

Item 30 was included at the request of the Czechoslovak Delegation.

5. Item 2—Tariff Negotiations. This item is being considered by the Tariff Negotiations Committee and its two subsidiary bodies, the Tariff Negotiations Working Party and the Legal Working Party. The T.N.C., which is composed of a representative of each of the present Contracting Parties and acceding countries, is now dealing with the questions of accession and the procedure for the prolongation of the Geneva and Annecy Schedules. It is expected that discussions on these subjects will take some time. The only matter which has been referred back by the T.N.C. to the Contracting Parties is the extension of the date in the Annecy Protocol with respect to Uruguay: the Contracting Parties have agreed that Uruguay may sign that Protocol at any time up to the final date to be established for the signature of the Torquay instrument of accession.

6. Item 3—Consolidation of Schedules. For administrative convenience, it is proposed that each Contracting Party should prepare a "Consolidated Schedule" comprising all its negotiated concessions under the Agreement. There should therefore be available by mid-1951, in one volume or a series of volumes, all commitments in respect of customs duties under the Agreement. This item, as well as items 5 and 21, have been referred to a Working Party on Tariff Schedules.

7. Item 4—Rectification of Schedules Consequent upon Adherence to the Brussels Convention for Tariff Nomenclature. Discussion under this item was quite inconclusive. Contracting Parties have recognized the advisability, as and when they make modifications in their tariffs, to base such modifications on the 1950 Brussels Tariff Nomenclature. There is, however, no commitment to do so. Any resulting rectifications or modifications in the GATT Schedules would be dealt with by the Contracting Parties in the established manner.

8. Item 5—Schedule IX—Cuba: Report on Renegotiations with the United States. This matter, which had caused a good deal of difficulty at Annecy, and was partly responsible for the Cuban withdrawal from the Third (Annecy) Session and their absence from the Fourth (Geneva, Spring 1950) Session, has now been partially settled between the Cubans and Americans. There remains for the Contracting Parties to approve the agreed modifications in Schedule IX. Cuba and the United States are, in the course of their tariff negotiations here, negotiating on the balance of the bound Cuban tariff rates which the Cubans want to withdraw.

9. Item 6—Status of Protocols. The Contracting Parties had been urged at all previous Sessions to sign all outstanding protocols, particularly those which had not yet entered into force. A resolution to that effect was passed at the last Session. The Contracting Parties on this occasion merely took note of the fact that certain protocols were still outstanding and received from delinquent countries reports on their intentions in this connection. There is reason to hope that all of the protocols established by the Contracting Parties to date will, in the relatively near future, be signed by all Contracting Parties: there does not appear to be any problem of substance in any one of them.

10. Item 7—Review of Import Restrictions and Second Report on Discriminatory Application of Restrictions. A lengthy debate took place in the plenary meeting on the Questionnaire (GATT/CP.5/5) which the Secretariat had prepared, under mandate, to obtain from Contracting Parties the information on their import restrictions and their discriminatory aspects (as required under Articles XII(4)(b) and XIV (1)(g).) It will probably be possible to obtain agreement on a practical Questionnaire on the basis of which a comprehensive report can be compiled. It is also clear, however, that a number of Contracting Parties are not willing to go one iota beyond the obligations to report imposed upon them by GATT.

11. Item 8—Consultations on Recent Changes in Import Programmes. This item is the most important and controversial issue to be dealt with at this Session. In order to avoid open debate in plenary, careful plans were laid to have this item referred to a working party without a long preliminary debate. Accordingly, this item was referred to a working party on which Canada is represented. We will be reporting its progress under separate cover. Countries whose import restrictions will be reviewed include the United Kingdom, Australia, Ceylon, India, Pakistan, New Zealand, Southern Rhodesia and Chile.

12. Item 9—Special Exchange Agreements. The Contracting Parties considered the position of five countries which had not yet joined the Fund or accepted a Special Exchange Agreement. Of these countries, Sweden, Burma and Indonesia indicated that their negotiations for membership in the Fund were now in an advanced stage. The position of Haiti is not yet clear, but they too had expressed a desire to join the Fund. New Zealand, however, is neither prepared to join the Fund nor to adhere to the Special Exchange Agreement as now drafted. New Zealand was required, by decision of the Contracting Parties at the Fourth Session, to sign this Agreement by November 2. New Zealand pointed to its special difficulties with respect to the Special Exchange Agreement and to the fact that the Contracting Parties were not yet in a position to administer such an Agreement. A number of countries, including the United Kingdom and Canada, expressed a sympathetic understanding of these special difficulties and urged that some compromise be sought. The United States was not prepared to give much ground. A Working Party has been established to examine the whole problem, with special reference to the New Zealand situation. It is expected that some compromise will be reached, whereby the Contracting Parties will revoke the decision requiring New Zealand's signature by the 2nd of November and also requiring as a minimum that New Zealand agree (a) not to frustrate by exchange action the intent and provisions of the General Agreement, and (b) to agree to consult with the Contracting Parties, at the request of any Contracting Party or the Contracting Parties, on any exchange problems which may arise. New Zealand had indicated informally its readiness to accept these two basic undertakings. Whether or not this compromise will be acceptable will depend very much on the attitude of the United States.

13. Item 10—Consideration of a Review of Quantitative Export Restrictions. This item is a hang-over from the Fourth Session and was placed on the Agenda by the Secretariat. There was considerable reluctance on the part of a number of Contracting Parties to engage in a survey of this kind at present: other Contracting Parties felt that a comprehensive report on export restrictions would be useful. It was decided, after a vote, to instruct the Secretariat to prepare a comprehensive report on export restrictions in force. To this end, the Secretariat will draft a questionnaire (seeking the necessary information from Contracting Parties) for the approval of the Contracting Parties. No decision has yet been taken as to the date on which the Secretariat questionnaire will be considered by the Contracting Parties.

14. Item 11—Examination, Under the Procedures Provided in Article XXIII, of Actual Cases of Quantitative Restrictions Applied for Protective Purposes. This item proposed by the Belgians is a further reflection of their long-standing and widespread dissatisfaction with the French and United Kingdom trade and tariff policy and controls. Unfortunately, as has been the case in the past, their presentation of this matter and their preparations proved to be less than adequate. Normally, the item would be discussed by the Contracting Parties after the submission of a Belgian paper on the subject. We understand, however, that the Belgians may very well withdraw this agenda item as a result of very strong pressure by the French and British. This is obviously an important question which should receive detailed consideration on the basis of full documentation. It does not appear, however, that the time has yet come to deal with this matter effectively.

15. Item 12—French Export Restrictions on Hides and Skins. This item, which was proposed by the United States, has not yet been discussed in the Contracting Parties. It now appears that the United States may have to withdraw it. They are not prepared to discuss it. Furthermore, they fear that if they do, the French might file a counter-complaint against their own export controls, particularly on cotton.

16. Item 13—Suggestions for Standard Practices to Minimize Commercial Uncertainty and Hardship under the Administration of Import and Export Licence and Exchange Controls. The United States have proposed that a set of rules for administering import and export licence and exchange controls be established by the Contracting Parties. As noted above (para. 4), it has been agreed, at the suggestion of Czechoslovakia, that these rules should also extend wherever appropriate to export controls. A lengthy discussion in the Contracting Parties indicated that there was general agreement as to the desirability of such rules, provided they were not of a mandatory character. A Working Party has been set up to consider the rules as proposed by the United States as a basis of discussion. It is clear that whatever rules emerge, they would only serve as an "agreed guide" for individual Contracting Parties.

17. Item 14—Article XVIII: Notifications of Existing Protective Measures. Three countries, Denmark, Haiti and Italy, which acceded to the Agreement as a result of the Annecy negotiations, have notified their use of existing protective measures under Article XVIII. These measures are being examined by a Working Party on which Canada is represented. We have no substantial trade interest in any of the products to which the measures apply. The case of Denmark has already been disposed of: it was agreed that their measures were in fact imposed for balance of payments reasons and consequently did not fall under Article XVIII. This does not imply any decision by the Contracting Parties on the justification of those measures. Moreover, if Denmark should at a subsequent date wish to apply these measures under the provisions of Article XVIII, it shall have to submit itself to the requirements of that Article. In the case of Haiti, the Working Party has agreed to recommend to the Contracting Parties that it be granted the right for a period of five years to impose quantitative restrictions on tobacco, cigars and cigarettes. Discussion on the measures notified by Italy has just begun. The commodities involved are: radio-electric equipment, synthetic organic dyestuffs and seed oils.

18. Item 15—Arrangements for the Continuing Administration of the General Agreement. This item, proposed by the Canadian Delegation, has not yet been discussed in the Contracting Parties. We are waiting for the psychological moment at which to present it. This will be later on in the Session when it has become clear that much of the detailed and time-consuming work assigned to a large number of working parties could more appropriately and more efficiently have been done between Sessions by a group of representatives. This group might be called the (Executive or) Continuing Committee of the Contracting Parties. It would appear from private conversations that there is a good deal of support for this proposal. We have been careful not to propose that the Continuing Committee should be given any powers of final decision; i.e., the results of its proceedings would be presented to the Contracting Parties by way of recommendations. We know that the Australians will oppose this proposal on the ground that the whole question of the "future of GATT" should not be handled piecemeal but rather should be dealt with perhaps at the next Session when Contracting Parties acting under Article XXIX come to consider (after it has become clear that no I.T.O. will emerge) "whether the Agreement shall be amended, supplemented, or maintained".

19. Item 16—Australian Subsidy on Ammonium Sulphate. Australia and Chile have informed the Contracting Parties that they have, in the course of the consultation recommended by the Contracting Parties at the Fourth Session, arrived at satisfactory agreement for the settlement of this problem. The details of this settlement will be circulated to the Contracting Parties in due course. This item, therefore, has been disposed of in a way which provides evidence of the value of GATT as a forum for the settlement of differences in the field of commercial policy.

20. Item 17—Brazilian Internal Taxes. This item appears on the agenda for the third consecutive Session. It will be recalled that at the Third Session Brazil was found to be in violation of Article III of the Agreement and that the Contracting Parties recommended to Brazil that it adjust certain of its internal taxes to conform with the provisions of the Agreement. Brazil reported at the Fourth Session that this matter was before the Brazilian Parliament and explained that the delay in adjusting this matter was due to the recent elections in Brazil. A Working Party has now been set up at the request of the Brazilian Delegation to examine the proposed legislation which is still before the Brazilian Parliament, and to advise whether it meets the requirements of Article III. The commodities involved are liquor, cigarettes and clocks, in which France and the United Kingdom have the leading interest.

21. Item 18—The effect of the United Kingdom Purchase Tax on Certain Imports into the United Kingdom, with Reference to Article III. This item was placed on the Agenda by the Netherlands which requests a decision by the Contracting Parties to the effect that the application by the United Kingdom of a purchase tax on certain imported goods, while comparable domestic goods are exempted from the tax, is an infringement of Article III of the Agreement. The United Kingdom have called for time. Consequently no debate has yet taken place.

It will be recalled that the discriminatory application of the United Kingdom purchase tax raises serious difficulties for Canada and that we have already made representations to the British to that effect. In the brief discussions which took place at the pre-Torquay Commonwealth meetings, Canada made it clear that this was a matter in which we had an important interest. We expressed the hope that this matter could be adjusted in a satisfactory way without the need for public debate in the Contracting Parties, but that if it should be discussed Canada would have to make its position clear. The United Kingdom indicated that they were aware that their practices were in violation of Article III and that they would re-examine their position and see what adjustments could be made. That is what they are doing now.

22. Item 19—The Scope of Articles XXV:5(b) and XXXV, with Reference to the Tariff Negotiations and the Prolongation of the Assured Life of the Existing Schedules. This item was placed on the Agenda at the request of Cuba. It is a proposal to amend the Agreement so that a Contracting Party which has not been able to conclude a satisfactory set of tariff negotiations with another Contracting Party may withhold the application of the Agreement in whole or in part from that Contracting Party. This proposal is directed mainly against the United Kingdom with whom Cuba has never been able to conclude a satisfactory negotiation. This matter has not yet been discussed in plenary meeting. It is our view that an amendment of this kind would lead to the fragmentation of the General Agreement and to a series of bilateral agreements: GATT should remain essentially multilateral.

23. Item 20—The Proposed European Coal and Steel Agreement. This item has not yet been discussed in the plenary meetings. Nor has it incited much excitement here. It appears to be generally agreed that it will not be possible to deal with this question conclusively at this Session unless some definitive proposal and arrangement emerges from the Schuman Plan discussions which are still proceeding in Paris. In private conversations with André Philip, he stated that he thought "that the final agreement would probably emerge from Paris about November 30". He realized that it would probably not be possible to dispose of this question at this Session. He considered, however, that a preliminary discussion might be useful some time before the end of this Session — to be supplemented by detailed documentation at a later stage in order to permit a decision to be taken by the Contracting Parties perhaps at a Special Session early next year. Philip was leaving for Paris last night, where he is to discuss with Monet the question of timing.

24. Item 21—Rectifications to Schedule XXVI. The Delegation of Haiti have proposed certain rectifications to their (Annecy) Schedule which arose as a result of an alleged error at Annecy. They have apparently come to some agreement with France with whom most of the items were initially negotiated. The United States have raised certain objections on the grounds that the proposed changes are more in the nature of modifications than simple rectifications. The problem has been referred to the Working Party on Tariff Schedules. Canada does not have a material interest in the proposed changes.

25. Item 22—Draft Agreement on the Importation of Insecticides. This item arises from a letter from the World Health Organization to the Contracting Parties seeking technical advice on a proposed agreement providing for "free importation of insecticides and equipment for the application of insecticides". A Working Party has been set up to prepare a reply to the W.H.O. embodying technical advice as to the feasibility of the agreement proposed and such improvements as would appear desirable in the procedure suggested.

26. Item 23—South Africa-Southern Rhodesia Customs Union. These two delegations have filed with the Contracting Parties, as required, the first Annual Report of the Council on the South African Customs Union. The South African representative described, in plenary meeting, the progress that had been made in the course of the last year towards a fuller customs union with Southern Rhodesia. It appears that the main effort to date has been directed to the achievement of a common tariff against third countries. Very little progress has been made towards the further elimination of tariff barriers between the two countries concerned. The Contracting Parties took note of the first annual report and the remarks of the South African Delegation and expressed the hope that in the course of the next year further progress would be made by way of eliminating tariff and other trade barriers between the members of the Customs Union. It was not felt necessary at this time to set up a working party in order to review the details of the first Annual Report. This presumably will have to be done at some later Session in order to determine whether the progress towards the completion of the Customs Union in the ten-year period approved by the Contracting Parties (at Annecy) is satisfactory.

27. Item 24—The Position of Indo-China in Relation to the Agreement. For obvious reasons this item, proposed by France, has not yet been discussed in the plenary meeting, nor has any documentation been issued. It was meant to permit discussion on the present status of Indo-China under the Agreement, in the light of the changes in Indo-China's relations with France. Further discussion at this Session is unlikely.

28. Item 25—Inclusion in the Agreement of Articles from Chapter II of the Havana Charter Dealing with Employment and Economic Activity. This is a proposal by Norway to incorporate Articles 2, 4 and 6 of Chapter II of the Havana Charter in the General Agreement. We took the position that the time had not yet come for the extensive modification of the General Agreement to conform with the Havana Charter by including piecemeal sections of the Havana Charter. The discussion in plenary indicated that there was a widespread feeling against extensive modification of the General Agreement at this time, but that, at some stage after the future of the I.T.O. is known, it would be necessary to review the whole of the Agreement under the terms of Article XXIX to see whether and what changes should be made. The Norwegian Delegation withdrew its proposal as a consequence of the discussions in the plenary meeting.

29. Item 26—Amendment of the Last Paragraph of Part II of Article XX to Correspond with Article 45 of the Havana Charter. Part II of Article XX excepts from the provisions of the Agreement, until January 1, 1951, any measures imposed for reasons of (a) acquisition or distribution of shortages, (b) price controls, or (c) liquidation of surpluses. Approval of the Contracting Parties is required after that date with respect to each measure. The Charter leaves the terminal date to be determined by the I.T.O. Members. After a long discussion in plenary meeting, this matter, which was proposed by the United Kingdom delegation, has been referred to a Working Party of which we are a member. At the one meeting held to date, it was generally agreed that (a), (b) and (c) of Part II should all be extended for the same period. The United Kingdom attempted unsuccessfully to treat (c) differently in the hope that no extension or a shorter extension might be agreed upon. The U.K. is making use of (a) and (b), whereas the U.S. are applying their import restrictions on butter under (c). The next meeting will try and resolve the problem on which no agreement has as yet been reached, namely, the date to which the extension should be granted. We have been forced to accept that the vast majority of Contracting Parties are not in favour of maintaining the Article as it stands: in any case it would be impossible at this Session to consider all individual applications which would be made for extension of existing measures. We are holding the line at January 1952, with a study, some time in 1951, of measures and need for extension beyond January 1952. The Americans support us in that position.

30. Item 27—The Continuation of the Trade News Bulletin. The Contracting Parties decided that the Trade News Bulletin should be continued, and a number of constructive suggestions were made for its improvement.

31. Item 28—Budget and Administrative Arrangements for 1951. A Working Party was established to examine the budget proposed by the Secretariat and to make recommendations for the allocation of contributions. It would appear that the total budget and the Canadian contribution will be somewhat higher for 1951 than for 1950, but not substantially higher.

32. Item 29—Date of Sixth Session. No discussion has as yet taken place on this matter.

33. Item 30—Assured Life of Tariff Concessions with Respect to Article XIX. This item was proposed by the Delegation of Czechoslovakia, which argues that the United States proposal to withdraw a Geneva concession, as is permitted under Article XIX (Emergency clause) is not in conformity with the terms and provisions of that Article and the spirit of the Agreement. In the plenary discussion France and Italy indicated in a rather mild way that this proposed action by the United States "would hinder their efforts to improve their dollar earnings". The United States made a long statement in justification of their action and agreed to consult with the affected Contracting Parties with a view to achieving an equitable solution. The other delegations concerned agreed to enter into such consultations with the United States. Czechoslovakia asked, and it was agreed, that the item be retained on the Agenda pending the outcome of these consultations.

34. A copy of this despatch has been sent to London, Paris (O.E.E.C. Mission and Embassy), Brussels, Rome, Prague, Copenhagen, Bonn, The Hague, Oslo, and Stockholm.

Le chef suppléant de la délégation auprès de l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy Chairman, Delegation to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Torquay, December 2, 1950

Sir,

Since our last report of November 16 was sent the important work of the Fifth Session of the Contracting Parties has been carried on in Working Parties rather than in plenary meetings. This despatch therefore will (a) report briefly on those Working Parties which have made recommendations to the Contracting Parties, and (b) indicate some recent developments of possible general interest and importance.

2. In the latter category, the centre of the stage at this Session continued to be held by the Working Party which is considering the import restrictions maintained by sterling area countries and Chile in the light of their balances of payments. At the outset there was some danger that the debate about the terms of reference of the International Monetary Fund vis-à-vis the Contracting Parties would be transferred from Washington to Torquay. This might well have led to endless and divergent interpretations of the words in the Agreement which are designed to provide for consultation, with the advice of the Fund, among the contracting parties with regard to import restrictions used to safeguard balances of payments. Much more heat than light would have been generated, of course, by a legalistic controversy over the scope of the Report prepared by the Fund and over the authority of the Contracting Parties formally to recommend, in the cases in question, the relaxation of import restrictions. Moreover, in the process the GATT would probably have been discredited as a useful international forum for the discussion of such important questions of commercial policy. This disturbing prospect, however, did not materialise. It was avoided by the application of a good deal of commonsense all around, and the nature of the discussion which evolved in the Working Party must be attributed to a significant extent to the firmness of the chairman in steering the debate away from legalistic wrangling towards a frank and friendly exchange of views on the real issue — whether in fact the countries concerned are now in a position to begin relaxing some of their import restrictions. The achievement of this aim was certainly promoted by the reasonable opening statement made by the Canadian representative. The discussion on the position of each of the countries concerned has now taken place and the report of the Working Party is being drafted. A fuller report on this subject will be sent separately.

3. Another important Working Party has been considering the Questionnaire composed by the Secretariat which was designed to elicit as much specific information as possible on restrictions still existing in 1951 for balance of payments reasons. As originally drafted, the Questionnaire came under criticism from those countries who use the balance of payments escape in the GATT to justify the maintenance of a wide range of restrictions. Thus the usefulness of the Questionnaire was queried in plenary on the ground that it was too complex, involved too much crystal-gazing, and was impracticable. Sir Stephen Holmes, speaking for the United Kingdom, remarked aptly enough and with some relish of his own sly wit, that the Questionnaire inevitably reminded him of a university examination paper except that the candidate was not given the option of selecting, say, three out of five questions but had to answer all sixteen. In any case, the task of the Working Party has devolved on a small drafting group on which we are represented, which will seek to modify the Questionnaire to make it generally acceptable and yet precise enough to require specific answers.

4. Four Working Parties of less general interest and importance have either wholly or partially completed their work. One considered the United Kingdom proposal to extend the provisions in the Agreement (Article XX, Part 2) which allow countries to take measures which might otherwise conflict with the terms of the Agreement, in order to combat shortages or liquidate surpluses resulting from the war. For example, the United Kingdom interprets the provision relating to shortages to allow her to mix sterling tobacco with imported Virginian tobacco because, she says, the Virginian tobacco is in short supply in England as a result of the war. The United Kingdom also uses this provision to channel scarce products to countries with which she has bi-lateral Trade Agreements, e.g., caustic soda to the Argentine. The United States, on the other hand, regards the provision relating to surpluses as a cover for her butter quota which, of course, mainly affects New Zealand.

5. In the Working Party, the United Kingdom, Norway and New Zealand argued that the provision relating to shortages should be extended for a longer period than the clause respecting surpluses which should be prolonged for only a year, if at all. After considerable circumlocution, it was decided to recommend that all the provisions in question should be extended for a year and that the measures taken under these should be closely examined at the next Session of the Contracting Parties. This recommendation was consistently supported by our representative in the Working Party and has now been approved by the Contracting Parties.

6. A second Working Party has been considering applications under Article XVIII for release from other provisions of the Agreement in order to promote economic development. As reported previously, the applications of Haiti and Denmark have been dealt with. After discussion, it appeared that the Italian measure respecting seed oils which is designed to protect the domestic olive oil industry would be permitted under Article III of the Agreement and this application was, therefore, withdrawn by Italy. With regard to the other Italian measures, i.e. quantitative restrictions to protect the domestic production of radio sets and synthetic organic dye-stuffs, the position is somewhat different. In these cases, both the United States and the United Kingdom consider that the application of quantitative restrictions for economic development would not be justified. In the circumstances, it appears that Italy may withdraw her application for release of these measures under Article XVIII, with the explanation that if they are inconsistent with the Agreement they will be replaced by other action permitted under the Agreement. The Contracting Parties have approved an interim report of the working party which deals with all the measures notified except the Italian applications respecting radio sets and dye-stuffs. Since there was little or no direct Canadian interest involved in the measures considered, our representative on the Working Party sought only to promote reasonable respect for the terms of the Agreement.

7. Still another Working Party has drawn up a code of recommendations designed to standardize as far as possible the administration of import and export restrictions so as to minimize hardship and uncertainty to traders. This code will have no binding force but may be regarded as a step in a useful direction. The report of this Working Party has been approved by the Contracting Parties.

8. Finally, the Budget for 1951 has been approved by the Contracting Parties. Our contribution for next year is $13,436.25 as compared with $13,252.15 for 1950. As you know, the staff of the Interim Commission for an International Trade Organization has, in the past, acted as the Secretariat for the Contracting Parties. In its ICITO capacity, the Secretariat has been partly financed by loans from the UN Working Capital Fund. In view, however, of the uncertainty about the establishment of the ITO, it has been agreed that it is no longer appropriate for the Secretariat to obtain funds from the UN and that all its expenses should, in the future, be borne by the Contracting Parties. In the circumstances, the Secretariat propose that a Working Capital Fund should be set up for the Contracting Parties. This proposal would, of course, involve an additional levy and it was decided that the whole matter should be examined at the next Session of the Contracting Parties.

9. A more permanent basis for the GATT is implied by the proposal for the establishment of a Working Capital Fund and this question is therefore related to the Canadian proposal for a Continuing Committee of the Contracting Parties. The United States Delegation is now showing considerable enthusiasm for our proposal and they have indicated, in strict confidence, that they intend to ask Congress for an appropriation for GATT when the Trade Agreements Act comes up for renewal next Spring. (At present the U.S. contribution comes out of an international organization contingency fund in the State Department appropriation). The proposed action by the United States would, of course, put the GATT on a more permanent footing as far as they are concerned, and appears tantamount to giving up for the time being at least the idea of ratifying the ITO. It is planned that our proposal shall be taken up in Plenary in the near future and referred to a Working Party.

10. Even an outline report of the recent work of this Session would be incomplete without some mention of the labours of the Legal Working Party, which has been producing and revising various versions of a Final Act, Decisions, a Protocol (with Annexes), and a Declaration. The purpose of all these instruments can be stated simply; it is to admit new members to the club and extend until January 1, 1954 the tariff concessions (as modified) negotiated at Geneva and Annecy together with the new concessions agreed on here. It would, however, appear to serve no useful purpose to attempt to trace the intricacies of the discussion in the Legal Working Party in this report.

11. We will, of course, keep you informed of further developments and will ask for instructions whenever important policy questions arise. (It now appears unlikely that the Schuman Plan will be considered at this Session and the question of extending M.F.N.[22] treatment to Japan has been formally postponed by its entire omission from the Agenda of this Session).

Le chef suppléant de la délégation auprès de l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy Chairman, Delegation to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Torquay, December 21, 1950

Sir,

Interim reports on the progress of the Fifth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade were contained in our despatches of November 16 and December 2. The Torquay meeting of "the sole existing international forum for the discussion of commercial policy questions on a world-wide basis" was held from November 2 to December 16. With this final despatch notes are enclosed† on each of the 31 agenda items together with a list of the countries and international bodies which were represented at the conference. In this covering despatch, brief reference is made only to those matters taken up at the conference which may be of special or general interest.

2. There is little more that can usefully be added, in a general way, to previous reports concerning the consultations over the maintenance of import restrictions by certain countries for balance of payments reasons. In essence, it would appear that the consultations had both a negative and a positive value. On the one hand, they were conducted so as to obviate a bitter and unproductive controversy over the role of the International Monetary Fund in the affairs of the GATT; and, also, to avoid a damaging deadlock over the authority of the Contracting Parties, acting jointly, to formally recommend the relaxation of import restrictions (possibly in the cases of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, and Southern Rhodesia). On the other hand, the discussions strengthened the positions of those members of the sterling area which favour the relaxation of dollar import restrictions. In addition, the consultations may have supplemented official opinion in the U.K. inclining towards some relaxation of restrictions.

3. The sensitiveness displayed by the U.K. over the consultations may have been to some extent a reflection of her exposure to economic pressures from inside and outside the sterling area. And such pressures may partly explain her resistance to assessments by the Contracting Parties, in consultation with the Fund, of the relation of her balance of payments to her import restrictions. The U.K. showed, during the consultations, marked antagonism towards the Fund. It may be relevant in this connection that the Agreement provides the Contracting Parties shall accept the determination of the Fund with regard to certain criteria on the movement and level of monetary reserves. These criteria, moreover, may constitute an important element in the view taken by the Contracting Parties as to the justification for maintaining balance of payments import restrictions. The role of the Fund is due to come up again at the next session since the Australian Delegation have announced that they will submit definite proposals on the procedure for the participation of the Fund in consultations at that time.

4. The relation of monetary reserves to trade restrictions may also arise at the next session when the Contracting Parties carry out a review of existing balance of payments import restrictions, including their discriminatory application. The questionnaire to be completed by governments on this subject is, however, designed to elicit only factual information and does not require appraisals of results achieved by restrictions or forecasts of changes in policy. The Secretariat has, nevertheless, been authorized, in effect, to obtain material from the Fund to supplement the answers received to the questionnaire. The deadline for the replies is June 17 — three months before the next session of the Contracting Parties at Geneva, September 17, 1951. On receipt of the questionnaire it will only be necessary for Canada to notify the Secretariat that Canadian import controls were removed on January 2, 1951 in view of Mr. Howe's announcement of December 15.

5. With regard to import and export restrictions still maintained for other than balance of payments reasons, the Secretariat has been authorized to ask governments to submit statements describing each measure of restriction, the products to which it is applied, the methods of restriction, and to include relevant statistics of trade in the products concerned. These replies are also required by June 17 and Canada will, of course, be expected to submit appropriate information including copies of laws, regulations, etc. regarding those export restrictions in force at the time the inquiry is formally received. It was, however, made quite clear that governments would not be expected to furnish information which they would not wish to supply on security grounds.

6. The session provided an opportunity for making further progress towards a satisfactory settlement of a commercial matter which has been of direct and immediate interest to Canada, i.e., the discriminatory aspect of the U.K. system of exempting a wide range of utility goods from purchase tax which is nevertheless levied on comparable imported goods. This matter was raised by the Netherlands delegation and Sir Stephen Holmes, in an unusually forthcoming statement, admitted that the effect — though not the objective — of the utility system was discriminatory. He said that the U.K. government are working on a solution of the problem and they "are very hopeful that it will be possible for the discrimination, with no very great further delay, to be removed."

7. The Canadian representative, whose remarks followed Sir Stephen's statement, referred to the burden of discrimination created by the utility system against Canadian manufacturers in general and the Canadian rubber footwear industry in particular. He stated that since the Canadian government first took the matter up in London much time had elapsed while alternative methods of solution were being considered in the U.K. While agreeing that the matter should be retained on the agenda for the sixth session, he concluded by expressing confidence, in the light of the U.K. statement, that there would be no need to discuss it and the hope that a solution would be acted upon in the very near future.

8. Another matter of special interest to Canada, and also of wide general interest, was the Canadian proposal regarding the continuing administration of the Agreement. Some members of the working party set up to consider the proposal stated that they were not in a position to commit their governments in any respect in regard to a standing committee. The subject was therefore discussed solely with a view to indicating what type of standing committee would be likely to promote the effective administration of the Agreement if and when such committee were established.

9. After discussion, the working party unanimously adopted a comprehensive and useful report including recommendations respecting the terms of reference, composition and method of selection of a standing committee. The report stated that the working party had come to the conclusion (without prejudice to the reservations already mentioned) that "a standing committee could serve a useful purpose by contributing to the efficient administration of the Agreement." The Contracting Parties took note of the report of the working party and agreed that it should be submitted to governments for further study.

10. You are no doubt fully familiar with the background circumstances which influenced the consideration given to the proposal for a standing committee. In this connection, however, it may be of some use to record briefly several of the salient factors. At the outset there was opposition from the less-important trading countries arising out of their fear that they would have no voice in a powerful executive committee which, if set up, would arrogate powers of decision now resting with the Contracting Parties in full session. This fear was, to a significant extent, dispelled by the working party's objective study of the functions that a standing committee could perform.

11. A more far-reaching issue, however, in connection with the Canadian proposal was raised by the decision of the U.S. administration not to re-submit the ITO Charter to Congress but to ask Congress "to consider legislation which will make American participation in the General Agreement more effective." This development brought close to the surface a basic problem which never seems very deeply submerged in the GATT, namely, the situation created by the rather wide difference of emphasis which is evident among governments in regard to the fundamental aims of the Agreement, i.e., the reduction of tariffs and the eventual elimination of other restrictions and controls on trade. The most striking illustration of this divergent approach is probably provided by the U.S. and the U.K. Whereas the U.S. administration now seems prepared to take measures to strengthen the Agreement, the U.K. government rigidly instructed its delegation not to go beyond the commitments already entered into under the Agreement. This means, of course, that the U.K. is unwilling at this time to consider favourably any revision of the arrangement which provides that important Articles in the Agreement have no legal force when they are inconsistent with "existing legislation." It appears possible that the whole question of the future of the Agreement (and perhaps, in addition, the Schuman Plan and extension of M.F.N. treatment to Japan) may be discussed at the next session in September.

12. Though the U.S. as a leading proponent of freer trade is a much stronger supporter than the U.K. of the positive principles embodied in the Agreement, she does, of course, occasionally display atavistic tendencies. A case in point at this session was perhaps provided by the withdrawal, under the most extreme escape clause in the Agreement, of a previous U.S. tariff reduction on the importance of fur felt hat bodies. That clause (Art. XIX) provides, among other things, for the emergency withdrawal of tariff concessions without prior consultation if, through unforeseen developments, increased imports are causing or threatening serious injury to domestic producers. The Czechoslovakian delegation claimed that the U.S. had no right to use the escape clause in this case, primarily because serious injury to domestic producers was not caused or threatened by the imports in question.

13. The contention of the Czechoslovakian delegation will be examined by an inter-sessional working party on which Canada is not represented. The working party is obviously confronted with a thorny task and its report will, no doubt, be awaited with interest. Whether or not, however, there are substantial grounds for a debate on the legal aspect of this U.S. action, it seems unfortunate, from the point of view of the operation of the Agreement and the prestige of the leading participating nation, that the U.S. should have found it necessary to resort to the widest escape clause in respect of such an essentially picayune matter (particularly in a period of great economic prosperity) as the importation of fur felt hat bodies. There are, of course, many aspects to the matter but, nevertheless, it provided a sharp contrast to the repeated emphasis of such public figures as Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Gray, and Mr. Acheson that the U.S. must take steps to encourage imports to enable other countries to pay for U.S. exports.

14. Finally, reference should perhaps be made to the brochure "Standard Practices for Import and Export Restrictions and Exchange Controls", which will be released on December 27. You will already have received copies by air mail of this pamphlet, which contains recommendations designed "to reduce to a minimum the uncertainties and hardships to merchants resulting from the changing and unpredictable operation of trade controls." As you will probably have noticed, the recommendations are neither as striking nor lucid as they might be. It is thought desirable, however, to draw the brochure to your attention since it will shortly be available to the press. In this connection, it might be added that by January 1 all the decisions and resolutions of the Contracting Parties to date will have been derestricted and therefore available to the public either through application to the various governments or by writing to the Documents Officer, ICITO, at Geneva.

Following from McNamara, Begins: [Frank] Hollins, United Kingdom delegate to the Council, called an informal meeting yesterday at which United States and Australian representatives as well as ourselves were present, to outline United Kingdom position on the accession of Germany and Japan. He said that Ministers had decided that since the USSR and Argentina did not appear willing to join the International Wheat Agreement, the accession of two such large importers would tip the present balance of the agreement in favour of the exporters. Their membership would mean increased competition for agreement wheat which would tend to keep the price up. In addition, if either or both of the new countries took more than five million bushels of Australian wheat (the figure now under consideration for Australia) it would decrease the present supply of non-dollar wheat for other importers. Hollins indicated that the United Kingdom and other importers were seriously concerned with the present working of the Agreement. Prices, he said, were being held at the maximum, irrespective of the laws of supply and demand. He concluded by stating that while the United Kingdom in principle favoured the admission of Germany and Japan to international technical agreements, including the IWA their position at Thursday's meeting would be to endeavour to have the Council recognize that accession of the two countries at the present time would present a real economic problem to the United Kingdom, and that it would, therefore, not be possible to support their membership until a real attempt had been made to meet the economic difficulties foreseen. The suggestion was that before voting on accession, the Council should try to negotiate some sort of arrangement which would assist the United Kingdom in its economic problem. The United Kingdom said it would only be prepared to vote for accession if its own position was not worsened by the entry of the two new members. Questioned as to what they had in mind that might assist their position, Hollins had no positive proposal to put forward, but expressed the hope that some other country would come up with a solution.

2. We are not sure at this stage how serious the United Kingdom is in stating that they will oppose admission, nor are we clear what quid pro quo is expected from the exporters. It may be that what they have in mind is agreement by Canada and Australia to restrict sales to the two countries concerned, or agreement to reduce prices below the maximum. Subject to your judgment, we propose to await further developments after [Stanley] Andrews, the Chief United States delegate, arrives today. On the whole, we consider that to agree either to reduce prices below the maximum at this time, or to restrict sales to any signatory importer, is not a proper matter for discussion by the Council meeting, and that accession of Germany and Japan should be considered on their merits.

3. We understand that the United Kingdom also met yesterday with other importers, presumably to concert the line to be taken on Thursday. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Reference my telegram No. 43, January 10th, International Wheat Council, admission of Japan and Germany.
Following from McNamara, Begins: At a meeting to-day of the exporters, [Sir Edwin] McCarthy, the Australian representative, said he had heard from Hollins (United Kingdom) that one of the importers, speaking for a group of importers, had suggested to the United Kingdom that a solution to their economic problem with respect to the admission of Germany and Japan might be for the sterling exporters to agree not to sell to either Germany or Japan a quantity of wheat in excess of the amount by which their present guaranteed quantities are increased by the two accessions. The United Kingdom has referred this proposal to Ministers for consideration.

2. To our surprise, McCarthy indicated that he would be prepared to recommend this solution to his Government provided: (a) that flour sales would not be affected; and (b) that the proviso would not operate at the floor price. His feeling was that the undertaking, together with the two reservations, should be embodied in the Council resolution approving membership for Germany and Japan.

3. McNamara, supported by the United States representative, took the line that while an arrangement of the kind proposed might be agreed outside the Council between the soft currency countries concerned, it had no place in a Council resolution since it cut directly across the underlying principles of the agreement and of multilateral trading practices.

4. Unless we hear from you to the contrary, we will maintain this position when the Council meets to-morrow morning.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Reference my telegram No. 62 of January 11th and your No. 53 of January 12th,† International Wheat Council admission of Germany and Japan.
Following for [sic] McNamara, Begins: At this morning's meeting, the Greek representative, supported by India, put forward the proposal outlined in my telegram under reference. The United Kingdom intimated that this sort of a solution might be acceptable to Ministers, and the Australian representative said he would be prepared to recommend it to his Government provided that flour sales would not be affected and that the scheme would not operate at the floor price. We stated our objections in principle to the solution (see my telegram No. 69)† and were supported by the United States, although Andrews was less firm in his position than ourselves. No progress was made in reconciling the divergent views, and a working party, consisting of the United Kingdom, United States, Australia, Greece, India and Canada was set up to examine the question and attempt to find an acceptable compromise. The group met privately this afternoon, and the following alternatives were considered:

(1) To allow Japan and Germany to enter the agreement with no conditions concerning the amount of wheat they could purchase from non-dollar exporters.

In our view this is the best solution, but it is not, repeat not, acceptable to the United Kingdom and some of the other importers.

(2) A confidential arrangement might be concluded between Australia on the one hand and the United Kingdom and other interested importers on the other, under which Australia would agree to limit its sales to the new entrants. This arrangement would not be brought formally to the attention of the Council.

At the present time the United Kingdom is not prepared to agree to this solution and Australia feels that its position vis-à-vis Japan would be invidious since Japan might approach them for additional supplies at the maximum price but Australia would be bound by a secret arrangement not to supply. If a restriction is agreed Australia would wish to be covered by a Council resolution to which it could refer. If the solution outlined in (1) above cannot be obtained (as appears likely) the solution in (2) might be the best compromise from our point of view, since in no way would we appear to have condoned the arrangement.

(3) It has been suggested that the importer's position might be met simply by having an Australian statement included in the record of the Council, to the effect that the supplies of non-dollar wheat to present agreement importers would not be reduced by the accession of Germany and Japan.

The Australian position on this proposal is the same as for (2) above, as they wish to have whatever action is to be taken formally endorsed by the Council. As far as we are concerned, this solution would appear to be undesirable, since the understanding would be recorded in the minutes, but less undesirable than the proposals outlined in (4) and (5) below.

(4) To make the entry of Japan and Germany conditional on their agreeing not to purchase from non-dollar suppliers any amount of wheat in excess of the quantity by which the guaranteed sales of such suppliers are increased by the two accessions.

This is the proposal which finds greatest favour with the United Kingdom, interested importers, and Australia. They argue that this is a condition of entry and not a restrictive arrangement, and that such a condition of entry was envisaged in Article XXI (lines 3 and 4). We have maintained the position that this proposal would constitute Council endorsement of a restrictive arrangement which is entirely contrary to the underlying principles of the agreement.

(5) The Greek resolution.

"That the accession of Germany and Japan to the International Wheat Agreement be approved on condition that the total quantity of wheat sold by any one of the non-dollar wheat exporting countries to Germany and Japan under the Agreement in any crop year shall not exceed the amount by which the guaranteed sales of that exporting country have been increased as a result of Germany's and Japan's accession".

All support for this resolution has been transferred to (4) above.

2. The present position is that Working Party members are putting these various proposals to their Governments in order of preference, with the request for instructions by tomorrow morning.

3. McCarthy of Australia has asked the United States and Canadian representatives to ascertain whether, if the Australian Government is agreeable to solution (4), their Government could support it. As previously indicated, we are opposed to this solution. Nevertheless, we are concerned that, in the event of United States agreement, Canada would be placed in the position of alone opposing admission of the two countries. The United Kingdom delegation has indicated informally, but beyond doubt, that they will endeavour to pin responsibility for non-admission, if this is the outcome, on the exporters, or on whichever exporter does not meet their condition. In this regard, I understand that they have today been approached by Clutterbuck.

4. Subject to your instructions, and if the United States decides to back solution (4) or its equivalent, we propose, when the question is put to the vote, to abstain rather than exercise our veto, and to accompany our abstention with a statement indicating that our inability to vote for the admission of the two countries arises entirely from the undesirable conditions attached by the United Kingdom and the other importers to their accession. We hope, of course, that agreement will be reached tomorrow morning on a more acceptable solution.

5. Please let me have your instructions before 10:00 a.m. GMT tomorrow, Friday, the thirteenth. Ends.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: The Secretary of State telephoned late this afternoon to say that he was instructing Steinhardt to take up with you urgently tomorrow the differences which have arisen in the Wheat Council over the admission of Germany and Japan. He said that there were two burning issues, one of which did not concern Canada; this related to the request of the United Kingdom that Australia should not sell wheat in excess of their quota to Germany and Japan, a matter which Acheson thinks ought to be settled outside the Wheat Council.

2. Canada, he said, was the centre of the other row, which concerned the increase in the Canadian and Australian quotas consequent upon the admission of Germany and Japan. He said that the United States' member had already stated that an increase of seven million bushels to Canada and three million to Australia was acceptable. They now, however, recognized that this was inadequate and they were ready to agree to bringing the figures up to fifteen million and four million respectively. Australia was satisfied, but the Canadian member had asked for twenty-eight million, while implying we would settle for twenty-six million but not less.

3. Acheson said the problem for the United States arose from the fact that throughout the lifetime of the Wheat Agreement the United States would have to furnish the cash to buy the wheat for these two countries. He thought it would be impossible to persuade Congress and the farming community that the Canadian quota should be increased beyond fifteen millions. He also thought that, if the Canadian member voted against the admission of Germany and Japan on the grounds that the Canadian quota was inadequate (as he has apparently implied), the repercussions would be serious in view of the desirability of restoring, piece by piece, the two countries to their place in international life.

4. He said that the vote was due to be taken tomorrow morning, but that the United States were asking for postponement for further consideration. I am too ignorant of the issues to form a judgment on the merits, but I promised him that I would bring to your notice his personal concern over the situation in the midst of all the other problems with which he is coping. He is thinking of asking the Secretary of Agriculture to telephone to Mr. Gardiner on the matter, and I encouraged him in this suggestion. Ends.

Following for McNamara from Mackenzie. After consulting McIvor[23] and Acting Minister Garson we still share your original view that this matter should not be dealt with by conditional entry but should be handled by direct negotiation between United Kingdom and Australia. However over-riding consideration is that Germany and Japan be admitted to Agreement. Secondly it should not be allowed to be made to appear that Canada is opposing their admission.

2. With these considerations in mind would like to see solution in terms you suggest but if United Kingdom proves adamant and can enlist United States support you should agree in the last analysis to terms of proposal number four which you say finds greatest favour with the United Kingdom interested importers and Australia. We assume from your cable that United States may agree to British proposal and we know an urgent message has been despatched by the British to Washington. If United States resists British proposal strongly we should jointly seek some more satisfactory solution.

George H. McIvor, Chief Commissioner of Canadian Wheat Board.

3. Your proposal to abstain from voting and then explain abstention may be the best tactical course. We will leave it to you to decide but having in mind the importance that Canada should not be represented as opposing admission of Germany and Japan you might consider moving an amendment to remove the conditions from terms of accession in proposal four. This amendment would undoubtedly be defeated but you could make our position clear by then supporting the main motion. Alternatively you could vote for accession but make a statement after the vote making clear that Canada favours accession but regrets making such conditions a part of the Agreement.

4. We have just learned that United States delegation may ask for postponement of accession vote until allocation of increased quotas among exporters has been agreed. We anticipate direct representations in this regard from United States Embassy tomorrow morning. Will advise you soon as possible but unless you hear from us further, quantity question still in your hands and your present instructions stand.

Repeat Washington EX-72.

1. As mentioned in our telegram No. 66 of January 12th, Mr. Steinhardt called on Mr. Heeney today at 5:00 p.m. to discuss the quantity issue.

2. Mr. Steinhardt explained the political difficulties which the Administration faces with Congress over the whole question of American foreign aid. He pointed out the embarrassment to the Administration in yielding to other exporters quantities which the United States have undertaken to finance. Consequently, with those difficulties in mind, it was decided at Cabinet level in Washington that Canada be allocated 15 million bushels and Australia four out of the total Germany-Japan quantity.

3. On our side, we reiterated our strong desire to have Germany and Japan accede to the Agreement. We made clear, however, that our own political difficulties would be no less serious if we were to agree to an arbitrary figure below 230. This figure had been arrived at after protracted and highly technical negotiations in I.W.C. circles over a period of years. It has acquired an historical and political significance in Canada. We explained that the reduction to 203 millions had been arrived at on a pro rata basis which should be applied in allocating the increased quantity. We emphasized the desirability of conducting quantity discussions through our representatives on the Council. Mr. Steinhardt, in view of the instructions he had to raise the issue in Ottawa, was not prepared to leave the discussions entirely on that basis.

4. Appreciating the necessity of avoiding an impasse, Mr. Steinhardt proposed to seek more latitude on the quantity from his authorities. He will advise us probably tomorrow. If we are pressed we may have to put any such new proposal to Cabinet.

5. Mr. Steinhardt also had the impression that Australia was not firm in its request for an increased quantity and that Canada might then be able to pick up four or five millions in that way. We replied that this was contrary to all advices we had from you but that we would raise the question with you in the possibility that there may have been new developments.

6. Unless you hear from us to the contrary, you are still under your existing instructions on quantities. It is important to keep the Council meeting alive in the hope of an early agreement on quantities although daily adjournments may be necessary.

Following from McNamara, Begins: Thank you for your prompt replies to our various messages. The meeting has now adjourned until Monday to allow time for further consultation on the terms of the accessions of Japan and Germany, and for further negotiations on the division of the Germany-Japan quantities. I have indicated to the United States informally that in any circumstances we would not be prepared to go below 228 million bushels (Andrews himself has tentatively mentioned this figure). My own feeling is that in the end the United States will meet us on this amount. As regards the extra quantity for Australia, Andrews (United States) hopes the Australians will agree to take three rather than five million extra bushels, but McCarthy (Australia) will, I think, hold out for four million. It should be noted that any concession which the Australians make below the five million bushel level would not be in our favour. McCarthy will only agree to a reduction in the Australian quantity as a result of the small concession (230 to 228), which we are prepared to make to the United States.

2. As regards the admission of Germany and Japan, the position is less clear. Although the United Kingdom is maintaining its position that some guarantee must be given to itself and other importers which would ensure their present supplies of non-dollar wheat, it is now rumoured, repeat rumoured, that their insistence on this understanding being embodied in a resolution of the Council is weakening. In this connection the United States is apparently putting considerable pressure on the Foreign Office. Ends.

Reference my telegram No. 95, January 16th.† International Wheat Agreement. Following for Mackenzie from McNamara, Begins: As regards the possible conditions for the admission of Germany and Japan, the following is the present position: United States will continue to press for accession without conditions concerning the supply to importers of non-dollar wheat and will endeavour to have the United Kingdom agree that any arrangement about non-dollar wheat should be on the basis of an exchange of letters outside the Council. If such agreement proves impossible, we suspect that in the final analysis the United States will support Alternative No. 4, or even the Greek resolution, Alternative No. 5 (my telegram No. 71, January 12th). Before doing this, however, they will insist one way or another on a vote on accession without the non-dollar wheat condition.

2. The Australian position is now clearer. McCarthy has authority to give a written undertaking to the United Kingdom that it would have first refusal of Australian wheat. However, if the United Kingdom did not accept this offer, which seems likely, Australia would feel free to sell to the new entrants. Australia is at the present time opposed to any understanding on the supply of non-dollar wheat being embodied in a Council resolution. McCarthy will support unconditional accession, but if this is defeated and he is satisfied that the United States and Canada would eventually support either Alternatives 4 or 5, he would be prepared to recommend a similar course to his Government.

3. In accordance with your instructions, we are still pressing for unconditional accession for both countries, but have confidentially advised the United States and Australia that if this is defeated we will not vote against the accession, and will either support it with the conditions of Alternative 4 or 5, or will abstain, depending on the tactical position at the time.

4. On the basis of the above assessment of the exporters position, it would appear that the accession of Germany and Japan will be approved at this meeting.

5. As regards the division of the extra quantity which Japan and Germany would bring into the agreement, we are maintaining the position outlined in my telegram under reference. However, I am becoming increasingly concerned that the United Kingdom will be able to derive tactical advantage on the question of the admission of Germany and Japan from the failure of the exporters to agree on quantities. At an informal meeting this morning of exporters only, we again tackled this question, but little progress was made, partially because the position of the Ottawa-Washington negotiations was not known. In an endeavour to resolve this matter, and feeling that further delay would be to Canada's disadvantage, I tentatively on a personal basis asked Andrews whether he would consider recommending to Washington, if I recommended similarly to you, that agreement be reached on the basis that for this year the Canadian total be agreed at 220 million bushels, and that for the remaining years our total be 230 million bushels. In making this suggestion I had in mind that, because of the supply position, we would not be in a position to take advantage of the full guaranteed sale figure this year, and that our real concern is about our position in later years. McCarthy of Australia immediately stated that if it would assist in any way Australia would be prepared to forego the extra five million they had been requesting for this crop year, but would require a figure of 85 million bushels as its guaranteed sales for the following years. Andrews showed some interest in the suggestion I conveyed, but proposed that we should agree to stay at 220 million for this year and next year as well. I did not accept this, nor would I be prepared to recommend it. After the meeting, Andrews told me privately that he would discuss my suggestion with Washington this afternoon. (While realizing that my proposal is against the position which Canada has consistently maintained that quantities must be the same for all countries in each year, I felt that a compromise of this nature might ease the tension that has grown up between the United States and ourselves).

6. An alternative suggestion put forward by Andrews was that we should agree to the accession of Germany and Japan now but defer the whole question of the division of the extra quantity amongst the exporters, simply giving a guarantee that the major proportion of the supplies involved would be available from North America. He envisaged that we should have further discussions to resolve our mutual differences within the next few weeks, and if this failed the matter should go to the Council to be decided under the terms of the agreement. We do not like this suggestion as the manner in which the Council would decide on the division of quantities is not clearly spelt out in the agreement and there is a possibility that any necessary vote might only be by a simple majority. Since leaving the meeting Andrews has again been in touch with me and has urged that Canada agree to a total of 220 million bushels this year on the understanding that the division of quantities for the last three years of the agreement be postponed pending further negotiations. In addition, he stated that he would be prepared to make a statement in the Council to the effect that as far as the United States was concerned Canada's agreement to accept 220 this year would not be considered as a precedent for the further negotiations envisaged. I cannot help feeling that this suggestion is open to the same objections as a deferment of the whole question of quantities and that, moreover, acceptance by us of 220 now without some guarantee about further years would prejudice our future position in spite of any statement which Andrews might make for the record.

7. The exporters are meeting this afternoon at 5:00 G.M.T., and together we may meet the United Kingdom afterwards. I should appreciate any further instructions you may have before this, either by cable or by telephone to Canada House. I would like to know in particular:

(a) The position with respect to quantities consequent on your talks with Washington;

(b) Whether you see any merit in my tentative proposal, paragraph 5 above, and, if so, whether I am authorized to put it forward officially;

(c) Your views on Andrews' proposals for a deferment of the whole quantity question, or, alternatively, our agreement to 220 for this year and deferment of a decision on the remaining three years. Ends.

Following for McNamara from Mackenzie, Begins: Regret your No. 106 received too late for reply before your five o'clock meeting.

2. Have now discussed your message with Garson, Gardiner and McIvor and you are authorized to put forward as a formal offer your proposal of 220 this year to be followed by 230 in the remaining three years.

3. We feel it most desirable that final settlement should be reached now rather than any postponement of discussion of quantities to a later date — either the whole quantity question or the quantities for future years.

4. Andrews' proposal of 220 for two years not fully discussed with Ministers but opposed by McIvor.

5. There have been no formal or official discussions with the Americans on this side other than Steinhardt's visit to Heeney.

6. Clutterbuck's Deputy, Shannon, to-day called on me to advise that, despite rumours to the contrary, British decision to insist on conditional entry was firm and they saw no chance of any change in that position. We are, however, pleased to note change in Australian position and there appears to be no need for any change in your instructions in this regard.

7. Throughout these discussions we have assumed that United States proposal of extra 15 is to be added to 203 of the signed quantities, making 218. We assume that when you speak of 220 or 230 you are also talking of signed quantities. It is our understanding that when this is converted to ratified quantities there will be a reduction of between 6 and 7 million bushels, so that 203 becomes 196 and 230 becomes 223. In the earlier discussions with Mr. Howe it was presumably assumed that the quantity would be 230 in fact. The 6 or 7 million bushel shortfall should be an added argument in our favour. Ends.

Reference your telegram No. 79, January 17th. International Wheat Agreement. Following for Mackenzie from McNamara, Begins: In a last minute effort to resolve the quantity question, Andrews and I met privately this morning. We have agreed to recommend to our respective Governments a solution on the following basis: of the increased quantity brought into the agreement by Germany and Japan, Canada's share for this year will be nineteen million bushels and in each of the following years of the Agreement will be twenty-seven million bushels. I think this is a satisfactory arrangement, and represents better treatment than we would have received had the decision on quantities been referred to the Full Council. McCarthy, the Australian representative, has confirmed his willingness to forego any additional quantity for this year arising from the accession of the two new members. However, it is anticipated that the Australian quantity will be increased by five million bushels in the remaining years of the contract.

2. I strongly recommend the above compromise both on its merits and because of the danger of any further delay, and would appreciate it if you could indicate your approval or otherwise by Most Immediate telegram before 4 p.m. GMT today, when exporters are scheduled to meet with the United Kingdom and interested importers. 1. The Council met today, and after the Chairman had reported that the differences separating the countries mainly concerned with the admission of Germany and Japan, had not yet been resolved, it was agreed to adjourn until 11 a.m. Saturday.

Admission of Germany and Japan

2. There have been one or two new developments since my previous messages. We understand that United Kingdom officials have now recommended to Ministers that they accept an undertaking by Japan and Germany in separate letters to the Council to the effect that they will not buy wheat from non-dollar exporters in excess of the amount by which such exporters' guaranteed sales are increased by their respective accessions. We are informed by the United States delegation that the German Government is prepared to supply such a letter, but that SCAP has so far been holding out for absolutely unconditional accession. If SCAP were to agree to supply a letter in the above terms, there might be some hope for unanimous agreement between exporters and importers, were it not for the firm instructions which McCarthy, the Australian delegate, has now received. The Australian position now is that they would be prepared, as previously, to offer the United Kingdom first refusal for Australian wheat, but that they definitely cannot accept either in a Council resolution or otherwise, an arrangement which would limit Australian freedom of action under the agreement. (This freedom would in effect of course be limited whether or not the undertaking about non-dollar wheat was given by Germany or Japan or by Australia, and whether or not in a Council resolution or in letters from Germany or Japan). The danger in this position is that Australia might vote against the accession of the two countries, even with an exchange of letters between Germany and Japan and the Council about non-dollar wheat, whereas we would be able to vote in favour and the United States and Great Britain might take similar positions. If the voting went this way, it would be open to Australia to protest that her freedom of action under the agreement had been restricted contrary to her wishes as a result of the voting strength of her two export competitors.

Quantities

3. The United States has neither officially accepted nor rejected the proposal outlined in my telegram under reference, but is maintaining the position that the question of quantities can be treated separately from the accession of the two countries, and could be decided later either by agreement amongst the exporters or by the Council. I have indicated to Andrews that I will strongly oppose on the floor of the Council any deferment of the decision on quantities, and have impressed on him that Canada has already gone as far as could possibly be expected. I have reason to believe that the United Kingdom will support us in insisting that the division of quantities be not deferred.

4. On both the quantity question and on the two accessions the position of other exporters and the United Kingdom may well change before Saturday. I will keep you informed of any important developments, but in the meantime am well satisfied with my present instructions.

1. The Council met today and, as a result of a report from the Working Party, which had been unable to resolve the differences separating the main countries concerned, agreed to adjourn until reconvened at the discretion of the Executive Committee, and in any case not later than thirty days from today.

2. Prior to the Council meeting this morning, the Working Party met to see whether it would be possible to proceed to a vote on the admission of Germany and Japan. The United States representative stated that his present instructions would not permit him to vote for any other than unconditional accession for the two countries, and that the question of quantities would have to be resolved before vote on accession became effective. He recognized that unconditional accession for both countries would not be acceptable to the United Kingdom, and in any case the quantity question had not been settled as between Canada and the United States. He said that unless the other countries could meet the United States position, his instructions were to avoid voting for or against, or even abstaining, on compromise proposals, and that it would be necessary for him to withdraw from the meeting. There were, he said, internal differences of opinion in Washington on both the conditional entry of Germany and Japan, and on the question of quantities, and he doubted whether he would be in a position to participate in the Council meeting in a satisfactory manner until these had been overcome. Andrews was most apologetic and was clearly deeply embarrassed by the position he was forced to take.

3. The United Kingdom position was that with respect to Germany they were prepared to vote for unconditional accession, having in mind the letter which the Germans are prepared to send to the Council indicating that they will not endeavour to purchase from Australia and France any more wheat than the guaranteed sales of these countries are increased by Germany's accession. As regards Japan, the United Kingdom was not satisfied with the statement which SCAP is now prepared to supply, saying that Japan will understand any arrangements which might be made between the United Kingdom and Australia for the protection of United Kingdom supplies of non-dollar wheat. This being the case, they would insist on a provision being inserted in the resolution on Japan's accession which would oblige Japan not to buy more wheat from Australia and France than these countries' guaranteed sales were increased by Japan's accession.

4. The Australian position is that McCarthy must vote against anything but unconditional accession. The Australians are, however, aware that they could be voted down if a solution were found which was agreeable to Canada and the United States on the one hand, and the United Kingdom and interested importers on the other.

5. As a result of a brief discussion in the Working Party on the various points of view, and having regard in particular to the United States position, it became clear that little purpose would be served by proceeding to vote on Japan and Germany without United States participation, and that the best thing to do would be to recommend adjournment to the Council and, as noted above, this was the action taken.

6. It would appear that consultation will now be necessary between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, and perhaps Australia in an endeavour to find within the next few weeks a mutually agreeable formula for the accession of Germany and Japan, and that talks will be necessary between Ottawa and Washington on the question of quantity.

7. McNamara is returning to Winnipeg by air today, and will be in touch with Mr. Mackenzie on Monday.

RE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

1. As a result of the meeting in Ottawa on March 3 between Secretary Brannan[24] and Ministers Howe and Gardiner it was agreed that out of the quantities directly involved in the anticipated German and Japanese accessions Canada would have no share in the 1949-50 crop year; twelve million bushels in the 1950-51 crop year; twenty-four million bushels in the 1951-52 crop year; and twenty-seven million bushels in the 1952-53 crop year. No suggestions were made by the Americans on the shares they were prepared to agree with Australia, but it was agreed that the Canadian quantity would not be disclosed until the March 13 meeting of the Council.

2. With the quantity issue between Canada and the United States settled there appears to be little need for anyone to go from Canada to London for the March 13 meeting. Certainly this would be the case if the Americans do not propose to send anyone from Washington which we will confirm later. Accordingly unless there is any change of plan the Council Secretary should be advised that Biddulph[25] will serve as Canadian delegate for this meeting, [A.E.] Ritchie as alternative if [J.H.] Warren is not available, and Boxer[26] as adviser. Naming the Canada House representative as alternate will permit him to speak if debate arises on the political aspects of the accessions.

3. No discussion took place between Secretary Brannan and our ministers on the issue of unconditional accession. The issue should be dealt with first by the Council, and until it is dealt with our position on quantities should be that there are no differences between the Americans and ourselves and that the actual position will be made known when the vote on accession is taken. Our position on accession is that we favour unconditional accession with the German Government and the Japanese authorities free to act autonomously within the terms of the agreement as outlined and subject to my telegram No. 1939 of November 2, 1949, and also my telegram No. 45 of January 10, 1950.[27] To meet the British position, however, we would not be opposed to the tabling by the Council of letters from the German Government and the Japanese authorities that they will confine their purchases from non-dollar exporters to such increases as are made in the quantities of the non-dollar export countries as a result of the accessions. The tabling of such letters addressed to the chairman of the Council should require no formal action by the Council thereby avoiding any vote on the tabling. The Council resolution covering accession should then be proposed in unconditional terms and then voted upon by the Council. This procedure appears to us to be the least offensive to Australia and will not require action on their part other than voting for or abstaining from voting on unconditional accession. Reference to telegram No. 22 of February 27, 1950† from Canadian High Commissioner in Australia, sent to you by airmail, March 1 under Despatch No. 596,† indicates that Australia will abstain from vote on unconditional accession if Allied High Commission and SCAP are not the signatories for Germany and Japan. You will appreciate of course, that our position is wholly opposed to Allied High Commission and SCAP as signatories.

1. Biddulph has been advised by Hollins of the United Kingdom that Acheson spoke recently with Sir Oliver Franks, urging him to seek some change in the apparently uncompromising position of the United Kingdom on the question of the admission of Germany and Japan. According to Hollins, Bevin is today replying to Franks indicating that there is no change in the United Kingdom's position, namely that they have no objection to Germany and Japan coming into the agreement provided the United Kingdom's supply of non-dollar wheat is protected.

2. Hollins further stated that they are satisfied with the German voluntary letter of January 20th,† and mean to raise the German entry separately from Japan if agreement is not reached on the admission of Japan (which, from the United Kingdom point of view, would require a similar letter from the Japanese authorities.) Hollins thought that they had every right to sponsor the German request separately from Japan if necessary.

3. The United States Embassy have indicated to Biddulph that they will not agree to any conditions for Japan. Moreover, according to their latest information, they will have to vote against any accession of Germany separately from Japan. They mentioned also the exchange of cables between Franks and Bevin, and reported that officials of the Embassy here have had discussions with Hollins. The United Kingdom picture, however, remains as described in paragraph 1 above.

4. The United States Embassy have not yet received final instructions nor do they expect them until Sunday. Neither has their full delegation been named but they anticipate that Stanley Andrews may come to London from the Far East to head their delegation, and they have been informed that Rhodes and Higby are coming over from Washington, arriving here tomorrow (Saturday).

5. Biddulph understands that Australia's position remains unchanged and that accordingly they will only agree to the unconditional accession of both Germany and Japan.

6. If, as indicated in paragraph 2, we are faced with a motion to agree to the accession of Germany alone, what position would you wish us to take? We are aware from paragraph 6(2) of your telegram No. 1939 of November 2nd that you had doubts concerning the Admission of Germany without Japan. If you were to agree at this stage to the admission of Germany alone what effect would that have on the quantities indicated in paragraph 1 of your telegram No. 308? In this connection, are the aggregate quantities in that paragraph based on 1.5 or 1.8 million tons for Germany? What would be the appropriate Canadian share if the admission of Germany alone were to be envisaged?

1. Regarding voluntary letter from Japanese Andrews advised McNamara some time ago that such a letter would be forthcoming. From your advices, however, which we confirmed in Washington yesterday we now understand that the Japanese authorities are not prepared to give any voluntary undertaking and will seek unconditional accession.

2. Have noted the position of United Kingdom as in paragraphs 1 and 2 of your telegram No. 456 also the United States position in your paragraph 3. In general the conflict in views will have to be resolved directly between the United Kingdom authorities and those of the United States. We would prefer having both Germany and Japan accede unconditionally and it appears that this can be accomplished in the case of Germany coupled with Germany's voluntary undertaking. In order to make the Canadian position clear, however, we consider it important that resolutions for unconditional accession of both Germany and Japan be allowed to come to a vote. In such event the vote for Germany would apparently carry with opposition only from Australia. If the Japanese accession is defeated however in the vote those opposing would be on record and the Canadian position in both cases would be made clear that we had voted in favour of unconditional accession. This incidentally would overcome the difficulty referred to in paragraph 6(2) of my telegram No. 1939 of November 2 in which it was implied that under certain circumstances we would have to vote against the accession of Japan. It was the opposing vote we wished to avoid.

3. If the Americans fail to alter the British position, we see no reason why Germany should not be admitted and Japan excluded provided that the onus for the latter is placed on record on the United Kingdom. In this event we would be prepared to accept a pro rata reduction, namely two-thirds of the figures given in paragraph 1 of my telegram No. 308 of March 8. As for the possible reduction in the German quantity from 1.8 to 1.5 million tons we would be reluctant to accept any pro rata reduction in our figures because of this decline. After all the German and Japanese quantities have been largely settled between the United States and those countries and our claim to the quantities agreed upon with the United States a week ago would have been just as valid whether the higher or lower quantity had been settled for Germany. We suggest that you hold out for no reduction in our figures on account of any reduction in the German figure, but if necessary in order to avoid further delay you are authorized to accept a pro rata reduction on the German figure as well.

1. The Council met again yesterday, and decided on the admission of Germany without conditions about its access to supplies of non-dollar wheat. The letter which the German Government has sent to the Council on this subject was referred to during the discussion prior to the vote, but it was not tabled formally. In a separate resolution the German quantity of 1,800,000 metric tons was apportioned in a manner satisfactory to us (the two-thirds formula).

Canadian quantities in millions of bushels are:

There was some initial difficulty about the division of German guaranteed sales, since France at the last moment insisted on its right to have its quota increased by 13,000 tons for the current year, and for the subsequent years of the agreement. The French representative could not be dissuaded from pressing this point, and in the Council moved an amendment to the figures which the other exporters had proposed. The amendment was, however, not pressed to a vote on the understanding that there would be further discussions between the United States and France about possible increases in the latter's guaranteed sales. In the meantime, the United States has agreed that France should have an additional 13,000 tons for each of the last three years of the agreement. It is well understood by the United States representatives that any further quantities given to France must come from their own guaranteed sales. In the voting on Germany's application, only Australia and Israel were opposed, although one or two of the smaller countries abstained. Australia voted against, because of the existence of the German letter to the Council undertaking to limit its purchases of non-dollar wheat.

2. Prior to the vote on the admission of Germany, a resolution proposed by the United States and supported by Canada was put to the Council for the admission of both Germany and Japan without any condition about non-dollar wheat. This resolution was put forward on the understanding that if it failed of acceptance, the two applications would be considered separately. It was lost by the vote of the important importers.

3. As regards the application of Japan, the United Kingdom proposed a resolution in similar terms to that adopted for Germany with the additional provision that the quantity of wheat to be bought by Japan from Australia in any crop year should not exceed the amount by which Australia's guaranteed sales were increased in respect of Japan's accession. The United States moved, and Canada seconded, an amendment deleting this clause, but the amendment was lost by the controlling vote of the importers. McCarthy (previous agreement having been reached amongst the exporters) then suggested that Japan's application be deferred until not later than July 31st. This seemed generally agreeable and the United Kingdom representative withdrew the original resolution, thus avoiding the necessity of putting it to a vote. In the circumstances we consider this to be a happy outcome, particularly as Australia and the United Kingdom seem confident that, given more time, it will be possible for them to reach some sort of agreement which would satisfy the United Kingdom's concern about the supply of Australian wheat, and would thus remove the United Kingdom's objections to unconditional accession.

4. As regards Japanese quantities, Biddulph has received assurances from Rhodes who acted as United States delegate to the Council, that the distribution of guaranteed sales will be in accordance with the agreement reached in Ottawa with Secretary Brannan.

5. The Council has now adjourned, and a short press release will be issued today. Ends.

Following is a summary of developments to date. Please pass to Trade and Commerce and Wheat Board.

5. Accessions. The central problems before the Council at this session were the proposed accessions of Japan, Indonesia and Spain.

(a) Japan. Without further negotiation between exporters and importers, a resolution of Japanese admission without conditions with respect to its access to non-dollar wheat, was put to the Council. The Japanese authorities had been unwilling to supply a letter to the United Kingdom similar to that put in by Germany undertaking to limit its purchases of non-dollar wheat, and failing some such guarantee the United Kingdom, with certain other importers, voted against, and the resolution was lost.

(b) Indonesia. Indonesia was unanimously elected a member of the Council, the understanding being that the guaranteed purchases of the Netherlands would be decreased by the amount of Indonesia's guaranteed purchases, i.e. 75,000 metric tons. In view of footnote 2 to Annex A of Article III, the Council was of the view that it was not necessary to invoke in respect of the Netherlands the procedure for reductions in guaranteed purchases.

(c) Spain. Prior to this session of the Council, Spain supplied a letter to the United Kingdom indicating that the access of importers already in the agreement to supplies of non-dollar wheat would not be prejudiced by Spain's membership. Having this bilateral exchange in mind, the importers voted for the unconditional accession of Spain. Amongst the exporters, all voted for Spain except Australia, and Spain was therefore elected. The quantity of Spain's guaranteed purchases is 100,000 tons. The division of this quantity has not yet been agreed by the exporters who will be meeting separately to consider this matter. There is a possibility that Spain would increase its quantity if the quotas of the soft currency suppliers France and Australia were raised. Will send you a fuller report on this aspect of the Spanish accession as soon as the position becomes somewhat clearer.

Following for C.D. Howe from McNamara. Please inform McIvor, Begins: An informal meeting of exporters was held on June 21st to discuss the division of the 100,000 tons brought into the Agreement by Spain. The meeting also considered ways and means of handling an additional 100,000 tons which Spain will guarantee to purchase if the quotas of soft currency suppliers i.e., Australia and France, were to be raised by that amount. In addition, preliminary consideration was given to the general problem raised by further accessions of importers to the Agreement or increases in the guaranteed purchases of present importers, and the related question of the adjustments which would have to be made in the guaranteed sales of exporters, should some importing countries eventually withdraw from the Agreement.

First 100,000 tons for Spain

2. As Spain had indicated that it would have funds available sufficient to purchase this quantity from dollar sources, and McCarthy did not press for an addition to the Australian quota, agreement was quickly reached that the 100,000 tons should be divided between Canada and the United States in accordance with the Howe-Brannan formula, with a slight adjustment to give France a pro rata increase. The division was as follows:

	Pro rata share	Metric tons
United States	168	44,883
Canada	203	54,234
France	3.3	883

Possible additional 100,000 for Spain if soft currency supplies are increased.

3. McCarthy, for Australia, indicated that he would not press the other exporters to agree that Australia's quota should be increased above the 85 million bushel ceiling, but that if Australia was asked it would be willing to have its guaranteed purchases raised by any amount up to the additional 100,000 tons which Spain was prepared to request. He personally would prefer not to have the quota go up by more than 50,000 tons pending a review of the long term Australian production prospects. He suggested that it was up to Canada to decide whether, in order to get additional guaranteed purchases into Agreement, it would be worthwhile agreeing that Australia should increase its quota over and above the 85 million bushels prior to the time when Canada's guaranteed sales reached the 230 million bushel level.

4. I tentatively, and on a personal basis, put forward the view that the time was now appropriate to reach agreement between the exporters on some general formula for the division of further guaranteed sales, and conversely, on the method which should be followed for reductions in guaranteed sales should one or more importers withdraw from the Council. I had it in mind that while increases in guaranteed purchases are not likely to be very large in the future, the real difficulty will arise if importers fail to meet their obligations under the Agreement as world supplies of wheat improve and the price level falls. Moreover, I considered that it was not desirable to eliminate, if possible, bilateral deals amongst the exporters such as our understanding with Australia about its 85 million bushel ceiling, and the Howe-Brannan Agreement on the division of further quantities, which, together with the shortage of non-dollar wheat, have increased the difficulties arising from new accessions. In any case, it seemed to me that, in present circumstances, Canada stands to gain by any increase in guaranteed sales, even if this involves giving a little to Australia and France.

5. My concrete proposal was that the representatives present should agree to recommend to their Governments that any future increases in guaranteed sales should be divided pro rata amongst the exporters on the basis of their percentages of total guaranteed sales as at August 1st of the present year. This pro rata division would operate up until the point that any exporter reached whatever level it decided was its maximum for sales under the Agreement. As exporters dropped out, further quantities would be divided pro rata between the remaining exporters. As the corollary of this arrangement, exporters would agree that any reduction in total guaranteed sales would be shared pro rata, on the understanding that initial cuts would be borne by those exporters, if any, who had continued to increase their guaranteed sales after other exporters had reached their self-imposed ceiling. The pro rata cuts would not affect exporters who had stopped at their ceiling until total guaranteed sales had dropped to the level at which these ceilings became operative. Thereafter, the pro rata formula would apply generally. While the representatives present could not agree to recommend this scheme formally to their respective Governments, it obviously created considerable interest, and there was a general feeling that some simple formula applicable in all circumstances, such as the one proposed, was desirable, and that the time was appropriate for a full review by the exporters of the operation of the Agreement in relation to their production possibilities in the remaining years of the contract.

6. Returning to the question of an additional 100,000 tons for Spain, the meeting considered whether the pro rata formula could be applied separately to this amount without prejudice to a general agreement on its future application to all increases or decreases. McCarthy indicated that, in this case, he would wish it to be applied to the first 100,000 tons, the division of which had already been informally agreed. In this connection, it was pointed out that, should agreement be reached on the application of the pro rata formula to the whole Spanish quantity, both Canada and the United States had indicated a desire not to purchase more than 100,000 tons from dollar sources. As far as McCarthy's point about the application of the formula to the first 100,000 tons was concerned, one possibility which was considered was that Australia's share of the second 100,000 tons might be set at a level which would represent its pro rata proportion of the full 200,000 tons. This would avoid re-opening the question of the first 100,000 tons.

7. There is to be another meeting of exporters in about a week's time, by which time it is hoped that representatives may have obtained at least the preliminary reactions of their home authorities to the proposal for the future application of a general formula and their views on ways and means of handling the additional 100,000 tons desired by Spain. I would appreciate very much hearing whether you agree with our general approach. MacKenzie, with whom these matters have been discussed, feels that the advantages which would arise from the application of a pro rata formula, particularly if countries start dropping out of the Agreement, more than outweigh any disadvantage which may accrue from proportionate increases in the Australian quota.

8. Since dictating the above there have been some new developments which are reported in my following telegram No. 1225. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference my telegram No. 1224, June 22nd, International Wheat Council. Following for C.D. Howe from McNamara. Please inform McIvor, Begins: At McCarthy's suggestion, a further informal meeting of exporters was held yesterday, June 23rd, in order that Canadian and United States representatives might be informed of new instructions which had been received from Canberra.

2. McCarthy said that the Australian Government was becoming increasingly dissatisfied with the working of the Agreement and in particular with the arrangements which were being made outside the Agreement to restrict purchases of Australian wheat in order to protect the access of existing importers to non-dollar supplies. It was the view of his authorities that irrespective of the precise legal position these outside arrangements represented a fundamental change amounting in effect to an amendment of the Agreement. If these practices were continued, it might be necessary to raise the matter formally in the Council and Australia's membership might be called into question. Australian officials are very much annoyed that it was not possible, because of United Kingdom veto, to get Japan into the Agreement.

3. Turning from the general to the particular, McCarthy said that the continued discrimination against Australia represented by the restrictive bilateral arrangement amongst importers had led Australia to reconsider its undertaking to limit its guaranteed purchases to 85 million bushels until such time as Canada's quota reached the 230 million bushel level. He was now under instructions to obtain for Australia some part of the additional guaranteed purchases brought into the agreement by Spain. In this connection, he stated that it would be necessary for him to withdraw his agreement to the division of the Spanish 100,000 tons which had previously been decided upon. Rather than do this formally at the Executive Committee meeting he hoped that it would be possible for the other exporters to agree to re-open the division of this quantity.

4. After considerable discussion, it was agreed that McCarthy should write to the Secretariat asking that no formal action be taken on a letter setting forth the agreed division of the Spanish quantity, which was submitted to the Council after the meeting of exporters the day before. In agreeing that the matter should be reopened I had it in mind that McCarthy, in any event, would be showing his hand in the Executive Committee and that on the whole, it would not be politic to try and force through the original division against Australia's opposition, since previously it has always been possible for the large exporters to bring agreed figures to the Council.

5. As indicated in my message No. 1224 the Spanish position was that it could only guarantee purchase of more than 100,000 tons if the quotas of soft-currency suppliers were raised. With this in mind, McCarthy thought that one way of getting round the difficulty without cutting into the previously agreed division of the 100,000 tons between ourselves, the United States and France, would be to increase the Spanish guaranteed purchase to around 119,000 tons which would be divided so as to give Australia its pro rata share on the basis of existing percentages (roughly 17 percent). I was not prepared to agree to this procedure having in mind the unfortunate precedent which would be set by increasing guaranteed purchases in direct relation to an increase in guaranteed sales by the soft currency suppliers. My suggestion was that an approach be made to the Spanish authorities to see whether their agreement could be obtained to increase their quota to 200,000 tons, the whole to be divided pro rata amongst exporters so that the hard-currency suppliers would get an appropriate share of the increase. It was agreed that I should approach the Spanish representative along these lines. I saw him yesterday afternoon, but he said that Spain could not obligate itself to take more than 100,000 tons of dollar wheat. He agreed, however to refer my suggestion to Madrid.

6. The problem appears to be

(a) Whether we should, notwithstanding the dangerous precedent, allow Australia to go over the 85 million bushel ceiling and agree to McCarthy's proposal to increase the Spanish quantity by roughly the amount of the increase in the Australian quota, or

(b) Whether we should hold McCarthy to the ceiling until agreement of all exporters can be obtained to the operation of a pro rata formula which would apply for all increases and decreases of guaranteed sales, or until Canada reaches the 230 million bushel level.

7. Agreement on (a) above would temporarily, at least (since the problem will present itself again when further increases are considered) relieve us of the responsibility for preventing an increase in the Spanish quantity with a corresponding increase in the Australian quota which would permit these two countries to trade (having regard to the Spanish/British understanding about supplies of non-dollar wheat). From the discussion, my feeling was that the United States was sympathetic to the Australian difficulties and might eventually agree to McCarthy's proposal. Concerning (b) above, it is now clear that immediate agreement on a pro rata formula will not be forthcoming since both the United States and Australia would wish to examine it very closely with particular reference to downward revisions.

8. Would appreciate your views on the attitude I should adopt, prior to the next meeting of exporters which is not scheduled to take place for a week or ten days since Andrews is on the continent and I am leaving tomorrow to make contacts with other importers there. Moreover, McCarthy wishes time for further consultation with his Government.

9. Pleased to report South African contract signed this morning. Ends.

Following for McNamara from Beaupré; reference your confidential messages No. 1224 and No. 1225 of June 24th, Begins: As both Mr. Howe and Mr. Mackenzie are absent from the city, I have been asked to advise you that the Department is perfectly satisfied that at the forthcoming meeting of exporters you handle the situation in accordance with the dictates of your own good judgment.

2. In this connection, however, if it appears advisable to grant Australia quotas in excess of what has been considered their ceiling of 85 million bushels, every safeguard should be taken to insure that they also share in any reductions in the overall quota that might come about as a result of withdrawals on the part of the importers. Naturally, if prior to your meetings or, indeed, during the course of your meetings, you run into questions of principle upon which you would like to have our thinking, either in Ottawa or Winnipeg, please do not hesitate to cable and we will do our best to get immediate decisions for you.

Following for Mackenzie from McNamara, Begins: Please advise McIvor. At an informal meeting of exporters this morning, further consideration was given to the division of the Spanish quantity and to the possibility of evolving a pro rata formula for regulating further quantities which might be brought into or withdrawn from the agreement. Neither the United States nor the Australian representative was in a position to commit his Government to a pro rata formula at this time, and most of the discussion centered round the Spanish quantity which both of them thought should be cleared up before dealing with the long term issue. They were of the view that a pro rata formula would raise considerable difficulties both of principle and detail, but were agreed that the time had come to undertake a general review. They pointed out that the working out of an agreed formula for the future would no doubt take considerable time whereas some urgency attached to the Spanish question, since Spain could not take advantage of its membership in the agreement until exporters had agreed on the division of its quantity.

2. In the meeting I took the initial position that unless we had some undertaking about the future we could not consider allowing Spain to increase its quantity over the 100,000 tons with a commensurate increase in Australia guaranteed sales since this would result in Australia going over the 85 million ceiling. Moreover, it would not correspond with the Howe-Brannan understanding. Nythus, speaking for the United States in the absence of Andrews, said that his authorities were quite prepared to see the Spanish quantity increased to 117.6 thousand tons, and for Australia to have the additional 17.6 thousand tons. He pointed out that it would be difficult for us to object since Canadian and United States quantities were not being reduced. Furthermore, that irrespective of the understanding between Spain and the United Kingdom any increase in guaranteed purchases is of benefit to all exporters, notably at the floor. I re-emphasized the importance we attached to future arrangements about the division of quantities, and while recognizing that exporters at this time could not commit themselves to the pro rata formula, said that in advance of agreeing to allow the extra 17.6 thousand tons to be earmarked for Australia, we would have to have some guarantee that the Canadian proposal would not be pigeonholed. After further discussion it was decided to meet again on Wednesday. With respect to our possible agreement to allow the 17.6 thousand tons to go to Australia, the following points have been clarified:

(a) The special 17.6 thousand tons increase for Spain with equal increase in the Australian quota is to be regarded as a special case, without prejudice to future divisions of quantities whether through new accessions or increases.

(b) The Australia-Canada understanding whereby Australia agreed to stay at a ceiling of 85 million bushels until Canada reached its figure of 230 million bushels, stands with the alteration that the Australian ceiling will now be 85 million bushels plus the 17.6 thousand tons.

(c) The division of the original 100,000 tons for Spain as well as any other additional quantities brought into the agreement, would be in accordance with the Howe-Brannan understanding until some general formula is agreed.

3. At the Wednesday meeting initial consideration will be given to alternative formulas for a pro rata division of further quantities, and representatives present will recommend the study of these alternatives to their Governments.

4. Subject to formal agreement amongst the exporters on the three points outlined above, and on the study of pro rata formulas, I am inclined to recommend that we agree to the additional Spanish quantity being given to Australia. Unless I hear from you to the contrary, I intend to take this line at the Wednesday meeting. Ends.

Reference my telegram No. 1332, July 10th. International Wheat Agreement. Following for Mackenzie from McNamara, Begins: At yesterday's meeting of exporters it was agreed that Spain should be asked to accede to the Agreement for 119,000 metric tons, of which Australia should be given 19,000 tons which is equivalent to its pro rata share of 16 per cent. The following is the text of an informal memorandum of Agreement, setting forth the conditions which have been agreed amongst the exporters in respect of the Spanish accession. Begins:

"At a meeting of United States, Australian and Canadian representatives held on July 12th to discuss the accession of Spain to the International Wheat Agreement, it was agreed:

(1) That the guaranteed purchases of 119.0 thousand metric tons, brought into the Agreement by Spain, should be divided between exporters as follows:

United States	44,883	metric tons
Canada	54,234	metric tons
Australia	19,000	metric tons
France	883	metric tons
	119,000	metric tons

(2) That the allocation to Australia of guaranteed sales of 19.0 thousand tons should not be regarded as a precedent for future divisions amongst the exporters of new quantities brought into the Agreement or increases made in existing importers' quotas.

(3) That this arrangement does not affect the question of the increase in Australia's quota above 85 million bushels whilst Canada's guaranteed sales are below 230 million bushels. Such question will come under review when proposals put forward in paragraphs 6 and 7 below are being dealt with.

(4) That the increase in the Australian quota of 19.0 thousand tons does not invalidate the Howe/Brannan understanding in Ottawa about the division between the United States and Canada of further quantities brought into the Agreement.

(5) That the understandings set forth in 2, 3 and 4 above shall remain valid until agreement is reached amongst the exporters on alternative arrangements.

(6) That the representatives present should recommend to their authorities that consideration be given as soon as possible to devising a formula in accordance with which exporters' guaranteed sales would be adjusted up or down on a pro rata basis to meet variations in the total quantity of guaranteed purchases.

(7) That a meeting of exporters be held prior to the next session of the Council with a view to agreeing on such a formula." Ends.

2. At the meeting some consideration was given to possible alternative pro rata formulas which might be used in allocating between exporters any further quantities brought into or withdrawn from the Agreement. The following is the text of one draft formula which might be applied. The representatives present agreed to recommend the study of this formula to their Governments. It has also been agreed that the exporters will meet prior to the next session of the Council with a view to agreeing on a general formula. Begins:

"(1) Within the range of one million metric tons above or below the total guaranteed sales as at August 1st, 1950, adjustments in quantities shall be made between the exporters on a pro rata basis in accordance with their respective percentage shares of total guaranteed sales as at August 1st of the latest crop year.

(2) If an exporting country does not wish to take the whole or any part of its pro rata share of any increases in guaranteed sales the Secretariat of the IWC shall be so informed and the additional quantity shall then be divided proportionately between the remaining exporters.

3. Exporting countries which have not taken advantage of possible increases under the pro rata formula shall not be asked to accept reductions in their guaranteed sales, in accordance with pro rata formula, until such time as total guaranteed sales have dropped to the level at which they ceased to take advantage of pro rata increases.

(4) The percentages at August 1st, 1950 are approximately: Australia 16 per cent, Canada 40.69 per cent, France .73 per cent, USA 42.58 per cent.

(5) This arrangement will not apply to the division of any guaranteed purchases brought into the Agreement by Japan which will be dealt with separately." Ends. Message Ends.

SECTION C

ACCORD INTERNATIONAL SUR L'ÉTAIN
INTERNATIONAL TIN AGREEMENT

462. PCO

Note du secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE INTERNATIONAL TIN CONFERENCE AT GENEVA, OCTOBER 25, 1950

On August 31, 1950, the Secretary-General of the United Nations invited Canada to participate in an inter-governmental Tin Conference in Geneva on October 25, 1950. The purpose of this Conference is to consider a proposal to regulate the tin market by an international commodity agreement, a draft of which was prepared by the International Tin Study Group in March 1950. Canada has participated from the beginning in the work of the Tin Study Group which was created after the war to keep under review developments in the production, marketing and consumption of tin.

The pressure for a tin agreement comes primarily from the producing countries. Pre-war experience indicated that in a free market the price of tin was liable to very wide fluctuations. Most of the countries producing tin such as Bolivia and Malaya are very heavily dependent upon it and price fluctuations severely upset their economic and political stability. The private interests concerned are of course also anxious to attain greater stability.

The advantages of a tin agreement to consuming countries are not so obvious. Under normal conditions Canada's needs are small and price fluctuations are not serious for Canadian users. Even the United States which imports something like 60% of available supplies has been lukewarm about an agreement; at the last meeting of the Tin Study Group in March 1950, the United States voted against the proposal to call a formal tin conference and proceed towards an agreement. No tin conference could be successful without the United States. However, it is now understood that the United States authorities will participate in a conference if it is held this month as proposed. The general arguments in favour are:

(a) Importing countries such as the United States (and Canada) have a concern in the economic and political stability of under-developed countries such as Bolivia and Malaya.

(b) The promise of stability in tin-producing areas should, over the long run, result in conservation of ore reserves, stabilized production and possibly lower prices on the average.

(c) The promise of long run stability is particularly important just at present when tin is in short supply solely because of stockpiling requirements; production will not be increased unless there is protection against over-supply and depressed prices in the future.

The important characteristics of the present draft tin agreement are as follows:

(a) It does not become operative until depressing surpluses are in evidence.

(b) Export quota restrictions which are the main instrument cannot be put into effect until supported by two-thirds majority of the votes of producing and consuming countries counted separately.

(c) Importing countries may be expected to prevent this occurring until tin is in surplus supply.

(d) Export quotas set by the Council annually will provide for adjustment of total production to total consumption, at the same time ensuring availability of adequate stocks.

(e) As a hedge against a short supply position developing and also for price stabilization purposes, there is to be a buffer stock which a simple majority of votes in the Council can call into operation.

(f) Contribution of tin metal or money to establish the buffer stock and to support it is obligatory for the producing countries but only voluntary (and unlikely) for the consuming countries.

(g) Members, through the Council, will set annually the upper and lower price limits at which the buffer stock will sell or buy respectively but it will be optional for the buffer stock to trade in between these limits.

(h) The Agreement is limited to five years duration from commencement of operation.

Two special points should be noted from the Canadian point of view:

(a) There are no financial commitments involved for the Canadian Government beyond contribution to the expenses of Administration of The Agreement (but not of the buffer stock trading operation) and, of course, the direct expenses of attendance and representation at Tin Council meetings.

(b) If an agreement is reached it is likely that, in the future, any emergency allocating machinery for tin would be set up under the auspices of the agreement. During the last war tin was allocated by the Combined Raw Materials Board with which Canada was very closely associated. Hence, Canadian emergency needs were looked after. It is important that Canada should be associated with any organization that is likely to allocate tin in the future.

Canada's participation in the proposed tin conference was discussed by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy on September 25th and it was thought desirable that a Canadian delegation should attend but undesirable for the Canadian delegation to take the lead in pressing for a tin agreement. It was noted that the draft agreement does not involve Canada in any financial obligations except for membership fees and that there are no commitments to impose domestic controls. In view of these limited obligations, the positive advantages of membership on the council if tin should again be allocated, and our interest in encouraging economic stability in the tin producing countries, it was considered desirable that Canada should participate.

It is proposed that the Canadian delegation should be headed by Dr. G.C. Monture, who has previously been chief delegate to the International Tin Study Group, and that he be assisted by Mr. Yves Lamontagne, Commercial Counsellor at Berne, and also by Mr. V.L. Chapin, Assistant Commercial Secretary at The Hague, who has been the continuing liaison with the Secretariat of the Tin Study Group at The Hague.[28]

Dear Sir:

We take pleasure in enclosing copy of Observations of Governments on the Draft International Sugar Agreement S.C.455 — text of 20th July, 1950 (Paper S.C.465/1 and 465/2) of the International Sugar Council dated 12th October, 1950.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Énoncé de la position du Canada

Statement of Canada's Position

[Ottawa], October 12, 1950

The Canadian Government fully appreciates the difficulties at this time facing members of the International Sugar Council in preparing a satisfactory draft of an international sugar agreement. Before the war, when the 1937 Agreement was signed, most currencies were mutually convertible and there was still a relatively large free market for sugar. Unfortunately these conditions have been greatly modified. The existence of inconvertible currencies inevitably creates serious obstacles in the way of an economic flow of sugar from many of the low cost producers to certain importing countries. Uncertainty in various countries regarding a continuing availability of supply under present world conditions is another complication facing those who are searching for a reasonable degree of stability in production and prices. These conditions have resulted in wide fluctuations in sugar prices — a situation undesirable both for producers and consumers.

In all the circumstances the principal problems confronting the International Sugar Council appear to arise mainly from factors which are not directly associated with the world production and marketing of sugar.

Canada is sympathetic to the basic objectives stated in the draft agreement, and is anxious as one of the main importing countries to obtain adequate supplies of sugar at reasonable prices. It is also recognised that the prosperity of the sugar exporting areas is of importance to a healthy international trade. Moreover, Canadian opinion is generally in favour of searching for the required solutions to sugar problems within the orbit of an international agreement rather than through the medium of inter-governmental contracts.

The Canadian attitude to specific points in the Agreement can best be understood against the background of the Canadian sugar position in general. The Council will be aware from statements made on previous occasions that the Canadian Government is not in favour of encouraging the uneconomic production of sugar from domestic resources. On the contrary, imports of sugar have long been regarded as a very important item among the purchases abroad which enable our foreign customers to accept increasing quantities of Canadian exports. This is clearly reflected in the fact that the tariff has been stable over a period of many years.

The Canadian market for sugar is not subject to regulations or restrictions. The purchase of raws on government account and the control of imports which were instituted during the war years and immediate post-war period have now been discontinued. Partly as a result of this policy of minimizing restrictions Canada constitutes the world's third largest importer of raw cane sugar, and stands high among other major importing countries in terms of consumption per head. Indeed, Canadians consume more sugar today than at any time previously both on a gross total and on a per capita basis.

In the light of the above facts, without prejudice to any later need to review the Draft as a whole, specific objections must be made to two of the Articles. The provisions of Article 8, obligating non-exporting countries to control production, presuppose the existence of a government programme determining the quantity of domestic sugar to be produced and of raw cane sugar to be imported.

The production and marketing of sugar in Canada is a matter left to free commercial competition so that a commitment to limit production would represent a major change in well established Canadian policy. The Canadian Government could perhaps assure the Council of a continuation of its policy not to encourage the uneconomic production of domestic sugar by special measures.

Article 9 is textually incomplete but contains a vague provision regarding steps which each importing country should take to prevent non-participating countries from gaining advantage at the expense of participating countries. This would appear to imply import discrimination in favour of signatories. The difficulty of defining ways and means of achieving the desired results is fully appreciated. From the Canadian viewpoint there is need for caution lest any action under this Article should have effects more serious than the condition it is designed to remedy.

Should the Council find that there is a threat of a burden-some surplus, Canada would be prepared to attend a conference called by the United Nations for the purpose of considering appropriate measures. In the meanwhile, it would seem desirable to continue studies of the terms of the draft agreement.

LEGAL QUESTIONS

The Financing of the International Committee of the Red Cross

Mr. Burbridge reported that the President of the International Committee of the Red Cross in a letter to the Department had reminded the Canadian Government as well as other governments which signed the 1949 Geneva Conventions, of Resolution 11 of the 1949 Diplomatic Conference which recognized the necessity of providing regular financial support for the International Committee of the Red Cross. The Committee estimated its 1950 budget to be 3,000,000 Swiss francs. The President had stated that "it would appear reasonable to assess the share of the American Continent at 1,000,000" Swiss francs. The Committee had not suggested any scale for individual contributions and hesitated to suggest the scale which has been adopted for contributions by member states of the United Nations Organization because of the large contributions made by the great powers to that organization. The Committee felt that it should not leave itself open to charges of partiality or favouritism which might result if it relied for financial assistance on a small group of powers. The Committee's impartiality and neutrality must be maintained in order for it to function properly. The President had stated that the Swiss Government was contemplating a contribution of 500,000 Swiss francs and that he hoped that the Canadian contribution would be in the neighbourhood of 25,000 Canadian dollars.

The United Kingdom Government was doubtful of the wisdom of governments making direct contributions to the International Committee of the Red Cross. It was their view that the generally accepted impartiality of the International Committee might be prejudiced if its existence were known to depend on subscriptions from foreign governments. On the other hand it was necessary that the International Committee be supplied with sufficient funds to enable it to operate efficiently in peacetime so that in the event of war it might be able to perform its functions immediately. The United Kingdom Foreign Office was considering whether it might make its contribution indirectly through the British Red Cross Society. The Government contribution would be made to the British Red Cross Society who would hand it over to the International Committee along with whatever contribution it would be making on its own account.

The Canadian position was being considered by the Department of Finance and the International Committee dealing with revision of the Geneva Convention. (Restricted)

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le sous-ministre des Finances

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

Ottawa, November 22, 1950

Attention: Mr. D.R. McLellan

RE CONTRIBUTION TO INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS

I refer to your letter of November 3, 1950,† in which you asked for my views on the request of the International Committee of the Red Cross for a $25,000 grant from Canada and on the manner in which such a grant should be made.

2. It is my view that the request of the ICRC is reasonable and justified and I recommend that it be granted.

3. You will recall that the reason why Canada ceased contributing to the ICRC, in 1948, was that the International Committee had ended its activities relating to Canadians. The United Kingdom Government had taken similar action in 1947. It has now become apparent, however, from correspondence received from the ICRC and referred to you (our letters of October 3 and October 19, 1950),† that the International Committee cannot maintain itself in an adequate state of preparedness for assuming the tasks, which are assigned to it in connection with the practical application of the Geneva Conventions, unless financial help is forthcoming from Governments signatory to those Conventions. In a letter dated April 29, 1950,† to Mr. Pearson, the President of the ICRC, explained that, while his organization is fully conscious of the need for "stringent economy", it is anxious to retain the most experienced members of its staff, including a small group of delegates, on whom the ICRC must depend to fulfill satisfactorily the role of neutral intermediary. Referring to the current activities of the International Committee, the President described how they afford training to both executive and staff for the heavier work they might be called upon to perform. He also mentioned that the ICRC has to enter into certain engagements, in order to have available wireless communication and sea transport, should the need arise for the use of these facilities. The President of the ICRC concluded that "these activities, taken as a whole, bring out the vital importance to the Red Cross of a system of regular financing, based upon a budget adopted from year to year". To enable Governments to assess the extent of financial support required, the International Committee proposes to send them, at the end of each year, a budgetary statement for the year which follows, and during the same period, a general report on its activity in the preceding year.

4. As regards the manner in which the grant requested by the ICRC should be made, I am impressed by the point made by the Commonwealth Relations Office in their letter of September 16, 1950,† to our High Commissioner in London. I agree with their suggestion that it might be desirable to pay an annual subscription to the National Red Cross Society, on the understanding that the Society would make a contribution in their own name of that amount, in addition to any further donation of their own, to the ICRC. This formula would have the merit, as the Commonwealth Relations Office pointed out, of safeguarding the generally accepted impartiality of the International Committee. I am, therefore, of the opinion, that, if a grant to the ICRC is authorized, it be made through the Canadian Red Cross Society, subject to the same conditions as those described in the letter from CRO.

Attention: Mr. A.J. Pick

Dear Sir:

RE CONTRIBUTION TO INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS

I refer to your letter of November 22, in reply to mine of November 3,† in which you give your views on the I.C.R.C.'s request for a grant of $25,000 from Canada and on the manner in which the grant should be made.

I note that it is your feeling that the request is reasonable and justified and that it should be met. I also note that you are in agreement with the stand taken by the Government of the United Kingdom that any contribution ought, in order to preserve the generally accepted impartiality of the Committee, to be made through the National Red Cross Society.

I am inclined to agree that, in the light of all the circumstances, we must make our contribution toward the support of the International Committee and in this connection I am taking the matter up with my Minister. There is one question, though, that is giving me some concern and that is "whether, in war with Communists, we can be at all confident that the Red Cross will be able to play its traditional war role". I should appreciate it if you will let me have, for the record, your views on this question.[29]

Yours very truly,
R.B. BRYCE

In any case we cannot possibly foresee how the Russians will act in respect of POW's or in relation to their obligations under the Red Cross Conventions. We can only keep the ICRC machinery oiled and hope for the best. B.M. M[eagher].

Following from Heeney, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding teletype.† North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee.
Following is text of memorandum referred to in paragraph 3 of my immediately preceding teletype. The telegrams referred to in the first line of the memorandum are, of course, your messages of December 6 and December 22 respectively.
Text Begins:

1. Your telegrams Nos. 2360† and 2479[1] indicate that in the view of the United States' representative on the PWS, early attention should be given to an examination of the fiscal capacity of the NAT countries. This examination is evidently expected, first, to reveal the comparative performance of the member countries in bearing the current cost of defence, and second, to establish some measure of their relative capacity to share the financial burdens of mutual defence in future — consistent with the maintenance of internal financial stability and support of continued economic recovery.

2. In our judgment this approach is an academic and impracticable way of dealing with the basic issue. The attempt to apply a general formula can be very unfair and misleading. No general formula can take fully into account all of the different national circumstances and varying government responsibilities and interests which must be considered when decisions are to be reached as to the amount — or proportions — which can or ought to be spent on defence. Furthermore, it would appear to us that the formula method approaches the problem the wrong way around. Instead of discussing first what are the hypothetical ways of sharing a presumably large, but as yet unspecified, defence burden, it would seem to be more fruitful to consider first what is suggested as a minimum programme and then, second, to examine this programme in relation to the resources which the member governments might find it practicable to make available.

3. Finally, the decisions regarding total government expenditures and the tax burdens to be imposed are inevitably political decisions which each government must make for itself. It is impractical to think that such fundamental matters of government responsibility can be determined by an abstract formula. Obviously governments will have in mind their obligations under the common defence programme when making their decisions. In reaching their decisions, however, they will have to be concerned both with the needs of the programme and their capacity to participate.

4. In the preceding paragraphs we have discussed the circumstances which would govern the general position of the individual governments. For your guidance the following general provisions apply in our own case.

5. Canada's ability to participate in the financial sense — physical limits are not under discussion here — is limited by two basic factors: (a) the budgetary position; (b) the Balance-of-payments limit.

6. The Budgetary Position. Whatever the Canadian Government does as a contribution to the common defence, it must be properly related to the overall budget plan. The contribution must be such as to fit within the total expenditures which the Government feels the country ought to undertake. Moreover, effective participation in the mutual defence scheme requires that Canada should pay appropriate regard to the need to maintain a strongly functioning economy. Significant resource development, which in this country usually entails large expenditures, is one of the Budget items which can be expected to occupy an important place in the overall plan for Canadian participation. Obviously the allocation of Canada's fiscal resources between defence and non-defence expenditures — at best a difficult distinction to make — is a decision which can only be made by the Government.

7. The Balance-of-Payments Limit. Owing to the breakdown of multilateral trade Canada has been affected by the world-wide dollar shortage, and since the end of the war we have had in consequence a serious balance-of-payments problem. The solution of the balance-of-payments problem is itself a major task for the Canadian Government. Since this problem is a long way from an adequate solution, the Government could not accept new responsibilities which would aggravate these balance-of-payments difficulties. Therefore the steps taken must not add to the pressure on our foreign exchange reserves. Any contribution we may make must then take place either through additional exports, or involve appropriate foreign exchange arrangements with the United States.

8. Having in mind the general considerations stated in paragraphs 6 and 7, the Government is studying the possibility of participating along one or more of the following lines:

(1) the provision of training facilities for a limited number of officers and technical personnel of the other NAT countries;

(2) provision of raw materials, insofar as this is an addition to rather than a part of our normal exports;

(3) provision of items of military equipment available from Canadian production or stocks surplus to North American requirements; provided that in (2) and (3) immediately above such action does not involve a significant drain upon our foreign exchange reserves, or, if a drain is involved, that appropriate arrangements are made to take care of the foreign exchange problem thereby created.

9. Additional background material prepared by the Department of National Defence is being sent in a supplementary message which provides some illustrative matter for your personal information.[2]

Following from Heeney, Begins: Quoted below is text of a message from Mr. Claxton supplementary to memorandum contained in my immediately preceding teletype. The analysis of defence expenditures† referred to in paragraph 2 of message is going forward to you today by Airmail, Special Delivery.

Text Begins:

1. Regarding comparison of defence expenditures by the various countries, the following points are mentioned as containing some additional arguments against all hard and fast formulae in appraising defence effort of each country.

2. In this connection, on the basis of the best information available to us here, we have had prepared and are air mailing you an analysis of the defence expenditures of the twelve countries in the North Atlantic Treaty. In the equivalent of Canadian dollars, this compares current defence appropriations on three different bases: First, per capita; second, as a percentage of national income for four different years; third, as a percentage of total government expenditure.

3. Attached to the analysis referred to in the foregoing paragraph is a note† explaining how it has been prepared. We do not regard the analysis as sufficiently reliable to enable you to use it in making comparisons. No doubt other tables have been prepared showing quite different results. This is sent to you to illustrate the points we are making. The whole table should not be made available to anyone else but if others are using tables you might illustrate the difficulty of making such comparisons by stating that you have seen a table giving quite different results. Incidentally, it would be useful for our own information here if you could as far as you can with the information that may be available there check the table and also send us any other tables that may be available.

4. Any comparison would be materially altered if there is included in the defence expenditures of Canada or other countries items of a character included in the defence expenditures of some countries such as those on atomic energy, a considerable proportion of the activities of the National Research Council, for example, relating to aviation research, various items of expenditure on veterans and the large programme of housing by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation earmarked for defence personnel.

5. You will also have appreciated the difficulty of comparing national incomes due to the different methods employed in arriving at them. Today more than ever there is the difficulty of arriving at a fair dollar equivalent due to differences in internal purchasing power or the amount of U.S. dollar content entering into the defence budget. Further, there are wide variations in the composition of national budgets as a result of the different functions of the national government under different systems.

6. In order to make any kind of comparison at all it is necessary to relate defence expenditures to the particular requirements and capacities of each country. For example, Canada with its 3 1/2 million square miles has to spend a very considerable sum simply maintaining communications which constitute an essential contribution to continental and indeed North Atlantic defence, as well as the defence of our own territory. As time goes on it will probably become necessary for us to devote more and more of our defence expenditure to the defence of our own country by the provision of early warning systems and the like. The formula of defence expenditure per square mile of territory is of course quite unrealistic, but in view of the considerations suggested here and others which will occur to you, hardly more unrealistic than the other formulae suggested. The geographical extent of Canada requires communications services and command and area organizations in all branches of the Navy, Army and Air Force resulting in very much larger overhead proportionately than would be the case with a densely populated country.

7. Because of our close associations with the U.K. and the U.S. and for other reasons, it is inevitable that our defence expenditures would be compared with theirs rather than with those of the other nations. You will appreciate that such a comparison gives rise to special difficulties because both the U.K. and the U.S. have worldwide interests and commitments. In the case of the U.S. particularly the population, climate, financial and economic power of the country makes any real comparison with Canada quite impossible.

8. Another factor having some bearing on this is the traditional attitude of each country towards defence. No doubt the Annual Report of the Department of National Defence for the year ending March 31, 1949, is available to you. At page 82 there is a table showing defence expenditures over the last twenty-five years.

The White Paper distributed on presenting the estimates on November 11 last also gives additional information. The current defence expenditures of $383 million are seventeen times the average expenditures during the ten years before the war, an increase believed to be much higher than in any other country.

9. Referring to the budgetary position, we are not in a position to give you details but you will no doubt be aware that our revenues will be lower next year both because of reduced economic activity and because our recent tax changes will be effective for the full year. On the other hand it will be difficult to effect any substantial reduction in total government expenditures apart from defence. Uncontrollable items such as debt services, statutory payments, payments to provinces represent today about three-quarters of total budget, reducing the field which may be affected by government policy. Another factor is that Canada probably spends a smaller proportion of its national budget on social security payments than most of the countries coming under the Treaty. Text Ends. Message Ends.

Memorandum from Acting Secretary to Cabinet to Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY; DEFENCE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

1. The Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom has reported fully, in his telegrams Nos. 56† and 90,† on the January 10th meeting of the Working Staff of the Financial and Economic Committee and has asked for further instructions as to the position the Canadian representatives should take at the next meeting of the Working Staff, scheduled for January 31st.

2. It will be recalled that the Working Staff is presently discussing their proposed programme of work for the next few months. The U.S. representative suggested a programme which involved a study of budgetary resources available in each country for defence purposes and the adoption of some formulae to permit the equitable distribution of defence effort among NAT countries.

3. When the matter was discussed in the Working Staff, the U.K. representative observed that the programme proposed by the U.S. raised important questions of policy and that it would be preferable to postpone the studies until further information was available from the military and supply organizations. However, as such information was not expected for some time, the U.K. were ready to proceed with some statistical studies and thought that these should be based on the assumption that defence expenditures in 1950-51 would be on the same scale as 1949-50, and that determination should be made of the ratios between expenditures, on the one hand, and population, total national budget, and national income, on the other.

4. All of the representatives, with the exception of the Belgian and Canadian, indicated that they would probably be prepared to go ahead with statistical studies as originally proposed or in some modified form. The Canadian representative, as instructed, opposed the conduct of statistical studies based on capabilities and suggested that a more practical approach would be to undertake the study based on defence needs, after these were determined.

5. No decision was reached, and the Chairman undertook to discuss the matter with individual representatives of other countries prior to the next meeting. During his discussion with the Canadian representative, he said that he had it in mind to prepare two papers for the next meeting, the first of which would be a resubmission of the projects originally proposed by the U.S., possibly rearranged somewhat. The second would consist of an interim programme containing such projects as the following:

(a) The submission to the Permanent Working Staff by each country of the defence estimates for the coming year.

(b) The determination of the relationship which the defence expenditure of each country bears to population, total budget, national income and any other relevant factors.

(c) The possible working out of financial arrangements which might be necessary to facilitate transfers of surpluses, either from stock or new production.

He also mentioned some of the considerations he had in mind in proposing this interim programme. He thought, for instance, that the studies would be useful to the Permanent Working Staff as a familiarization exercise and to the military and supply planners for guidance in their respective tasks; that the statistical exercise would provide an opportunity for low ratio countries to explain their position, and thus provide a basis, which was not now existing, for mutual assistance; and, that any discussions in the U.S. Congress of the defence estimates of NAT countries would not likely be more harmful if they were based on a Financial and Economic Committee statistical report than if they were undertaken independently.

6. If, in the light of the above, the meeting concludes that Canada can no longer resist the desire of the other countries to make some sort of comparative study, they may wish to consider such questions as:

(a) which of the proposals is more acceptable — the U.S. or U.K.

(b) what additional criteria to the ones proposed by the U.S. or U.K. should be included to put our defence expenditures on the fairest possible basis.

TELEGRAM 129 Ottawa, January 29, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Following from Heeney, Begins: We have now had two further meetings with Robertson, Clark, Drury, Foulkes and Pierce, at which we have discussed, in the light of your telegrams No. 56 of January 11† and No. 90 of January 14,† the various courses of action [A.E.] Ritchie might take at the next meeting of the Permanent Working Staff on January 31.

2. We still hold to our position expressed in our telegrams Nos. 32,† 33 and 34 of January 7 that a comparative study of defence expenditures, and particularly an attempt to compare defence expenditures of member countries on the basis of some arbitrary formula, would be unrealistic, probably politically objectionable and at best an unprofitable use of time. The criteria which apply to a national economy of one type do not necessarily apply with equal fairness to another. We therefore have no faith in the value of such an exercise, and we are not prepared to withdraw our objections of principle. We had also assumed that studies made by the Committee would not only relate to important practical subjects but also would be secret in nature and would not be used for such public relations purposes as those indicated by Mr. Breithut. We should, of course, wish it to be understood that any classified information supplied would be suitably protected.

3. While we should prefer to see the PWS undertake more practical studies, we recognize that the other members of the PWS, and presumably their Governments, are virtually committed to undertaking some sort of comparative study which will be carried out with or without our participation. As a member of the North Atlantic organization, we want to avoid any appearance of being uncooperative as this could be interpreted as motivated by a desire to escape from an exercise which might cause us some embarrassment.

4. At the next PWS meeting, Ritchie should repeat the points he made at the last meeting on January 10, based on our telegrams of January 7. He should then urge as an alternative course of study the desirability of tackling more immediate and practical problems. One problem which occurs to us as worth investigating is that of the financial barriers which stand in the way of transfers of military equipment among the European members; barriers which, we understand, impede transfers of military surpluses and stocks and are likely to hinder production. This is the sort of problem which we have always envisaged as the primary task of the Defence Financial and Economic Committee and its Working Staff. It might also be pointed out that by February 15, Regional Planning Groups will have submitted to the Standing Group their lists of deficiencies and some of this information should be available in co-ordinated form even although it may not have been studied by the Military Production and Supply Board. In short, we do not, repeat not, feel that the PWS needs to embark on exercises of doubtful practical value in order to keep itself busy.

5. If, as is probable, other members will insist on proceeding with the study of comparative expenditures, Ritchie may make a further statement to the effect that, while not withdrawing our objections of principle, we could, of course, be willing to assist the study by providing information in regard to our own defence expenditures.

6. For your own information, what we have in mind is that these instructions should make it clear that, while maintaining for sound objective reasons that the study should be dropped or shelved in favour of more practical work, we wish to leave Ritchie a comparatively free hand to work in an individual capacity so that the study eventually produced will be as unobjectionable as possible. If the study is carried on, we should like Ritchie to endeavour to influence it in the direction of a straight-forward statistical analysis of each country's expenditures and financial problems relating to defence rather than in the direction of developing a formula which might be used for invidious comparisons.

7. We shall be commenting separately tomorrow Monday on the document circulated to the PWS by the Secretary, as reported in your telegram No. 154 of January 24,† and hope to be in a position to add further comments as to the categories of expenditures which we think should be included under the heading of "defence". Ends.

RE NORTH ATLANTIC FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Following from Deputy Minister of Finance, Begins: We are sending by airmail probably March 14, detailed list of expenditures with explanatory notes,† as requested in your telegrams 262† and 263.† The preparation of this information has involved much detailed work as well as decisions as to what should or should not be included in the material provided.

2. You will note on receiving the detailed tables that figures are supplied for various categories and items having different degrees of directness in their bearing on defence. Some can be included in a total of defence expenditures with greater justification than others. Consequently we have not made a grand total of all these figures, but are providing them to you in detail to be used as suggested below.

3. You may submit as much of this material as you feel is appropriate in relation to what others are submitting, in order that Canadian expenditures for all defence purposes shall not be understated in relation to those of others. For the reason given in paragraph 5 below, we believe that Canadian expenditures for defence purposes should be broadly defined rather than narrowly defined in getting a proper comparison with other countries on a similar basis. We are endeavouring to supply detailed information that would be necessary for the inclusion of figures on as broad a basis as would seem practical. We are not familiar, however, with the lines that are being drawn in the material submitted by other countries and must depend on your judgment as to what details can and should properly be submitted.

4. As you know, we maintain our previous view that this whole exercise is undesirable and misleading. We find our views in this regard supported by the type of problem one gets into in trying to provide a detailed list of this kind, where there is much room for argument as to whether or not certain types of expenditures should be included as being primarily for defence purpose.

5. We believe it important to bring out Canada's problem of providing communication, transportation, and other services over its vast area and extensive coast line for defence as well as civilian requirements, and the necessity that exists to integrate these services for both defence and civilian needs in order to obtain maximum results from the resources available. The nature of these needs, the arrangements made to meet them, and the accounting practices in regard to them minimize the expenditures accounted for directly as defence.

6. We have not included under any categories expenditures covering post-war economic controls made necessary by the war, international loans and assistance to other countries, contributions to international organizations, expenditures for international broadcasting, or for the transfer and retraining of labour other than veterans following war. We have assumed that expenditures for these various purposes would not be included by the Committee in their studies on other countries, as no reference has been made to them in your message, unless they are understood to be included in war terminal charges, which we thought unlikely.

7. I am adding at the end of this telegram a summary of the figures being forwarded in detail. The list does not include any expenditures for agriculture, fisheries, forests, irrigation, land reclamation and flood control, public works, labour (except veteran vocational training), social security, health, or welfare. The departments under which the expenditures are made are given in the detailed list, and by reference to a copy of Estimates or Public Accounts you can determine those items that are included in whole or in part, and those that are omitted. Expenditures for corporations, boards, and agencies of the Crown are net after applying their revenues. Departmental expenditures are gross except in the case of the R.C.M.P. where revenue from provinces for policing on their account has been deducted. Operating revenue for the fiscal year ending March 1949 from those departmental activities included on a gross basis in the tables is roughly $1.8 million for National Defence, $48,000 from Resources, Development and Surveys, and $4 million for transportation and communications. These amounts will be roughly representative of subsequent years for which expenditure figures or estimates are given.

8. The following is a summary of the figures being sent by mail, in thousands of dollars, and includes actual expenditures for 1948-49, estimated expenditures for the year 1949-50, now closing, and estimates requests of Parliament for 1950-51.

	1948-49	1949-50	1950-51
(a) Direct Defence Expenditures	277,379	408,331	491,115
(b) Research and development contributing to defence	21,316	29,403	32,205
(c) Transportation and communication	83,610	110,489	127,496
(d) Royal Canadian Mounted Police, less provincial contribution	12,448	15,355	18,000
(e) Meteorological services	4,183	4,902	5,559
(f) Aids to navigation	8,550	13,094	15,041
(g) Pensions and other costs for veterans	277,884	237,320	222,419
(h) Miscellaneous war terminal charges, including interest on the national debt	472,976	445,688	425,901

9. Expenditures actually appropriated to the Department of Defence under Item (a) of the preceding paragraph for the three years are: $268,804; $378,093; $425,000. The additional amounts under Item (a) are from appropriations to other Departments which, however, might appropriately be chargeable to defence, e.g. Housing by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on behalf of National Defence: $60,000 for 1950-51.

TELEGRAM 534 London, March 18, 1950

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

1. The meeting of this Committee will be held on March 29th in London. Mr. Wilgress has been informed.[3]

2. It is intended that the United Kingdom Government should issue a routine press statement regarding the time and place of meeting some time after March 22nd. When issuing the brief press release United Kingdom officials propose to give informal guidance to the correspondents concerning the background of the Committee. In this informal guidance they will probably refer to the forthcoming meeting in somewhat the following terms:

"It may be expected that the agenda of the Finance Ministers will include a review of the progress made in the study of the financial and economic arrangements to meet the requirements of North Atlantic defence programmes. In particular, the Finance Ministers may be expected to consider the financial and economic effort involved in future plans for defence production required for the integrated defence of the North Atlantic area.

As already announced, the North Atlantic Defence Ministers will meet at The Hague on April 1st, and the conclusions of the Finance Ministers meeting in London on 29th March will therefore be available for the guidance of the Defence Ministers."

3. At Thursday's meeting of the Permanent Working Staff the following outline of an agenda for the Defence Financial and Economic Committee meeting was discussed:

(a) To review the reports of the PWS on the four work projects undertaken in accordance with the Committee's directive (these are of course the projects referred to in your telegram No. 198 of February 11th†)

(b) To consider the report of the PWS on the replies submitted in response to the United States questionnaire by those countries requesting United States assistance with their military production programmes (see document PWSNATDFEC(50)16† enclosed with our letter NATFEC 7 of March 1st†), together with the declaration which the Ministers of those countries are prepared to make regarding the expected increase in their defence production effort in 1950-52 compared with 1948.

(c) To consider what parts of the report and declaration mentioned at (b) above and possibly also of the reports mentioned at (a) might be made use of in the United States Congressional discussions.

(d) Any other business.

(e) To approve a press release for issuance after the meeting.

4. In connection with item (a) above the PWS intends to submit a report which will deal with the four projects in somewhat the following manner:

(a) Current defence expenditures. The report on this project will consist of a table giving the defence expenditure figures submitted by the various Governments. This table will be accompanied by a note pointing out that the classification of expenditure in the budgets of the various countries is by no means uniform and that the PWS is examining the question of defining "defence expenditures" applicable to the defence of the North Atlantic area. The only action which Ministers may be asked to take on the report concerning this project will probably be to record the preliminary conclusion that "a review of the budgetary estimates of total defence expenditures by the NAT countries as a whole suggests that budgetary resources available for (or to be devoted to) this purpose in the fiscal year 1950/51 are likely to exceed expenditures for the fiscal year 1949/50."

(b) Financial and economic resources which could be made available for defence of the North Atlantic area. The report will probably indicate that so far the work of the PWS related to this project has consisted largely of the preparation of the material to be discussed under item (b) of the agenda (which of course applies only to those countries requesting United States assistance). In addition it will be indicated that certain suggestions have been made of the considerations which should be taken into account in estimating the resources which can be made available. The Belgian representative has suggested that the principal considerations are the budgetary and internal financial position, availability of manpower and means of production, and the availability of materials required or of foreign exchange needed to obtain such materials. The United States and Danish representatives have agreed that these considerations are relevant and have added the following one to the Belgian list:

"Savings achievable by reduction of expenditures in those parts of the defence budget not related to military production or mutual assistance."

The report will probably note that the PWS will continue work on this project and may note also that some delegations question the practicability of the project until advice concerning requirements has been received from the military and supply sides of the Organization.

(c) Arrangements for financing transfers among the NAT countries. The report on this project will summarize any suggestions which have been made. So far the only suggestions received are those from Norway and Belgium.

The Norwegian suggestion is expressed in the following rather vague terms:

"The Norwegian Government is of the opinion that structural deficits in the balance of payments of certain countries will have to be effectively covered under possible arrangements to be considered for transfer of military equipment among European member countries. Such arrangements must thus be dependent on specific dollar aid to finance structural payment deficits. Alternatively, one might contemplate a system with 'drawing rights' for one country based on 'conditional aid' to another member country analogous to the E.R.P. assistance practised until now as a supplement to the direct aid."

The equally vague Belgian suggestion (with which you will be familiar from our reports on earlier discussions in the Western Union Finance and Economic Committee) is that the financing of transfers should be assisted "by diverting a part — and a relatively small part — of United States aid to the creation of a common fund."

In the case of this project also, the report will probably note the doubts of certain delegations concerning its practicability until specific cases of necessary transfers have been produced by the military or supply sides of the Organization.

(d) Formulae or criteria relating to the measurement of the economic burdens of defence. The report will note the objections in principle which certain delegations (which would now appear to include Belgium as well as Denmark and Canada) had raised to this project. It will also summarize any specific suggestions which may have been made. The only suggestion so far received is that of the Norwegian representative who suggests that "the most suitable procedure would seem to be to use national income figures per capita", after deducting the amount "representing the minimum income necessary for covering the necessary needs of the individual". He suggests that if such criteria were to be adopted allowance should be made for the fact that "the inhabitants of some countries are forced to use a comparatively large portion of their income to overcome the special climatic conditions with regard to housing, clothing, nutrition, etc., or to construct and maintain comparatively expensive communications." He proposes that the "statistical assessment" should be "on a progressive scale". He suggests that the general criterion should be supplemented with other criteria such as the following: Proportion of manpower employed in military forces on a man-year basis; the balance of payments position; the supply of materials available; the state of the economic recovery and long-term investment programmes. After listing these criteria he concludes with the unexceptionable observation that, "The Norwegian Government want to stress that far-reaching decisions with regard to the economic sacrifices of the countries cannot be made exclusively on the basis of figures and formulae. For the solution of practical problems in many fields it is important and quite necessary to consider all real economic elements involved."

5. Concerning item (b) in the outline agenda reported in paragraph 4 above, the report being prepared by the PWS will indicate for each of the European countries requesting United States assistance the expected budgetary expenditures on military production and the procurement of military supplies through 1952. In general these countries will indicate that they expect to spend at least as much per annum in 1951 and 1952 as in 1950. The declaration which the representatives of those countries will be asked to agree upon at the meeting on March 29th will probably include paragraphs along the following lines:

"The current year's estimated expenditure of the equivalent of 1,223 million dollars (for those countries requesting United States assistance) is an increase of 60 percent over the expenditures in 1948, before the signature of the North Atlantic Treaty. This constitutes a major measure of self-help in strengthening the mutual defences of the North Atlantic countries.

"With regard to future years, only the roughest estimate of expenditures in this category is possible. Clearly the scale of spending for military production (as for other defensive purposes) must depend on changing economic, political and military factors. The principle of first priority for economic recovery still stands. At the same time, each Government recognizes that it should do its utmost, within its economic and financial limitations, to improve the defensive strength of the North Atlantic countries. As planning develops within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty, there will be continual reassessment of the ways in which resources may best be used.

"Subject to these uncertainties of the future, however, the NAT countries in Europe have examined the possibilities of future spending for defence production. Certain countries have been able to provide rough forecasts of their outlays. Others have not felt able to provide long-term estimates of expenditures maturing in conditions that cannot be predicted. They have, however, felt able to declare that, according to present intention and on present economic and military assumptions, the best estimate that can be made of the future prospects of defence production (including research and development) and procurement is that expenditures planned in 1950 will be continued on about the same scale in the following two years."

6. No papers have yet been drafted concerning items (c), (d) and (e) of the outlined agenda.

7. The PWS is to meet on the morning of Wednesday, March 22nd, to complete the preparation of the various papers required for the Committee meeting.

8. Our immediately following telegram indicates the different points on which it appears that guidance will be required before the PWS meeting and those on which guidance would seem necessary in connection with the meeting of the Full Committee.

1. The following are the points on which guidance would be appreciated before the meeting of the Permanent Working Staff at 10.30 a.m. Wednesday, March 22nd:

(a) Are there any objections to the press statement and informal guidance proposed by the United Kingdom?

(b) Is the outline of the agenda acceptable?

(c) What figure should be entered for Canada in the table to be included in the report on the first project under item (a) of the outline agenda?

(d) Is there any objection to the inclusion of a suggestion in the report on this project that the members of the D.F.E.C. should state that on the basis of a preliminary review defence expenditures are likely to be higher in the coming fiscal year than in the preceding year?

(e) What comments, if any, (additional to the general comments already made in your telegram No. 198 of February 11th†) do you wish to have included in the report on the other three projects under item (a) of the outline agenda, or on the rather vague suggestions so far made by other delegations concerning some of those projects?

2. Regarding the question at (c) above concerning the figures to be included for Canadian defence expenditures in 1950/51 and 1949/50 you will probably wish to have the following considerations in mind:

(a) It is not going to be possible before the meeting on March 29th to put the figures for the various countries on anything like a comparable basis and the report will indicate that the question of a uniform definition of "defence expenditure" is being further examined by the PWS.

(b) Insofar as any comparisons are intended to be made at the forthcoming meeting of the DFEC, those comparisons are likely to be between one year and another and not so much between one country and another (although of course some persons either inside or outside DFEC may suggest comparisons between countries on the basis of the figures submitted.)

(c) There will probably be a request that these figures (either separately for each country or as an aggregate for the North Atlantic countries as a group) should be made available to the United States Congress and other interested legislatures either publicly or in executive session.

3. In the light of such factors as these you may wish to consider whether the figure for Canada should be that for the Department of National Defence alone, or whether it should be the amount identified in paragraph 8 of your telegram No. 336 of March 13th as "direct defence expenditures" (all of which would appear to be recognized by the other members of the PWS as readily admissible "defence expenditures"), or whether you desire us to secure such an increase in the figure for Canada as may be practicable in the short time available for discussion. In connection with the last possibility, it might be mentioned that the total for the United States will include various items from outside the Defence Department including atomic energy (which the Norwegians are also including but which the United Kingdom are excluding), the Coastguard, and Aeronautical Research. If you so desire, we could probably have the figure for Canada rendered more comparable with that for most of the other countries, even in the limited time available before the DFEC meeting, by bringing in all or part of the figures mentioned in your telegram No. 336 for research and development, and the RCMP (the latter on the ground that all of the European countries — except Norway and Denmark — are including the bulk of their gendarmerie). Without some further breakdown of the figures for transportation and communication, meteorological services and aids to navigation (which may be given in the detailed tables mentioned in your telegram which have not yet reached us) it would be difficult to have an allowance made for these items, particularly since the United States representative has taken the position that such items should be excluded. Some allowance might be made for pensions if you could indicate what part of the figure given in your telegram represents retirement pensions within the meaning of paragraph 3(IV) of our telegram No. 302 of February 18th.† Our own inclination is to suggest (particularly if the information is to be made public and if confusion is likely to arise concerning the relationship between these figures for Canada and those included in the estimates submitted to Parliament) that we should be content for the purpose of the first report on this project with the figure of 425 dollars million or 491 dollars million for Canadian defence expenditures in 1950/51 (and the comparable figure for 1949/50) accompanied by an indication in the report that differences of definition of "defence expenditures" remain to be reconciled leaving detailed adjustments of the figures for the various countries to be worked out at a later stage.

4. In connection with the meeting of the DFEC itself on March 29th, guidance is requested on the following additional points:

(a) What observations, if any, would you wish the Canadian representative to make concerning the report envisaged in item (b) of the outline agenda in paragraph 3 of our telegram No. 534?

(b) What is your attitude towards the use in United States Congressional discussions of any material regarding Canada which may be incorporated in the reports envisaged in item (a) of the outline agenda?

TELEGRAM 393 Ottawa, March 21, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Following from Deputy Minister of Finance, Begins: Reference your telegrams No. 534 and No. 535 of March 18th and No. 547 of March 20th.†

2. Although it is realized that the additional production programmes of the European countries requesting United States assistance will form part of the Agenda, we have the feeling that the second sentence of the informal guidance, which the United Kingdom will give to the press, carries the implication that the Finance Ministers are willing and able to consider the financial and economic effect of future production plans, even before the integrated defence plans have been fully defined, but we would not press our objections if the others agree to the UK draft release.

3. We have no objections to the outline of the agenda proposed in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 534.

4. On the substance of sub-paragraph (c) in the agenda outline, we feel that some reservations must be made about the wisdom of releasing the data and reports used or prepared by secret committees. We cannot help but feel that the work of the NAT committees will be impeded if publicity is given to their work. The possibility of embarrassment ought not to be overlooked if, as a result of such publicity, comparisons were made before Congress which by other NAT members were felt to be unfair. If it is the otherwise unanimous wish of the Committee that some publicity be approved, we would be prepared to accept this view provided that reasonable arrangements were made with us to first clear the material for release.

5. There does not seem to be any objection to the inclusion in the P.W.S. report of a suggestion that defence expenditures are likely to be higher in the coming fiscal year. The statement is correct for Canada.

6. Re the meeting of the D.F.E.C. on March 29th,

(a) We should not feel inclined to comment at length on the report envisaged in item (b) of the outline agenda.

(b) Our views on the use of any material regarding Canada before United States Congressional committees might be patterned on our comments in paragraph four above.

7. It is our opinion that the figure for Canada entered in the table to be included in the report on the first project under item (a) of the outline agenda should include all items that may be discussed on further review by the P.W.S. For the reasons stated in our telegram No. 336 of March 13th, we believe a broad definition of defence is necessary to show appropriately the expenditure of Canada for defence purposes, although we do not want to lead the parade in broadening the definition. Until a firm definition of defence is accepted by P.W.S., Canada should not prejudice its position by entering items covering too restricted a field. You should now have the detailed material supporting the figures in our telegram No. 336 and we believe on the basis of it you should secure such an increase in the figure for direct defence expenditures for Canada as in your judgment is practical in the light of Canadian conditions in comparison with those of other countries. Reductions may be made later, if necessary, after detailed review and agreement on a firm basis for determining defence expenditures in P.W.S. We believe, therefore, the figures entered for Canada should include in the light of the information in your telegram No. 534 all expenditures we have listed as direct defence expenditures, expenditures on atomic energy and on the R.C.M.P. The inclusion of the R.C.M.P. is strengthened as a result of inclusion of the Coast Guard Service by the United States as the R.C.M.P. performs along with other departments including the Department of Transport similar services for Canada. We believe, in addition, other items listed in the detailed memoranda forwarded to you might be included. In particular we draw to your attention those articles listed under Research and Development and if the whole of this item is not included consideration should be given to some of the items including National Research Council, Research and Development of Jet Engines and Aircraft, grants to Organizations for Development of Civil Aviation, Air Photography, Mapping and Geographical Bureau, and Hydrographic Surveys. We do not consider it advisable at this stage that all of the items listed under Transportation and Communication, Aids to Navigation and Meteorological Services be omitted and reiterate the emphasis we have placed in earlier memoranda on the integration of these services in Canada with services required for defence. This list might well be reduced on the basis of what other countries are including, particularly such items as the C.N.R. deficit, the T.C.A. deficit, the freight subsidies on eastern lines and capital expenditures for improved transportation facilities in the Maritimes, but we believe an effort should be made to include items for airways and airports and related activities, communication facilities, aids to navigation and meteorological services. The expenditure on aids to navigation we believe in part would cover similar services to that of the Coast Guard Service in the United States.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference telegram No. 393 from Deputy Minister of Finance, March 21st, North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee.

1. At this morning's meeting the Permanent Working Staff agreed that the Canadian representative should be allowed to submit, for the purpose of the forthcoming meeting of the DFEC, figures for Canadian "defence and related expenditures" which would be reasonably comparable with those submitted by other representatives. Accordingly we have now submitted the following figures (in Canadian dollars) for inclusion in the report which is being made to the DFEC.

1949/50	$460 million
1950/51	$545 million.

2. These figures consist of the following items from the material reported in your telegram No. 336 of March 13th and your despatch No. 754 of March 15th†

(a) Direct defence expenditures

(b) RCMP, less provincial contribution

(c) Atomic research and development

(d) Jet aircraft research and development

(e) 50 per cent of the allowance for "surveys" in the section on research and development in the study accompanying despatch No. 754.

(f) 50 per cent of the allowance for airways, air ports, etc., indicated on the first sheet of the tables in the section on "transportation and communication" in the same study.

(g) 50 per cent of the allowance for "meteorological services" in that study.

(h) 50 per cent of the allowance for "aids to navigation" in the study.

3. No allowance has been made directly for railways, waterways, pensions and other expenditures for war veterans, or war terminal charges, since similar items were excluded from the other submissions (except in the case of the Netherlands which included some allowance for expenditures on war veterans).

4. The break-down of the totals for the various years has not been given to the PWS. Some redistribution of the allowance made for various items may be required, but generally it seems to us that the totals are on a fairly reasonable basis in comparison with the other countries and that their components can be defended when the time comes for any detailed discussion.

5. The report which will transmit the various figures to the DFEC will contain the following note:

"A review of these data by the Permanent Working Staff shows that the reported figures for total national defence and related expenditures do not include the same categories of expenditures for all participants. The Permanent Working Staff is actively engaged in the development of a uniform definition of national defence and related expenditure".

6. The following is the text of the statement which the PWS is recommending to the DFEC:

"The Committee note the increasing defence effort by the North Atlantic Treaty countries, which is reflected in an increase in their combined defence budgets. With particular reference to the fiscal year beginning 1950, although appropriations have not yet been voted in all cases by the Legislatures, the total budgetary resources available for this purpose are likely to exceed similar expenditures for the previous fiscal year. At the same time the work of the NATO in the coordination of military plans and of production or procurement activities should result in the increasingly efficient utilization of such budgetary resources as are made available."

7. At this morning's meeting of the PWS there was also some discussion on the question of action which the DFEC might take regarding the possible publication of some of the material contained in this report and in the other report concerning the NAT countries which may request United States assistance with their military production and procurement programmes. There was a general inclination (except on the part of the United States representative) to favour the publication of as little of the information as possible since anything that might be published could give rise to embarrassing questions and possible misunderstandings. It was left that Mr. Harriman would indicate to the DFEC what his views are on the question of publication in the light of the expected Congressional discussions regarding the Mutual Defence Assistance Act. According to the United States representative, Mr. Harriman is likely to suggest that the over-all totals (but not the figures for individual countries) in the two reports should be made public for possible use in an open session of the United States Congress. He will probably propose that he should be able to disclose at secret or executive sessions of Congressional Committees the figures in the reports regarding the individual countries (including those not requesting United States assistance as well as those seeking assistance). It was not clear whether Mr. Harriman would wish to have such figures attributed to the DFEC or whether he would be able merely to indicate that they were figures "which had been made available to the United States Government". It appeared, however, that he would probably want to say that the statistics had been assembled by the DFEC.

Note de la Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Defence Liaison Division to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], April 5, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE AND FINANCE MEETINGS

You asked me for a note on my impressions of the North Atlantic meetings which I attended in The Hague and in London last week. The meetings of the Defence Committee, the Military Committee, and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee have, of course, been reported by Mr. Claxton and Mr. Wilgress and I shall not attempt to make any comprehensive statement of what was discussed and the results achieved, but confine myself to a few notes on the atmosphere of the meetings and some of the trends in thinking on North Atlantic matters which were more apparent in our private conversations than they were in the meetings themselves.

2. Although the Defence Committee, like the Military Committee meeting which preceded it, completed its agenda in about five hours, there was more real discussion than had taken place at either of the previous meetings of the Defence Committee in Washington and Paris. Mr. Louis Johnson had evidently been advised to tread more gently on the susceptibilities of his European colleagues, for on this occasion, he made few attempts to lay down the law or limit discussion, but presided with the air of a somewhat Olympian but benevolent pastor, well pleased with his flock who sang his (and each other's) praises and said "Amen" to all U.S. suggestions.

3. If the brevity of the meeting cannot be blamed on Mr. Johnson, neither can it altogether be explained by the excellent staff work that had preceded it in the Military Committee, the Standing Group and the Military Production and Supply Board. I suppose we should not be too depressed to be reminded that there is still a serious problem of confidence in implementing the North Atlantic Treaty, especially on the military side. At The Hague it was obvious that the Europeans still had at the back of their minds the fear that the United States and even the United Kingdom may not be wholly and irrevocably committed to an effective defence of Western Europe. On the other hand, the Americans for their part were still seriously concerned by the security risks involved in sharing vital information with the European members; while all the Ministers tacitly accepted the fact the defence plans they were approving would be more useful if they had some prospect of being financed within the economic resources of the North Atlantic area.

4. The "Medium Term Plan" which the Defence Ministers approved at The Hague sets forth in detail the forces considered essential for the effective defence of the North Atlantic area by July 1, 1954 — the date by which the Soviet Union may be capable of launching a major atomic attack. There has as yet been no decision as to how those forces should be financed, raised, or allocated as between regions and countries. The plan, as it stands, simply says what target would be required to act in accordance with the strategic concept approved by the previous meeting of the Defence Committee in Paris last December, and subsequently approved by the Council in January.

Finance

5. It was assumed in the Defence Committee discussion of the plan that there was no prospect of the North Atlantic community being able to afford, in peacetime, anything so ambitious as a plan calling for forces of the order of 90 divisions. The Finance Ministers, meeting in London three days before the Defence Committee, had faced the same problems more realistically; they approved a request to the Defence Committee asking it to make an estimate of the cost of the military plan. The Defence Ministers, in turn, decided at their meeting, that while they would comply with the Finance Ministers' request, they would like the Finance Committee to examine, without waiting for a detailed estimate, what additional financial and economic resources might be tapped in the North Atlantic community, to enable more adequate forces to be built up. Both the Finance Ministers and the Defence Ministers knew when they met that the Western Union Finance and Economic Committee had already estimated that the military plan for their region (calling for 35 divisions) would cost about $8 billion more than their total budgets for defence, plus U.S. aid up to June 30 of this year. When we remember that the total of all defence budgets of the European signatories of the Treaty for this year will come to only $5 billion, the Western Union deficit clearly cannot be met without sacrificing the economic recovery and health of the member countries. North Atlantic planning, calling for an army of 90 divisions (and naval and air forces on the same scale) might raise the deficit to something like $15 billion or more. In other words, the military plan approved by the Defence Ministers is not one which they expect can ever be put fully into effect, but was approved rather as a target considered desirable for security regardless of its financial implications. During the next few months, the process of adjustment between defence and finance will go on internationally in much the same way as it takes place during budget discussions within each country, and in the meantime the build-up of balanced military forces can go forward in the right direction even though it cannot go as far or as fast as the military think it should for security.

6. Although the Finance Ministers will go through the motions of studying additional financial and economic potentialities, it was clear from both the finance and defence meetings that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom have any intention of increasing their budgets for North Atlantic defence. Some of the smaller countries may perhaps find an additional $100 or $200 among them, but the total budgetary resources for defence of the North Atlantic countries are likely to remain at about the present level of $20.5 billion per annum. This will mean a very substantial scaling down of the military plan approved at The Hague.

7. The U.S. Chiefs of Staff are apparently not as worried as their European colleagues by the realization that there will be big cuts in the military objectives. General Bradley told General Foulkes that there was a good deal of fat in the present plan and it could safely be trimmed.

Standardization

8. The Defence Committee not only approved the military plan, but also reviewed the work of the Military Production and Supply Board. One of the primary military objectives of the North Atlantic Treaty was, of course, to achieve a measure of standardization in the interests of economy and combat efficiency. General Clark, Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff in London, summed up the progress in the field with the discouraging exaggeration that the North Atlantic countries "had not even standardized on their red tape!" The political, economic and commercial obstacles to standardization were illustrated at The Hague when it was found, for example, to be impossible to get agreement on the standardization on a common design for rifles and jeeps. In the case of rifles, the French have already started to make their own design and are not prepared to cut back production that is already under way. In the case of jeeps, the French wish to employ their own nationals and are, therefore, building additional production capacity although adequate idle capacity already exists in Northern Italy. Without substantial changes in tooling European factories, they could not manufacture models exactly on American standards. Even the question of spares for U.S. type equipment is causing difficulty and factory modifications to produce spares in Europe will have to be financed largely out of M.D.A.A. funds; but this is going to be done.

9. Speaking of commercial and economic barriers to standardization, Mr. Shinwell made a useful statement in the course of which he used a phrase which bears repetition. He said, "We have to consider the renunciation of at least a part of our industrial sovereignty." So long as we maintain it, he said, collective security, integration, and co-ordination of our North Atlantic efforts will suffer. We cannot, he added, go on producing where and what and when we like, but must be prepared to make sacrifices in the common interest. He did not, however, add that one of the best examples of failing to practice what he was preaching was unfortunately the establishment in the United Kingdom of picrite production facilities when idle capacity existed in Canada. Coming from the country that has kept the brakes on ECA moves for economic integration, the statement typified the fine expressions of faith without works that characterized most of the meetings.

10. Perhaps the most serious obstacle to standardization is security. The items of equipment which could, from the production point of view, most readily be standardized, are the new items; yet these are often the ones to which the greatest security is attached. The United States, United Kingdom, and Canadian Governments have been particularly reluctant to give the French and Portuguese highly classified information concerning research and development. Although Mr. Claxton was able to secure the agreement of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Shinwell to his previous invitation to the French to visit our anti-tank training establishments, there was very little progress in overcoming Anglo-American reluctance to make more information on weapons available to their European partners. European dissatisfaction with the state of affairs was calmly but firmly stated by Mr. Pleven, the French Defence Minister, in one of the few really frank statements made in the Defence Committee. In the course of his speech, Mr. Pleven said that he recognized that there were certain categories of information, such as atomic energy, which the European countries could not expect the United States to discuss with them, but they did feel that if they were to bear the brunt of the fight, they should be given the latest information concerning the best available standard equipment for the ordinary soldier.

11. Mr. Johnson had been warned in advance of what Mr. Pleven would say and he immediately suggested that the Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff of the various countries should come to Washington and discuss the release of information which would facilitate standardization and the production in the European countries of the latest types of standard U.S. equipment: Mr. Johnson added that if the other Defence Ministers agreed, General Bradley might head a U.S. mission to pay a return visit to the European signatories at a later date and iron out any remaining difficulties. This suggestion came as a surprise to everyone including General Bradley and the other members of the U.S. delegation. At General Bradley's suggestion, the invitation was slightly amended after lunch to specify that the various Defence Ministers should come to Washington separately. The clear implication was, of course, that the United States authorities wished to be more frank with some delegations than with others, notably the Portuguese and to a lesser extent, the French. The reaction to this invitation was naturally tentative, but it was welcomed by all as the most practical means of advancing standardization and releasing the maximum amount of classified information to the greatest number of North Atlantic countries. The arrangement may, of course, virtually supersede our present Canada-U.S.-U.K. military standardization agreement, which had had most of its life knocked out of it by the recent Templer Mission to Washington, bypassing the Canadian Government.[4]

12. General Clark, on our side, was privately prepared to agree with what Mr. Pleven said. Admittedly, security risks would be involved, but surely, he thought, they had to be accepted as part of the larger calculated risk on which we had embarked when we signed the Treaty. If the Russians were to learn, through the French, for example, of the penetrating power of our latest anti-tank guns and mines which we have not yet given the French, it was clearly impossible for them to scrap their existing tanks, and altogether likely that they would be making their future models with heavier steel whether or not they had specific intelligence about our latest weapons. This was the sort of risk that General Clark thought we should take if we were to make the Treaty mean anything. (Incidentally, General Clark also told me that he had gone to the Heads of J.I.C. and J.I.B. in London and had been unable to confirm the statement, reported by Colonel Ménard[5] from Paris in February, to the effect that top secret information recently given to the French by the British had been reported by British agents in Moscow to have reached the Russians; this was apparently nothing more than loose talk by the British Military Attaché in Paris and indicated more about his attitude than the state of French security.)

13. Although there has as yet been little real progress towards standardization and although there is a natural tendency by Defence and Finance Committees each to wait upon action by the other some useful progress was made in the definition of military goals on the basis of which important decisions can be taken by each of the countries for the strengthening of their respective regions. The North Atlantic community now has at its disposal about 20 divisions, half of them ill-equipped. The Planners have concluded that by 1954 it will need 90 divisions in order to meet any Soviet attack that could be mounted by that time. The Defence Committee did not in any sense commit governments to the acceptance of the creation of 90 divisions by 1954, but, even if financial limitations prevent more than two-thirds of this goal being realized, a great achievement will have been accomplished, and, we may well hope, one that will be sufficiently impressive to deter aggression if by 1954 the Soviet Union is no longer so concerned by the threat of atomic retaliation as they are today.

14. The Standing Group will now have the task of making recommendations to regional planning groups as to how the forces (which they themselves have estimated as the requirements for the defence of their respective regions) should be raised and allocated as between the various countries of each region. Some of the countries have already expressed the hope privately that the Standing Group will take a more active part than heretofore in recommending to regions and governments the particular forces on which they should be laying special emphasis. The Dutch, for example, should probably cut their naval programme. This would be a very difficult political decision in a country with a proud and long naval tradition. Yet, it would be easier for the Dutch Government to cut back their naval programme and expand their army programme if they had a recommendation to do so from the Standing Group or their regional planning group. The fact is that the North Atlantic community already has nearly all the naval forces that it is estimated would be required by 1954, whereas, it only has, in aggregate about one-third of the air forces and one-fifth of the land forces needed.

15. In spite of the apparently enormous gap between the forces we think the North Atlantic area needs and the forces we have any hope of being able to pay for, there is every prospect of using North Atlantic machinery in order to make a much more efficient use of the defence dollar. On the production side, the Western Union countries have already made a good deal of progress in standardization on aircraft and have reached agreement to specialize in their construction — Belgium, for example, manufacturing Meteor engines, and The Netherlands the airframes. In the same way, the very considerable overheads of the various national forces may well be reduced by means of North Atlantic planning so that, on a large scale, the same sort of specialization may be achieved as has been reached under Western Union, again by the Netherlands and Belgium, the Netherlands maintaining most of the overhead in terms of headquarters staff and equipment for the land forces of both countries, while Belgium performs the same function for both air forces.

Confidence

16. Nevertheless, the problem of confidence remains; and without confidence in the validity of the military conception, the political benefits which have already accrued from the signing of the Treaty, may not be maintained and expanded into other fields. The military plan does not disclose the reserve which the United States and Canada may be expected to have available to re-enforce the land forces of the various European regions. Even within the more intimate Western Union circle, the United Kingdom Government has not yet committed more than token forces to the defence of her continental partners. The reluctance of the United States and the United Kingdom to commit themselves is partly uncertainty as to what the strategic position might be by 1954, and partly distrust of the security of the continental members. Further, both the U.K. and U.S. realize that the strategy of the war would be determined by the country which possessed the strategic reserves; if the U.K. has already committed her available forces in advance, she would have a less influential role in determining the strategy of the conflict. However, from the European point of view, the present attitude of the U.S. and U.K. military authorities cannot be very reassuring.

The Press

17. Press comment on The Hague meetings was not particularly helpful in establishing mutual confidence. The American papers reported that the question of bases in Spain had been raised. I understand that the U.S. and Portuguese did raise the question but naturally the only implication drawn by the French and others was that the U.S. Chiefs did not expect to be able to maintain a foothold on the continent of Europe north of the Pyrenees.

18. A good deal more harm was done by the mischievous and irresponsible A.P. report, filed as a pure guess, that there had been agreement of some sort to withhold information from Mr. Strachey;[6] Mr. Johnson's half-hearted denials did not help the situation very much, especially at a time when Congress is about to consider next year's military aid programme.

Regional Planning or Area Planning

19. In more general terms, it seemed to me that the military planning under the North Atlantic Treaty, by being kept in fairly watertight regional compartments is tending to create the same kind of difficulties between North America and Western Europe, and between the United Kingdom and the Continent, as the E.C.A. programme has encountered in pressing for European economic integration. The United States would like to see her European partners take more active steps towards military (as well as economic) integration, but they (and particularly the United Kingdom) cannot very well do so unless they are assured in quite unequivocal terms, that the United States is not going to maintain a semi-detached position of patron, guide and financier, but is going to be bound by the same sort of military commitments as she is urging upon her European partners. As Mr. Bevin has recently said, what is needed seems to be not so much Western European Union — in either an economic or a military sense — as Western (or North Atlantic) unity; and in this context, perhaps the most worrying statement to emerge from the meetings in The Hague was General Bradley's private remark to General Foulkes that he did not think we should count on a U.S. military aid programme being continued after the termination of E.R.P. in 1952.

20. Finally, I might add that so far as I was aware, neither the United States nor the other delegations displayed any impatience with Canada for not having made, as yet, any contribution under Article 3,[7] other than the fine gesture of offering to train 250 army and air personnel in Canada, which was very well received.[8] The official of the Netherlands Foreign Ministry for North Atlantic matters remarked somewhat wryly that both Canada and the Netherlands seemed to be dragging their feet on the North Atlantic, and two of the senior U.S. officials concerned with Supply Board work in London asked me what Canada was planning to do. Apart from these instances, I heard no expressions of dissatisfaction with what we are doing, or not doing.

The Outlook

21. Before the Council meets in May, some serious thinking will have to be done as to how the problem of confidence may be overcome. Anything will help that forges lasting links — economic, social and political, as well as military — between the North American and the European partners. On the basis of The Hague meetings, it does not seem likely that a higher proportion of decisions to paper produced can be achieved by tinkering with the military machinery; the present regional set-up is a symptom rather than a cause of the trouble; and a joint meeting of Finance and Defence Ministers, which was suggested at The Hague, would probably give rise to more expectations than actions.

22. Until the United States is committed to a military and economic aid programme for her North Atlantic partners until at least 1954, at an annual rate of about 3 billion or so, the security of the North Atlantic community will continue to rest more on political bluff than on military and economic strength. It seems fantastic for the U.S. and other military authorities to imagine, as some of them do, that the French can be expected to raise, virtually unaided after 1952, an army of fifty or sixty divisions, as they did thirty-five years ago at the peak of their power.

23. The military machinery now set in motion will enable the North Atlantic area to spend its defence dollar to better effect: but it is by no means certain that it will enable a community of more than twice the population and industrial resources of the Soviet Union to produce armed forces capable of defending itself effectively in the event of a Soviet attack by 1954.

24. As one delegate put it privately, "the cost of living everywhere has gone up: the cost of freedom has gone up too".

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE AND FINANCE MEETINGS
COMMENTS ON MR. GEORGE'S MEMORANDUM OF APRIL 5, 1950

The "medium term plan" which the North Atlantic Defence Ministers approved at The Hague sets forth the forces considered essential for the effective defence of the North Atlantic area by July 1, 1954. Today the North Atlantic Community already has nearly all the naval forces required for this plan, but it has only about one-third of the air forces and one-fifth of the land forces required. At present the total expenditures of the North Atlantic Community on defence are about $20.5 billion a year. The total annual defence expenditures will have to be raised an unknown amount if the goal set in the medium term plan for 1954 is to be reached. By the end of this year it may be possible to make a rough estimate of how great the total increase would have to be. For purposes of our present thinking, we might reasonably take an increase of 25% to be necessary. This would mean an increase of $5 billion a year, of which $3 1/2 billion might come from North America and $1 1/2 billion from the United Kingdom and the Continent.

2. Mr. George reports that it was assumed in the Defence Committee discussions at The Hague that there was no prospect of the North Atlantic Community being able to afford defence expenditures large enough to reach the goal of the medium term plan by 1954. He refers in his report to the "apparently enormous gap between the forces we think the North Atlantic area needs and the forces we have any hope of being able to pay for".

3. It is clear that the nations which are members of the North Atlantic Community are "able" to pay for the minimum forces required in order to create and maintain an overwhelming preponderance of force against the Russians — which is the goal set by the Prime Minister for the North Atlantic Treaty. It is not a question of ability to pay for the defence expenditures but of willingness.

4. The discussion in the Economist for April 15 in the article entitled "The Mathematics of Security" is directly relevant. The argument in this article is that the right way to go about planning an effective defence policy, and an effective policy means one that prevents war from breaking out, is first to attempt an assessment of what is needed on a minimum basis without frills, and from that to deduce what the cost would be. It is consistent for a pacifist or a communist to say that a country or a group of allied countries cannot afford defence costs of this size. "But those who do not fall into either category, those who would vote the expenditure for a shooting war if matters went so far, are merely being purblind if they talk about not 'affording' enough defence expenditure to win the 'cold war'. They are, in effect, expressing a definite preference for infinitely higher expenditures at an early date. Even those who believe that the internal salvation of the British state depends upon a sharp reduction in the total of government expenditure must also believe, if they can think straight, that an increase in defence expenditure is necessary to its external safety."

5. Perhaps by the end of this year the further studies of the medium term defence plan and of the costs of that plan may have gone far enough for a reasonably accurate estimate to be made of what increase in national defence budgets would be required to carry the medium term plan into effect. Mr. George, in his memorandum, reports that one suggestion made at The Hague was that there might at some stage be a "joint meeting of Finance and Defence Ministers". An alternative suggestion is that in about a year's time there might be a special meeting of the North Atlantic Council at which the members would be represented by their Prime Ministers, who would be accompanied by their Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Defence and Finance. At such a meeting it might be possible for the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to reach agreement on the scale of total rearmament required and on a roughly equitable distribution of the resultant burden.

YOUR MEMORANDUM OF APRIL 18 ON MR. GEORGE'S MEMORANDUM OF APRIL 5 CONCERNING THE NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE AND FINANCIAL MEETING

Attached is a memorandum from the Chiefs of Staff Committee with letter dated April 19 discussing the problems of defence planning to date.[9]

2. The memorandum points out that there is a great deal of duplication in the so-called "medium term plan" approved by the recent meeting of the Defence Committee. The memorandum notes that this so-called plan was arrived at by simply adding up the requirements of the regional plans, which were themselves unduly inflated. If this memorandum is sound, it would appear that by integration of forces and co-ordination of defence planning the total requirements are likely to be much less than those envisaged in the plan adopted by the Defence Committee. Rationalization of planning would involve serious limitations on the freedom of individual members of NATO to have the types of forces which they might desire for reasons of prestige. However, the gap between existing expenditures and expenditures required is probably much less than we have been assuming.

3. I wonder however if the military goal does not need re-defining. The "preponderance of force" might be deemed to mean more forces in being than the U.S.S.R., and if so would probably result in a long armaments race. On the other hand, a preponderance of force might be held to mean total power, which could include industrial and economic capacity. If this meaning is taken, NATO now has, clearly, a preponderance and could probably win out in a long war.[10] To win the cold war, what would appear to be needed is rather sufficient forces in being and sufficient co-ordination of these forces to make aggression by the U.S.S.R. seem immediately dangerous to it. If this is the goal, we would probably need substantially more forces in being and much closer co-ordination of planning than has so far been achieved.

4. I wonder if this is a point that should be developed for the Minister under the item on the agenda for review of the report of the Defence Financial and Economic Committee.[11]

VII. NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; PROGRESS OF DEFENCE PLANNING

30. The Minister of National Defence stated that progress in North Atlantic Treaty organization planning had been made as regards production of a Medium Term Defence Plan, a security system, release of information, the organization of a permanent secretariat and certain requests to the Military Production and Supply Board and to the Defence Finance and Economic Committee. This progress, however, was in the main merely a production of documents. There was the possibility that the procedure now followed might, if continued, prevent the North Atlantic Treaty Organization from making further necessary progress. There was a considerable sense of frustration in both the Military and Defence Committees, which resulted from a procedure which had permitted little if any time for consideration

It seems to me that our goal must be to win the cold war. [or not to lose? R.A. MacKay]. Mr. St. Laurent sold the Treaty to the Canadian people as a treaty to preserve peace not as a treaty to win war; his argument was that our best means of averting war was to maintain a preponderance of force over the Russians so overwhelming that they would not risk an attack on us. This is the argument which he has constantly and consciously used. E. R[eid].

and discussion. The programme of work had been greatly influenced by the timetable of the U.S. Congress and its discussions on the Mutual Defence Assistance Act.

The Medium Term Defence Plan was a conglomeration of plans which had not yet been fully integrated, resulting in the force requirements which had been added together to indicate the total N.A.T.O. force requirements. These requirements were even considered by U.S. authorities to be in excess of actual requirements and moreover to be impossible of attainment by 1954. The approval of an unrealistic plan including excessive force requirements impossible of attainment was being reflected in the work of other committees. Both the Military Production and Supply Board and the Defence Finance and Economic Committee had been asked to undertake projects with this unrealistic military plan as the basis. There was general uneasiness throughout the N.A.T.O. countries concerning the plan. Any suggestions to improve the present arrangements would undoubtedly be received with interest.

The security problem, which caused great aggravation among some of the N.A.T.O. countries, still remained to be solved. A frank agreement to exchange information in certain fields, such as hand weapons, operational procedures, motor vehicles, anti-tank weapons and communications, was an essential first step towards planning on a realistic basis.

In order to develop a sound realistic defence plan, the following steps, in order of priority, should be undertaken by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization:

(a) the solution of the security problem;

(b) a reorganization of the Standing Group so that it will be representative of the various groups, either through the present membership, by assuming responsibility for the individual regions, or, preferably, by the addition of other members so that each region may have its views adequately represented and ways and means of implementing the regional plans can be fully discussed and co-ordinated;

(c) the development of a fully integrated military plan which must be examined as to feasibility in the field of production and finance;

(d) the adjustment of the military plan necessitated by financial and production limitations imposed by the present and future capabilities of the member nations; and,

(e) the agreement of the respective governments for the development of the forces and the provision of equipment necessary to implement the finally accepted plan.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

31. The Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that the work now being carried out by the Defence Finance and Economic Committee on this unrealistic plan, with heavy force requirements, might lead to recriminations against Canada as a supplier country. For the Council now to give formal approval to the plan, might be a dangerous step as at a later date it might prove clear that the N.A.T.O. countries would not be able to provide the forces which had been formally agreed to. It would seem more appropriate to avoid formal approval of the plan at this time and at the same time indicate some of the problems which were developing from its acceptance by the Military and Defence Committees.

32. The Chief of the General Staff stated that unless a military plan could be implemented it could not be considered as a plan. It was necessary that the responsibility for realistic planning be borne by regional groups and that regional group planning be related to the manpower and resources available in the respective regions. Equipment might be provided from outside, but the primary responsibility for the defence of a region must rest with the nations comprising that region.

33. General Foulkes suggested the desirability of reorganizing the Standing Group so that its members would be representative of the various regions. Only in this way could regional plans be truly integrated and a recommendation as to the overall plans of N.A.T.O. forces be developed.

34. The Prime Minister indicated that the psychological problem of changing the balance of the various national armed forces by arms was one which would require considerable study and finesse in recommendation.

35. The Secretary to the Cabinet stated that the present plan, which had been arrived at by the simple addition of the excessive individual regional group requirements, was a dangerous statement, which would be much more dangerous if there was a breach of security. The disparity between what the plan showed as necessary and the present strength would only encourage Russian aggression, and discourage the North Atlantic solidarity and determination.

36. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that, if the circumstances made this possible and desirable, the recommendations of the Minister of National Defence should be discussed informally by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the forthcoming North Atlantic Council meeting in London, with a view to a more realistic approach to defence planning and action by all agencies of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

ACTION UNDER ARTICLE 2 AND THE OTHER NON-MILITARY PROVISIONS OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I saw Mr. Reid while I was in Ottawa on this subject and was shown three Department papers none of which so far has been approved by the Minister. One summarized the views of Missions for the information of the Minister and concluded that the views expressed "varied widely" and did not make any specific suggestions how Article 2[12] might be used. This paper† which was prepared by Mr. Plumptre made specific reference to a talk which he had had with you reporting that in your opinion Article 2 should be regarded as a pledge which could be applied in promoting particular policies as well as general objectives which might be worked out between the signatories of the Pact.

2. The second paper† contained suggestions drawn up by Mr. Plumptre as to the line which the Canadian member might take at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, now expected early in May. The suggestion was that the Canadian member might propose the setting up of an informal ad hoc group which would consider the following questions:

(a) Is it desirable to establish formal machinery immediately to implement Article 2, or is it preferable to use Article 2 as a statement of principles to guide the signatories in forming their economic policies, and to which each could appeal if it were felt that the action of others was inconsistent with these principles?

(b) If formal machinery were to be established under Article 2, could or should non-signatory countries take part?

(c) Bearing in mind (i) that E.C.A. Aid is tapering off, and (ii) that O.E.E.C. consists exclusively of European countries, and (iii) that it is of the utmost military importance that signatory countries on the two sides of the Atlantic should not drift apart, are there any arrangements which should be planned under Article 2, to keep the signatories together?

Plumptre suggested that before taking up a proposal that these questions might be studied following the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, it would be desirable that the questions should be discussed with the United States and the United Kingdom either individually or through the tripartite machinery established in Washington.

3. The third paper† which I saw was a memorandum from Mr. Reid to the Minister suggesting that consideration be given to the Canadian member on the North Atlantic Council making a statement regarding the various possibilities of implementing the non-military provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty. Thus reference to Article 1 in which the parties pledge themselves "to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered ...", might be used as a basis for reviewing the present dangerous relationship between the Soviet Union and the members of the Pact. Action on Article 2 might be considered in a number of different ways, such as the setting up of a permanent committee charged with specific responsibilities or by using the pledge of Article 2 for the purpose of working out joint agreed policies in the economic field to be implemented voluntarily and individually by each signatory. It might also be used to permit periodic discussions of economic problems in the North Atlantic Council with a view to their joint solution. Reference to Article 2 it is suggested by the Minister, might include the point that Canada had some misgivings about present trends, particularly the formation of a European bloc, and a statement of preference that some consideration be given to a "North Atlantic" approach to these problems.

4. Article 4 which provides that the parties "will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened" might be employed for discussion of the present dangerous situation in Southeast Asia as well as other areas, in which the "security" of any of the Parties is particularly threatened by Communist aggression.

5. Mr. Reid left me with the impression that no attempt would be made to urge the establishment of any formal machinery at the next meeting of the North Atlantic Council. The Minister had expressed a desire to have the fullest possible consideration given to the line which he might take in the Council and every possibility was being explored. Mr. Reid said that he had read with interest our report of State Department views on the possible agenda for the Council meeting and hoped that further reports would follow. He thought that the Minister would probably express his views on the papers which had been submitted to him some time this week and a telegram would be sent to you indicating the particular lines of thought which the Minister wished to be explored with the State Department.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, March 31, 1950

Dear Mr. Pearson,

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING

I enclose a set of working papers dated March 31 which have been prepared in the Department on the question of the agenda of the meeting of the North Atlantic Council which is expected to take place in London about May 15. An extra set of the papers is attached for Mr. Wrong and I have given Mr. Riddell a set. The titles of the papers are given on the cover page. I have called them "working papers" since there has not been time to bring them together in one memorandum and to eliminate any differences in emphasis or approach which may exist.

2. There are a few general considerations which I would like to mention to supplement what is contained in the papers.

3. We have from the beginning regarded the North Atlantic Treaty as providing the constitutional framework for a North Atlantic Community which has been in existence for many generations. The constitution is rudimentary but it has resulted in the creation of a principal constitutional organ for the North Atlantic Community — the North Atlantic Council.

4. The North Atlantic Council, like the constitutional organs of any national community, suffers from defects. Its members are of unequal calibre. The states which they represent vary greatly in size and in importance and, at least so far as Portugal is concerned, differ in certain fundamental characteristics. However, it is the only general organ which the North Atlantic Community possesses and, if we are to make progress towards our goal of a more united and stronger North Atlantic Community, there seems to be no alternative but to make the fullest possible use of this organ, imperfect as it is.

5. It is therefore all to the good that it has been decided that the Council, at its next meeting, should discuss some of the fundamental questions of foreign policy which affect all the members of the North Atlantic Community.

6. The Council in its first discussion of these fundamental questions will have to feel its way much as the meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers at Colombo felt its way, and my guess is that the discussions in London will be somewhat similar to the discussions at Colombo both in their general characteristics and in the value to be derived from them. Each member of the Alliance will have an opportunity to learn more at first hand of the general approach of the other members to common problems and each member, after the meeting has taken place, will be in a better position to make its own decisions in the light of a greater understanding of the aims and policies of the other members. This could be the beginning of a process, which you mentioned at Kingston in September 1948, of a pooling not only of risks and resources but also of control over policy.[13]

7. A discussion of this kind can serve two useful purposes. In the first place, it can help to disabuse people of the impression, which is still prevalent even in Canada, that the North Atlantic Treaty has done no more than to set up a military alliance, and that the obligations of members are not only purely military but are also confined to the North Atlantic area.

8. The obligations of the Treaty arise out of the first five articles. The obligations of the fifth article arise in the event of hostilities in the North Atlantic area. The obligations of the first four are in effect in peacetime and are not restricted to an area. So far, the Council has taken steps to implement only the obligations of Article 3. It has not taken steps to implement the obligations of Articles 1, 2 and 4. The longer there is delay in implementing the obligations of these three articles the more difficult it will be to persuade people that the Treaty is not merely a military alliance. Discussions at the Council of the items on the agenda suggested by the United States, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and France will in itself be a measure of implementation of Articles 1, 2 and 4.

9. Perhaps the principal reason why it is important to emphasize now that the Treaty is more than a military alliance and that it has created a constitutional framework for the North Atlantic Community is that the crisis of the last few months has indicated that there is a growing and dangerous sense of frustration in the Western world arising out of a feeling that Western policy is a mere negative policy of containment. I have myself never liked the term "containment" and prefer the term which you have always used, and that is "the necessity of maintaining a preponderance of force" over the Russians and their potential allies — a preponderance of force made up of military, economic and moral factors, a preponderance great enough to persuade the Russians that if they attack us they will be overwhelmingly defeated.

10. Even this concept of maintaining a preponderance of force is, however, a negative concept and it would be better if we could in future speak rather of the positive task of increasing the strength, the prosperity, the freedom and the unity of the free world. The maintenance of a preponderance of force could then be put in proper perspective, not as an end of policy but as a method of giving the free world reasonable security from war so that we can go ahead with the positive tasks which we consider important.

11. If we are in for a long period of cold war, and it would be unwise to assume anything else, governments will have to ask their peoples over a long period to pay very heavy costs, not only in terms of defence appropriations and economic assistance but also of living in a constant atmosphere of tension. The willingness of people to pay these costs would be greater if they felt that they were making sacrifices not merely to defend themselves but also to accomplish the positive task of creating a free, prosperous and progressive society.

[13] Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches, 1948, No. 48.

12. The other main reason why a discussion of important questions of foreign affairs at the Council meeting in May could serve a useful purpose is that, as Anne O'Hare McCormick has pointed out in her column in the New York Times for last Wednesday, March 29, "unity in the West is unquestionably the pre-condition of any fruitful conversations with the East ... and not since the war have differences and irritations among the Western governments been as noticeable as they are now". It would clearly be dangerous to enter into important new conversations with the Russians until a much greater measure of agreement has been reached among the principal Western powers on the main questions which now divide them, such as European integration, German policy, relations with the Chinese Communist Government.

13. There will obviously be certain important subjects which, for one good reason or another, it would not be wise to discuss formally at a certain meeting of the North Atlantic Council. This does not, however, mean that a subject should be kept off the agenda merely because discussion of it would embarrass one of the members of the Council. If the Council is to discuss important questions of foreign policy, its discussions are bound at times to embarrass one or more members of the Council. That may, indeed, be the main purpose of the discussion.

14. I hope that one of the most useful discussions at the London meeting of the Council will be on psychological warfare. It might, for example, be possible to reach a general measure of agreement on the line which you have been following, and that is that we should stop attacking communism as such and direct our attacks on Russian imperialism and Chinese imperialism. It follows, I suggest, from this that we should not attack the satellite states but should attack their governments as quisling governments and sympathize with the satellite countries for having been reduced by the Russians to the status of colonies or conquered provinces.

15. This would be part of a general line of playing up Western democracy as being a liberating force in the world and Russian and Chinese imperialism as being an enslaving force. If we are to do this successfully, we must be sure that we emphasize positive concepts in our propaganda and not negative concepts. We should not, for example, say that all those who are against Stalin are for us, since that is purely negative, but we should say that all those who are in favour of building up the free world — whether they live in Czechoslovakia or India or France — are on our side.

16. One small but significant point on which I hope that we could all agree is that we would stop calling the local communist movements "left-wing movements" and the pro-communist factions of socialist parties "left-wing socialists". Every time we use these terms we are acting as effective agents of Russian propaganda. The point we should drive home is that communist parties are "reactionary parties" and pro-communist socialist parties are "reactionary so-called socialist parties".

17. If the French ever could be got to see this point, they would seat the Communist deputies alongside the most reactionary deputies of the right.

18. From our experience at the Colombo Conference, I suggest that the working party in Washington discuss not only the agenda of the meeting in London but also the physical arrangements for the meeting. The smaller the conference table, the

18. From our experience at the Colombo Conference, I suggest that the working party in Washington discuss not only the agenda of the meeting in London but also the physical arrangements for the meeting. The smaller the conference table, the fewer the people who are in the room, the more informal the atmosphere, the more likely is it that the discussions will be useful. I would suggest, for example, that the table at which the Foreign Ministers meet should be no larger than to seat comfortably fourteen people — the twelve Foreign Ministers and two secretaries or interpreters, and that each Foreign Minister be restricted to having three advisers in the room and that there be no other people in the room.

19. You might also wish to suggest that the first meeting be held in public for half an hour or an hour, and that the final meeting be held in public.

20. Since it is difficult to forecast how long the session of the Council might usefully last, might it not be wise to use some such formula as that used in the invitations to the Colombo Conference — e.g., that the session of the Council will begin on Monday morning, May 15, that it is hoped that it will conclude by Thursday afternoon, May 18, but that it is possible that the session may continue over Friday and perhaps Saturday.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, March 31, 1950

AGENDA FOR MEETING OF NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

In accordance with your instructions some preliminary consideration has been given in the Department to items which the Canadian Government might suggest for inclusion in the Agenda of the Council meeting. You may wish to discuss these with Mr. Wrong in New York during the next few days. The following items are suggested:

Item 1 "Economic collaboration amongst the signatories and elimination of conflict in their international economic policies". You will notice that that item deliberately picks up the language of the second sentence of Article 2 reading as follows:

> "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them".

Memorandum C suggests the lines along which discussion of Article 2 might initiated in the Council.

Item 2 "Methods by which the members of the North Atlantic Alliance which are also members of the United Nations can make more effective use of the machinery of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for purposes which are common to the Charter and to the North Atlantic Treaty". Memorandum D explains the purpose of this item.

Item 3 Proposal for the coordination of psychological warfare. The term "psychological warfare" is to be avoided and some such expression as the "exchange of information" to be preferred. A definite item has not been suggested for inclusion on the Agenda on this subject as it may be discussed under a number of general items which have already been proposed by other Governments. Memorandum E suggests the line which might be taken if you decide to raise this matter.

2. Proposals for items on the Agenda have already been put forward in the Working Group by the United Kingdom, United States, Netherlands and French representatives (see memorandum B). You will notice that these proposals are very general in character. A discussion of relations between the western democracies and the Soviet Union could take place under several of the items. More concrete questions such as the possibility of a new initiative in negotiation with the Soviet Union, the problem of Germany, or South East Asia might come up. The Working Group in its meetings next week will attempt to elucidate these broad general items further.

3. For reasons stated in the memorandum on the co-ordination of psychological warfare it is suggested that the fourth United Kingdom item "Possible measures to combat the Communist menace" should be revised by substituting for "Communist menace" something like "Russian imperialism" or "the use of Communism as an instrument of Russian imperialism".

PRELIMINARY PROPOSALS FOR INCLUSION IN THE AGENDA OF NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING IN MAY

The representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and France have each put forward on behalf of their respective countries a list of subjects for discussions at the meeting of the Working Group next week. It is hoped that these discussions will lead to an agreed agenda for the proposed Council meeting in May. Our Ambassador in Washington has forwarded the details of these four sets of proposals in teletype messages WA-730—March 27,† WA-736—March 28,† and WA-756—March 29.† These proposals, including our Ambassador's comments on the French list, are as follows:

1. United States (WA-730) (para. 5)

I. Review of progress in implementing Treaty in year since signature in light of world political developments as they affect security and well-being of members. Relating these developments in terms of the pact objectives of maintaining peace by building strength.

II. Discussion of means to be used in more vigorously promoting agreed pact objectives (especially in fields closer cooperation and mutual aid).

III. What should be the next steps in the development of the pact.

2. United Kingdom (WA-730) (para. 6)

I. General approval of strategic plans or concepts submitted by Defence Committee.

II. Development of North Atlantic Treaty Organization machinery.

III. Possible coordination of policy among North Atlantic Treaty Powers.

IV. Possible joint measures to combat the Communist menace.

3. The Netherlands (WA-736) (para. 3)

(a) The discussion of the question of mobilizing further material and moral means for the combat of Communism. (This seems to correspond roughly with item 2 of the United States proposals for the agenda and with item 4 of the United Kingdom proposal).

(b) The study of possible means of co-operation in the economic field after 1952. (This presumably relates to action under Article 2 of the Treaty).

4. France (WA-756) (para. 1 and para. 3)

1. Approbation des décisions prises par le Comité de Défense,

2. Aide mutuelle pour l'organisation de la défense militaire: résultats obtenus — prévisions,

3. Organisation de l'échange d'information concernant les problèmes politiques communs,

4. Création éventuelle d'un organisme chargé de coordonner les activités des comités existants,

5. Directives relatives à l'application de l'Article No. 2 du Pacte.

3. The first point in the French proposals — "the approval of the decisions of the Defence Committee" — is the same as the first point in the United Kingdom proposal (see paragraph 6 of my message WA-730). The second point — "mutual aid for the organization of military defence — review of the results obtained and consideration of plans for the future" — roughly corresponds to the second of the United States points (see paragraph 5 of my message WA-730). The third point — "the organization of the exchange of information concerning common political problems" — is similar to the United Kingdom third point (see paragraph 6 of my WA-730). The fourth point — "the eventual establishment of a body charged with the co-ordination of the activities of existing committees" is included in the more general language of the third of the United States points (see paragraph 5 of my message WA-730). This item apparently contemplates the possible establishment of a continuing body similar to the Brussels Permanent Commission. The idea of setting up such a body had previously been suggested by Mr. Perkins, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, as reported in my message WA-624 of March 15th.† The fifth item relating to Article 2 has, of course, a longer history, but more recently was mentioned as one of the points favoured by the Netherlands Government for discussion (see paragraph 3 of my message WA-736).

AGENDA FOR NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING IN MAY; DISCUSSION OF ARTICLE 2

It is suggested that you should discuss this matter with Mr. Wrong in New York during the next few days. Separate memoranda are being prepared on other items proposed for the Agenda.

2. A statement is being prepared in the Department which you might give at the Council meeting. This statement follows lines which you have already approved:

(a) You might open with a general discussion of the importance of keeping Europe and North America from drifting apart economically. This is a constant danger because of the dollar shortage in Europe and the restrictions that European countries have to impose on their imports from North America.

(b) You might then lead into some discussion of Canadian misgivings regarding some of the more extreme forms of European integration. Some isolationist tendencies seem to have developed in Europe and to have received some support from certain quarters in the United States.

(c) You might possibly want to make some reference to the first sentence of Article 2 which reads as follows: "The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being."

(d) You might discuss a number of alternative forms of "implementing" Article 2 of the Treaty. These forms might include the following:

(i) A permanent formal committee might be set up and charged with specific responsibilities.

(ii) The Article might be considered as a general commitment of the signatories needing no machinery for its implementation; the signatories might act voluntarily and individually in accordance with its terms, using it only as a principle to which any one of the signatories might appeal if the behaviour of another appeared to contravene it.

(iii) The Article might be implemented by periodic discussions in the Council of common economic problems with a view to joint solution.

3. If discussions in the Council go favourably you might suggest that the question of implementing Article 2 should be referred out of the Council for further study. Either the Working Group or an Ad Hoc Group of Experts might present a report to a later meeting. This report might be based on the following specific questions among others:

(i) What form should implementation take?

(ii) Should certain non-signatory countries be invited to take some part?

(iii) Even if no formal machinery is set up immediately, is it desirable to make plans for collaboration looking beyond 1952?

You may decide that you want to put an item on the Agenda for the Council Meeting on this subject. If so, I suggest the following:

"Economic Collaboration Amongst the Signatories and the Elimination of Conflict in their International Economic Policies."

You will notice that this item deliberately picks up the language of the second sentence of Article 2, reading as follows: "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

4. The Netherlands is putting forward a somewhat similar item, reading as follows:

"The Study of Possible Means of Cooperation in the Economic Field after 1952".

It seems undesirable to limit the study of cooperation to what may take place after 1952.

5. You will no doubt want to discuss with Mr. Wrong the contents of your proposed statement to the Council, and to suggest that further discussion after the Council should go on in the Working Group or some group of experts. In addition you might ask him whether your proposals should be discussed in some detail in advance with the United States and the United Kingdom and, if so, whether this should be done under Tripartite auspices.

AGENDA FOR THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING

For a number of reasons, it would be desirable if a discussion could take place in the Council of the North Atlantic Alliance on the general question of relations with the Soviet Union and of policy in the Far East. In regard to the first of these topics, there are evidences of perplexity and misunderstanding concerning the United States policy amongst other members of the Alliance, and in regard to the second there are serious divergencies in policy which, although they may not need to be removed, should at least be fully comprehended by all members of the group. There are, however, obvious objections to placing either of these topics on the agenda directly and specifically. The Government of the United States has recently taken a firm line in public in regard to the question of a new approach to the Soviet Union, and a discussion in the North Atlantic Council of this topic might prove embarrassing to the participants. In regard to the Far East, there would be valid objections to placing on the agenda of the North Atlantic Council an item referring to that area, because other important states which are not members of the North Atlantic Council have a primary interest in the area. It would, for example, be difficult for the United Kingdom and the United States governments to explain to the Australian and Indian governments why they had consented to a discussion of Far Eastern affairs in a Council in which those states were not represented. For these reasons, it might be preferable to approach a general discussion of relations with the Soviet Union or policy in the Far East indirectly, and with this consideration in view, it is suggested that a topic be included on the agenda in the following terms: "Methods by which the members of the North Atlantic Alliance which are also members of the United Nations can make more effective use of the machinery of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for purposes which are common to the Charter and the North Atlantic Treaty".

A discussion as suggested of policy in regard to the United Nations would lead directly into a consideration of the representation of China at the United Nations, and, indirectly, to discussions of the recognition of the new Chinese government and other Far Eastern questions. It would lead also into a discussion of policy to be adopted in regard to the Soviet Union, once Soviet Delegations have returned to United Nations meetings. Consideration could then be given to the question whether some agency of the United Nations, or some body specially summoned for the purpose, would be the most useful channel for a new approach to the Soviet Union, assuming that such an approach was desirable.

It might be objected that a group of members of the United Nations should not enter into a private discussion of their policies in regard to that organization. Alternatively, objection might be made to a discussion of United Nations matters in a group which includes two states that are not members of the United Nations. There are, however, numerous precedents for informal discussions amongst groups of members of the United Nations in regard to United Nations policy. A discussion in the North Atlantic Council of United Nations matters would, moreover, have the effect of underlining the fact that the North Atlantic Alliance is a regional group within the United Nations. As far as the Italians and Portuguese are concerned, the other members of the North Atlantic Council would gladly have them as members of the United Nations immediately if that were possible, and there should be no objection to discussing in their presence the best methods of making effective use of United Nations machinery.

RE PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE AND RELATED SUBJECTS

It would be possible to discuss psychological warfare at the North Atlantic Council meetings under Item II of the tentative agenda proposed by the United States representative on the Working Committee ("Discussion of means to be used in more vigorously promoting agreed pact objectives"); under Item IV of the tentative agenda suggested by the United Kingdom representative ("Possible joint measures to combat the Communist menace"); and under the Netherlands proposal ("The discussion of the question of mobilizing further material and moral means for the combat of Communism").

It was thought that, at the Council meeting, you might raise the matter whether or not it is specifically mentioned in the agenda. You might suggest that, in their propaganda directed toward the U.S.S.R. and the satellites, including China, the signatory countries,

(a) co-ordinate the timing of their broadcasts, and the frequencies, with a view to maximizing the barrage of transmitters seeking to penetrate the "jamming" curtain and to avoiding interference with one another; (The B.B.C. and the Voice of America are already doing this.)

(b) by stressing accounts of social services, show that the democratic powers have been able to make provisions for the economic security of their citizens without robbing them of their freedom;

(c) play down issues on which they are divided, e.g., recognition of China;

(d) stress issues on which they present a united front.

You might also suggest, as a very practical measure, that they exchange information on the main lines that they are pursuing in their propaganda directed towards the trans-curtain countries and Germany. Such exchanges would enable them to reduce to a minimum the area of inconsistency in their propaganda.

In the cold war, as in a shooting war, every effort should be made to weaken the enemy in relation to our own strength. It follows that we should try to build up the morale of our own side as well as destroy that of the potential enemy. Accordingly, it might be suggested to the signatory powers that they build up a concept of the North Atlantic community among their own peoples by stressing the spiritual heritage of Western civilization which they all possess in common: the whole catalogue of human rights, which are denied in the Russian-dominated countries; and the fundamental belief that the state is made for man, not man for the state. These are the things that the North Atlantic Treaty is designed to preserve.

Finally, you might suggest that people stop talking about Communism, and indeed thinking of it, as the principal threat to our institutions: we should unceasingly label Communism as the fifth column of Russian imperialism. If we do this, it should have a salutary effect on the peoples of our own countries and on the peoples of the satellite countries, Germany, and other countries where there is confusion of thought.

As regards the handling of psychological warfare in the Department, the difficulty is that we have never been able to assign a single officer to devote all his time to it. We are, however, about to begin to give some effective policy guidance to the International Service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.[14] I shall let you have a report on this matter next week.

ATLANTIC COUNCIL — GERMANY

Under any general item on the agenda of the Atlantic Council which involves consideration of the relations between the Western world and Russia, the question of Germany will almost certainly arise. We have, therefore, given some thought in the Department to what views you might wish to put forward.

2. Our interest in Germany is of course similar to that of other middle power participants in the last war and we have continued to hope that the time might come when it would be possible for us to take an active part in a final German settlement.

3. That time is likely to be long in arriving, but the situation in Germany has not grown to be of any less moment to Canada and the west, rather the contrary, and yet little or no attention has been given to the subject in Canada. For this reason amongst others it might be useful to raise the matter at the Council.

4. Our immediate interest arises out of our commitments under the North Atlantic Treaty, which, while the occupation of Germany lasts, includes part of that country in the defence area of the Pact (Article 6). This therefore makes the settlement of Germany of direct concern to the signatories of the Pact. Moreover, it is in Germany perhaps that there are to be found issues of trade and political and administrative relationships on which some approach might be made to the whole problem of relations between the West and the Russian bloc.

5. In the paragraphs that follow the argument has been limited to the main principles of a fresh approach to the German problem which the western countries might discuss. No formal responsibility of the Council for the German settlement is suggested, nor is it implied in any way that the Allied High Commission in Germany can or should be held answerable to the Council for its policies.

6. The justification for raising the matter in the Council is the legal responsibility of its members under the Pact, the persistent and aggressive impact of Russian policy in the Eastern Zone on the German Federal Republic and the rest of Europe, and the desirability of having the countries of the west examine the problem even in its most general terms from common ground.

7. Ultimately if a collective attitude towards Germany were conceived in the west, the basic aim to bring that country into harmony and organic relationship with western democracy would become a more practicable one.

Proposals for a German Policy

8. It is our opinion that the western policy in Germany should pursue three objectives:

(a) to bring as much of Germany as possible into a Western European community;

(b) to strive for the reunification of Germany by preparing the ground now and by refraining from acts likely to make reunification more difficult;

(c) to strive for a four-power modus vivendi in Germany.

9. The first and second objectives are hardly separable. The Western Germans will not become whole-hearted members of the democratic community if it means perpetuating the present division of their country.

10. Again, no real progress can be made toward unity unless there is a four-power modus vivendi.

11. Briefly, our proposal is that the Western occupying powers should encourage the Western Germans to meet Eastern German representatives and eliminate conflicting administrative and legislative practices which have grown up on either side of the Elbe; as, for example, in such elementary matters as drafting, format of regulations, nomenclature, etc. This unscrambling of the egg would, of course, be essential before reunion would be possible. It would, if successful, result in agreements which could be embodied in a common constitution.

12. The representatives of the Federal Republic would only be competent to discuss those subjects which are within the German government's jurisdiction under the Occupation Statute and would naturally have to refer agreed recommendations back to Bonn for implementation under the Basic Law and the Occupation Statute.

17. The Western occupying powers might at the same time offer to meet the U.S.S.R. with a view to bringing legislative and administrative practices on the occupation level into conformity.

14. We realize that the U.S.S.R. has often shown it is unwilling to take any action to bring about German unity on any basis other than under Soviet domination. We do not imagine that the Soviet objectives in Germany have changed but, the U.S.S.R. is deeply committed to the cause of German unity, and would find it very awkward to reject proposals of this limited nature which are intended only as the necessary first steps towards unity. A Soviet rejection of this plan would therefore have a salutary effect on most Germans.

15. Should these conversations take place, the occupying powers could not take any action to prejudice the cause of German unity. But, we believe, it is going to be increasingly difficult to take this sort of action anyway, at least until the anti-German character of Soviet plans for national unity have been exposed.

16. This unavoidable restriction on Western freedom of action raises the greatest difficulty where the integration of Germany with Western Europe is concerned. It is assumed that present steps in this direction must continue. At the same time, we will have to avoid laying ourselves open to the charge that we are asking the Germans to choose between Western association and national unity. In any European organization in which the Germans are to take part special consideration should be given to the need of the Federal Republic to keep in touch with Eastern Germany, particularly in trade matters. In our view this need for special consideration would only disappear if the authorities in Eastern Germany rejected the overtures we are suggesting or if the talks broke down. It is to be hoped that in either event it could be made clear that, in the circumstances, German unity would only be accepted by the Communists under Soviet domination. The Western powers could then press on with the integration and strengthening of Western Europe after which it might be possible to revive the negotiations with more chance of success. Special precautions must, of course, be taken to see that Germany is not able to dominate Western Europe. It would be disastrous if, when the continent has regained its strength, the Germans are able to involve the Western world in a war of German unification.

17. This approach to the German problem is not an easy one and we do not wish to minimize the dangers of giving the Russians the chance to make propaganda without concessions. Nevertheless, we believe that neither the Western world nor the Germans of western outlook can be expected to write off Eastern Germany without first making a determined effort to bring all of Germany into the Western camp. The present suggestion is intended only to clear the way for unification as a more comprehensive scheme would undoubtedly be rejected as an imperialist plot to capture all of Germany. The present proposal could not invite such a charge. Its rejection by the U.S.S.R. would do much to remove any doubt about Soviet intentions in Germany and give the Western powers wider support and greater freedom of action in bringing Western Germany into the European community. If accepted by the U.S.S.R. the German talks would afford an opportunity to appeal to the Eastern Germans in a manner that might, for example, affect the October elections, disrupt the National Front and even encourage potential Titoists to break with the Kremlin.

18. Should the U.S.S.R. attempt to meet this modest plan with a more grandiose proposal for a peace conference, the West could reject it on the grounds that the suggestion was intended as a necessary preliminary to a general settlement and if no agreement could be reached in this limited field there would be no point in embarking on discussions of more contentious issues. If the U.S.S.R. accepted this proposal and substantial agreements were reached, the Western powers could then consider the other problems of a general settlement.

MR. REID'S MEMORANDUM CONCERNING A PROPOSED CANADIAN STATEMENT ON ARTICLE 2 OF THE N.A.T.

I note from Mr. Reid's memorandum of March 30 that he thinks Mr. Pearson might, in his statement at the meeting of the N.A.T. Council in New York, say something about "Canadian misgivings regarding some of the more extreme forms of European integration". I do not know whether Mr. Reid or Mr. Pearson will have seen Mr. Howe's remarks in the House of Commons of March 31. I suppose that Mr. Howe's remarks do not need to restrain our expressions of misgiving about "the more extreme forms" that integration might take but many of the doubts we had expressed thus far had been related to E.P.U. and it has now been given a fairly authoritative blessing.

The relevant portion of Mr. Howe's remarks concerning E.P.U. is as follows:

"The objective is a program that will make the pound and European currencies freely convertible. You might take the offhand view that this will mean a European bloc, and that trade with America will be influenced adversely. I do not agree with that view. I put that hypothesis before the officials in Paris and it seemed to me that their answers were satisfactory. They seem to have provided safeguards against inflation, and for preventing that market getting out of balance with our own market. It seemed to me that they had satisfactory answers to the questions that I asked in that regard; and I came away convinced that such an arrangement is a logical first step toward the return of convertibility of currencies throughout the world". TELEGRAM WA-816 Washington, April 7, 1950

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE NEXT MEETING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

1. Perkins, as Chairman of the Working Group, opened the discussion by saying that all Governments concerned have now agreed to a meeting in London and invited the concurrence of the Governments represented to the date of May 15th. He suggested that the meetings would probably have to continue on the 16th and the 17th of May. He then distributed the revised proposals for an agenda, text of which was forwarded to you in my teletype message WA-806 of April 6th.†

2. Ignatieff raised the question of what publicity was to be given to the agenda as well as to the proceedings of the Council. Perkins expressed the view of the State Department that, provisionally, they were thinking of a statement being issued at the beginning of the Council meeting which would indicate in general terms the type of matters which would be discussed. He did not think that it was a good idea that a precedent be established that the agenda of the Council should be released to the press. He also expressed the opinion that it might be useful to have the Council start with a meeting which would be open to the press and photographers and at which Foreign Ministers might make statements for the record. He thought that it might be left to the Foreign Ministers to decide whether they would like to close with an open meeting or not. There was some comment on the question of publicity from other representatives. The United Kingdom representative made the comment that an open meeting would consume valuable time and thought that perhaps some public ceremony at the conclusion of the business would suffice. Representatives undertook to consult their Governments on the question of publicity procedure. Perkins gave considerable support during the course of the discussion of the question of publicity to our suggestion that proper provision should be made for publicity on the grounds that, in the public mind, there had been too much emphasis on the military activities of the North Atlantic Treaty and that this Council meeting would provide an opportunity of emphasizing the role of the North Atlantic Treaty as an instrument of peace.

3. The discussion on the items proposed in the revised agenda submitted by the United States proved to be even more tentative than had been expected. Apart from the revised document put forward by the United States, no new proposals for agenda items were put forward by any representatives apart from ourselves. As a discussion of political warfare and of economic collaboration under Article II was already provided for in the language of sub paragraphs 3(B) and (C) of the text already referred to, we did not put forward any proposals for new headings but only mentioned that we would be interested in having these subjects discussed. Ignatieff did mention, however, that we would like to have a discussion on Germany and on the United Nations and submitted suggested headings as a basis of discussion of these two points as follows:

Germany — Report of the Foreign Ministers of the Occupying Powers in Germany.

United Nations — Methods by which the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty which are also signatories of the United Nations Charter might make more effective use of the machinery of the United Nations for the purposes which are common to the Charter and the North Atlantic Treaty.

4. Perkins observed that there had been some thinking in the State Department on the possibility of including discussions of these two topics but no decision had yet been reached. Some other representatives merely indicated that they would consult their Governments. Perkins suggested that perhaps the most appropriate way of handling discussions of topics such as these would be to include them under the "review of world political developments" which would lead to an exchange of views between the Foreign Ministers. He also suggested that Governments, upon further consideration, might wish to suggest other topics, although he hoped that the review would not be too extensive — otherwise no particular subject would be covered with any degree of thoroughness. He also suggested that the Working Group might prepare a commentary on the various items on the agenda. In the commentary on the "review of world political developments" mention might be made of topics such as Germany and the United Nations if it were agreed that these would be discussed by the Foreign Ministers.

5. There was little discussion on the other main items on the United States proposed agenda. On "the review of progress in implementing the North Atlantic Treaty", (Item 2) Perkins explained that this would involve mainly consideration of the Defence Committee's Report. Under (B), the Council would be invited to authorize the Defence Financial and Economic Committee to make further studies regarding the financial implications of the agreed defence plan as suggested by the Defence Committee and might also give guidance on the lines which such a study might take.

6. Perkins explained that Items 3 and 4 had been intended to cover consideration of further implementing action which might be required as a result of the review of world developments and of progress under the North Atlantic Treaty to date. Perkins said that the main idea was to consider what further action might be required to co-ordinate policies of the respective Governments in the economic as well as the political field and the Foreign Ministers may decide to take immediate action on the establishment of some new central machinery, either in the form of a permanent commission or a central secretariat, which would facilitate co-ordination as well as consultation between Governments in the non-military fields. It was agreed that these two Items might better be dealt with in a single paragraph.

7. On the 5th Item, a paper was circulated by the State Department on the budget of the Standing Group, which is contained in a following teletype.† Further work on the proposals for a shipping board has yet to be done by the Working Group.

8. It was agreed that the Working Group would meet again, probably on Wednesday or Thursday of next week as soon as comments had been received on the revised proposed United States agenda as well as on the discussion in the Working Group.

9. The revised draft agenda resulting from the foregoing discussion is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

10. After the meeting Perkins asked to see Ignatieff alone and told him that he was particularly interested in our proposal that Germany should be discussed at the next meeting of the Council. He said that he entirely agreed that the relationship of Germany to the North Atlantic Treaty members was an appropriate question to be discussed by the Council and went on to say that he had come to the conclusion personally that probably the only durable solution of the German question was to have Germany accede to the North Atlantic Treaty. He referred to the grave concern which the United States officials in Germany had about the German situation as it was developing and expressed the view that proposals for limiting German "integration" to Western Europe alone, particularly in the economic field, would not prove effective in dealing with the basic problem of how to deal with the security of Europe. He said that, in his opinion, only if Germany were brought into the Treaty and required to accept military responsibilities under the Pact could the security problem be dealt with effectively.

MEETING OF NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

We are anxious to make discussion at the forthcoming meeting of the Council as much a reality as possible and to take this opportunity to have an exchange of views over an extensive field. The present draft agenda will allow of this. The United States and United Kingdom Governments seem quite favourably disposed towards such a review which would mark a step forward in the development of the North Atlantic Treaty. On the other hand, there is some likelihood that discussion at the Council sessions may prove pretty vague and general and that the United Kingdom and United States will be reluctant to discuss foreign policy questions with any great candour in so large and mixed a body. It may be that Canada will be able to inject more reality into the discussions. In any case, we have been successful in having all our suggestions for subjects for inclusion under the Council agenda accepted by the Working Party in Washington.

2. It is quite likely, however, that the proceedings in the Council will not amount to very much more than the exchange of general statements and in the case of the United States, United Kingdom and France these will be agreed in advance. The Foreign Office are expecting teams of United States and French experts arriving in London as far in advance as April 25 to prepare the ground for the bilateral, tripartite and North Atlantic meetings. This looks like the preparation of a united front for the Council meeting. It is fortunate that the Minister will be in London a few days before the formal Council session as he will doubtless have an opportunity for informal talks with Messrs. Bevin, Acheson and perhaps M. Schuman before the Council opens. This may indeed prove the best opportunity to put our views and to gain information about policy developments. In any event, the "behind the scenes" talks in London may be more important than the Council session.

3. According to the Montreal Gazette of today, the Secretary-General of the United Nations hopes to be in London on May 8 and have talks with the United Kingdom, French and United States Foreign Ministers on the deadlock in the United Nations. It would be worth confirming this story as, if it is accurate, it increases the importance of the pre-Atlantic Council discussions and the desirability of the Minister being in London at that time.[15]

Note de l'adjoint spécial du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

I understand that two questions have arisen in Washington concerning the possibility of discussing the United Nations during the meeting of the North Atlantic Council. One of these questions refers to a proposal, which Mr. Pearson is assumed to have made in New York, to the effect that a public declaration of support for the United Nations should be made at the conclusion of the North Atlantic Council meeting.[16] The other question concerns the possibility of discussing in the private sessions of the Council the use which might be made of United Nations machinery.

2. In regard to the first of these questions, my recollection is that in the conversations in New York there was some discussion about the advisability of holding one or two public sessions of the Council. Mr. Pearson expressed the view that at least one and possibly two public sessions should be held, and he referred to the advantages which had come from the public meeting at the conclusion of the Colombo Conference. There was then some discussion as to the subjects which might be considered at a public meeting, and the suggestion was put forward that one object of such a meeting would be to reaffirm the support of the North Atlantic powers for the United Nations and perhaps to underline the status of the Alliance as a regional group within the meaning of the Charter. At this point Rusk suggested that the North Atlantic Council might formally adopt the resolution passed at the last session of the General Assembly entitled "The Essentials of Peace". This was the resolution which was worked out by the United States Delegation in consultation with a number of other delegations as an alternative to Mr. Vishinsky's resolution on the preparation for a new war. It contained a general statement of the principles which should govern members of the United Nations in their attitude towards that organization and in the conduct of their international relations. I do not recall that any of us were much impressed with this suggestion[17] and it seems to me that the discussion ended without any very precise proposal being made. I do not think, therefore, that anything in the New York conversations would commit us to supporting in the working group in Washington the suggestion that the North Atlantic Council conclude with some declaration about the United Nations. On the other hand, I presume that we would be prepared to concur in any reasonable suggestion along these lines.[18]

3. In regard to the second question concerning discussions during Council meetings and the use to be made of United Nations machinery, all that I had in mind was that occasion might be found to consider in a specific and practical way whether United Nations machinery could not now be used in relation to some of the major outstanding problems. In regard to atomic energy for example, it might be interesting to see whether North Atlantic Council members had any views about the procedures which had been followed in the past, and alternative suggestions which had been made by people like Romulo. It might also be interesting to see whether members of the Council had any ideas about the use which could be made of U.N. machinery in trying to ease the tension between the Western world and the USSR. Since it has now been generally agreed that an item should be put on the agenda referring to world conditions, I think my point could be made by suggesting that at some time during the study of each of the problems which will be considered under this general item, the question might be asked whether some agency of the U.N. could be used more effectively at the moment in the process of dealing with this particular problem.

Following from Heeney, Begins: At the North Atlantic Council Meeting in London in May the Minister will speak about Article 2. The following is a sketch of what is under consideration for what he might say: Begins:

Article 2 has already proved its usefulness. It was helpful in getting support when the Treaty came before legislatures. It remains a source of interest and support. It fosters a sense of solidarity on a broader basis than merely military. The time has come to consider how it can be applied.

The recent meeting of the Military Committee showed that military production plans fall far short of targets. This emphasizes need for collaboration in the field of military production. Collaboration in that field may well extend into broader economic field.

The Article also provides for elimination of conflict in international economic policies. This emphasizes the need for North America and Europe to hang together and not to drift apart. There have been worries in Ottawa and Washington over some recent European developments and proposals.

The possibility of establishing N.A.T. machinery for collaboration and elimination of conflict must be considered particularly in the light of the tapering off of E.C.A. aid. This raises the question of the relationship between such machinery and all the existing bodies for promoting European economic cooperation. Some of these bodies have a membership much wider than the Treaty and this will involve special problems. This sort of problem is not new. It always has to be faced and solutions have always been found in the past.

In conclusion it is suggested that the whole question of applying Article 2 should be referred to a special group of experts who would report at a later meeting of the Council. Ends.

2. I should be grateful for your comments and suggestions. Please send them this week. I would specially welcome instances of recent public or political support of Article 2 and what it stands for.

(FOR PARIS ONLY)

3. Please hand a copy of this to Pierce when he returns and ask him to send comments and suggestions.

(FOR WASHINGTON ONLY)

3. Before the Council meeting we shall probably want to consult with United States and United Kingdom about possible statement by the Minister. Do you think that this should be done through Tripartite machinery? Telegram Ends.

TELEGRAM 160 Paris, April 20, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Heeney from Pierce, Begins: In your No. 150 of April 18th, you asked for comments and suggestions from me on sketch for Minister's speech at North Atlantic Council in May. I think you have adopted a realistic approach; and that the conclusion to refer the question to special group of experts offers a sensible course.

The Atlantic community does provide a useful basis for regional military and political cooperation, but the Atlantic community may, like the Western European, be too narrow a basis for economic cooperation.

Under present circumstances, we would not be likely to make more progress economically in the Atlantic community than we could in the United Nations specialized activities. Even if it were possible to get agreement to greater commitments and concessions in N.A.T.O. than in I.T.O.-G.A.T.T., we could not discriminate in favour of N.A.T.O. countries unless we were ready to abandon the United Nations front, and I don't think the time has come for that.

There remain, nevertheless, some good possibilities for N.A.T. economic cooperation, but I feel they are to be found for the immediate future in the extension of the military plans into the military supply field and the economic problems related thereto. (We should include in these possibilities, the chance that the United States could find a way to buy some of its own military requirements from its allies). In this the easiest and most promising field, we have, however, made far too little progress to justify reaching out for new territory. I assume from paragraph 3, of your telegram that you have this very much in mind.

I feel pretty strongly that we have enough objectives and for the moment enough machinery in the economic field. Evatt used to score heavily, repeat heavily, with the old one about too much harness and not enough horse. I think we are somewhat better off in that we have both horse and harness; but what we need now is hay. In short, our European partners need money or markets in which to earn money: we should examine our actions largely in this light.

Most of the people I have met in the Netherlands, France, and Austria all share the same fear that they may never be able to sell enough in the United States market to pay their way.

In part this is because they recognize the great basic strength of the United States competitive position, but it is also because they do not trust the United States attitude towards imports as it will be reflected in the United States tariff and in customs policy and administration. It is not new machinery we need. What would help would be for the United States to introduce drastic customs reforms and to find a way at Torquay to make substantial and effective tariff concessions. If they do that, Article 2 can, for the moment, take care of itself.

With reference to paragraph 4 of your telegram, I would be inclined to be careful about voicing our concern about European developments and proposals. These people have not much choice unless we really give them a choice and I don't think we have yet done so.

They find themselves in the position where they have to hold together politically against the East, whether they are economically efficient or not. It may be true that their best hope for a prosperous future lies in multilateral trade with the race going to the swiftest, but the immediate threat is more real to them than the future prospects.

I feel it would be wiser perhaps for us to take the positive attitude that we can still hope to achieve our broad objectives and at the same time resist the immediate threat; we should be careful that none of us under pressure, prejudice the long-run objectives, because it is there that our best defence must lie. When we turn to what is needed so that we can move towards these objectives, I think that what needs doing, needs doing not so much in Europe as in the dollar area, and needs doing quickly, because European production has now recovered remarkably; European efficiency is improving; the easy credit markets are disappearing for them as they already have for us, and unless the dollar area soon gives practical expression of its good intentions towards European goods, these countries must, even more than they do now, turn to restrictions and a search for self-sufficiency. If it turns out that the United States authorities think their best hope of inducing Congress and the public to grant further assistance lies in an economic machinery under N.A.T., that is another matter.

I am seeing the E.C.A. people tomorrow. Both Harriman and Katz are away, but if I learn anything useful from the others about E.C.A.'s views on Article 2, I will send it on to you. Ends.

TELEGRAM EX-680 Ottawa, April 21, 1950

Your WA-876 of April 17,† Agenda North Atlantic Council.

1. The agenda now seems quite satisfactory. On its face it should give an opportunity for realistic examination of the progress to date and for constructive discussion with regard to future policy.

2. However, on re-examination of the agenda, I am inclined to think that the time allotted is much too short. Your WA-875† notes that there is now general agreement that the meeting should convene on the 15th, continue on the 16th, and if necessary on the 17th. Part of this time will probably be given up to a public session and to the preparation of a press release. At best this leaves little more than two days for serious discussion. I should think that Item 2 alone would take at least two sessions for adequate treatment, and that the remainder would probably require another six or eight sessions. In view of the size of the Council and the probability that most members will wish to express their views on the various items of the agenda, there would appear to be little time for anything more than set speeches if the present timetable is adhered to.

3. Meetings at the Ministerial level have hitherto been largely pro forma. There is more need for adequate consideration by the Council of all topics on the agenda. It is, of course, difficult to say how the forthcoming meetings will develop or to predict what functions in the organization the Council will ultimately perform, but if NATO is to become a really effective instrument for peace and for promoting the community interests of the North Atlantic area, I should think that the Council must take seriously its responsibility as a supreme governing authority of the organization. If so, Council meetings must be more than pro forma and more than a mere forum for a hasty exchange of prepared statements, or a recording of agreements previously reached by some of the members. To attain a meeting of minds, time for full discussion should be allowed. It is also possible that at the forthcoming meeting questions will arise which may require special consideration by sub-committees. If so, there should be time for them to report and for their reports to be duly considered in the full Council meeting.

4. I should think therefore that it should be understood before the Council meets that although it is hoped that business may be completed in three days, members will be prepared to remain as long as the situation may require.

5. It appears from your WA-875 that no further meeting of the Working Group is likely to be held except on the express call of any member. It is probably not necessary to call a meeting of the Working Group for this purpose, but if a meeting is held, please take the opportunity to put forward the views expressed above. In any event, please put these views before officials of the State Department.

6. A telegram on the above lines will be sent to our Missions in North Atlantic countries.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-660 of April 18th concerning Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. I find the sketch of the Minister's possible remarks insipid and I hope that something livelier may emerge. In a following message I am sending my own appreciation of what the Canadian approach to general economic collaboration under the Treaty (as distinct from the economics of collective defence) might be. I have tried to make this concise. This message deals with what might be said by the Minister at the Council meeting and with the related questions to which you referred.

2. It seems to me that there are three main considerations which need to be borne in mind in deciding on the line to be adopted at the meeting of the Council:

(a) A number of other Governments, notably France, have now associated themselves with the initiative previously taken by the Canadian Government to urge using Article II for closer economic collaboration among the North Atlantic countries. It would be appropriate for the Minister to recall the Canadian initiative in having the Article included in the Treaty and also to set out some of the main considerations which led us to press for the inclusion of the Article.

(b) Ideas are not sufficiently formulated at present on what should be done under Article 2 for the Foreign Ministers to agree on any course of collective action, but a study of the question might be begun.

(c) If such a study is undertaken, a decision will be required as to who should undertake it and what should be its terms of reference.

3. If a study is suggested, it could, I think, be best undertaken by a select group of economic experts, possibly representative of those countries in the North Atlantic Treaty which have major trading and financial stakes. I think that the Working Group should not be charged with this responsibility; it requires expert knowledge, rather than consideration by a diplomatic body.

4. The terms of reference of the study might be stated in the form of questions, the answers to which might lead to specific recommendations to the Foreign Ministers at a later meeting of the Council. One of the first questions to which the experts might address themselves is:

(a) Are any new institutional arrangements either desirable or necessary to enable the parties to execute their economic undertakings in Article 2?

Other questions might be:

(b) What is the relationship between the economic pledges under Article 2 and the economic undertakings of many of the parties under:

(I) The Charter of the United Nations;
(II) G.A.T.T. (and the I.T.O. Charter if ratified);
(III) The International Bank and the Monetary Fund;
(IV) O.E.E.C. (and the Council of Europe perhaps)?

(c) Could the creation of general economic machinery under the Treaty be of aid in dealing with the dollar gap problem either before 1952 or after 1952?

(d) If some new machinery is recommended, what form should it take, and what provision could be made for associating certain countries not signatories of the pact, such as other Western European and Commonwealth countries?

(e) What terms of reference might be given to such a regional economic agency under the Treaty?

5. You asked for instances of recent public or political support of Article 2 and what it stands for. I have seen no evidence of support for a specific plan of action under this Article, and some commentators, such as Lippmann, have pointed out the difficulties of effective regional economic organization of the North Atlantic countries. There has, however, been some friendly editorial comment in a few newspapers on the need for promoting the non-military objectives of the Treaty. The Washington Post, for example, has discussed this once or twice in the last few weeks. In Congress nothing of real significance has been said, although there were references to the employment of Article 2 at the hearings on international organization reported in our despatch No. 419 of February 23rd.† The Article naturally attracts notice from the supporters of the Atlantic Union Committee, but I take it that we are not inclined to approach the problem from the point of view of employing the Article as a step towards bringing about a federation of the principal North Atlantic countries. One might say that a good many people in this country seem now to be gratified that the Treaty contains these general and pacific provisions, but few, if any, have as yet approached them from the point of view of using them as a basis for collective action.

6. You also ask whether I think that consultations with the United States and United Kingdom on this subject before the Council meets should take place through the tripartite machinery. I think it would be a mistake to use this machinery for this purpose and recommend that such consultation should be with the Foreign Office and the State Department. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-919 Washington, April 21, 1950

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: My immediately preceding message. The following is my appreciation of the uses of the economic portion of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

1. The economic pledges of the parties contained in this Article are to promote conditions of stability and well being, to seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and to encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them. These are not novel pledges. By Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter all the parties to the Treaty except Italy and Portugal are bound by comparable undertakings. All the European parties belong to the O.E.E.C. with its more detailed regional provisions. Most of the parties have accepted the commitments of GATT and are also members of the International Bank and Monetary Fund. The novel aspect of this part of the Article lies not in its contents but in the fact that it is binding for twenty years at least on twelve countries around the North Atlantic Ocean, and might thus be employed as a basis for creating some sort of closer regional economic association linking North America and Western Europe.

2. I think it a mistake to approach the question of the use of this Article by asking what sort of machinery under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is needed for its application. In my judgment the first question to ask is what functions could a regional economic association of these twelve countries actively perform.

3. In considering answers to this question, it must be borne in mind that O.E.E.C. and the Council of Europe are continuing European regional bodies and that the European parties to the North Atlantic Treaty who belong to them cannot enter into North Atlantic economic commitments which are not consistent with their aims. We must also satisfy ourselves that the North Atlantic partnership is large enough to constitute an effective economic group, taking note in particular of the omission from it of Germany and of all the members of the British Commonwealth except the United Kingdom and Canada.

4. For the European partners July 1st, 1952, is a most important date. The Special link between North America and Western Europe brought about by the European Recovery Program will then come to an end and the Economic Co-operation Administration in Washington will cease to exist. From that date the pledges in Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty may well acquire a new importance. A central aim of Canadian policy should be to do what we can to maintain a sense of active responsibility in the United States for the economic welfare of Western Europe after the end of E.C.A. grants. What we want to see is the progressive closing of the dollar gap at the highest feasible level of trade through increasing the opportunities of other countries to earn United States dollars.

5. Could a regional North Atlantic economic body assist in attaining this end? If such a body were set up, one obvious danger would be its employment by some of the European parties as a means of seeking to extract more dollars from the United States in one way or another. There is a suggestion of this approach in M. Bidault's proposal for a more authoritative North Atlantic Council. We know that the United States Government will not continue to subsidize the recovery of other countries by substantial grants, except perhaps for the particular purpose of increasing the military strength of their allies. Continued military assistance, however, does not involve the establishment of new machinery in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

6. To close the dollar gap at a high level requires a long-sustained and difficult effort on a broader than regional basis. If world trade is to be freed from import and exchange restrictions, the central effort must come from the United States and must be directed towards making the dollar no longer a desperately scarce currency, through permitting greatly increased foreign earnings. (More extensive foreign investment is also, of course, required). I have doubts whether any North Atlantic economic machinery, apart from that directed specially to defence purposes, could assist the United States Government in bringing about these conditions. Success will involve a lengthy and rigorous campaign of public education in order to convince public opinion (and majorities in both Houses of Congress, which is not the same thing) that the national interest requires a fundamental change in the composition of the balance of payments.

7. I take it that there is no thought of seeking to set up a North Atlantic economic region hedged off from the rest of the world by devices such as tariff preferences and discriminatory exchange and import restrictions. Assuming this, I find it hard to ascribe positive functions, outside the field of defence, to any economic machinery set up under the Treaty. Regional military planning and organization make a great deal of sense. The really tough economic problems before us, however, are not regional. For example, the tripartite arrangements in Washington set up last September led us immediately into discussion of the economic development of South and South East Asia and of the markets for Arabian oil.

8. I think that an effort to deal with the central problems of the dollar gap in the North Atlantic club would be likely to complicate the situation, to expose the United States to pressures to pass out more dollars, and to impede rather than assist the education of the American people on the need for greater imports. This state of affairs will not necessarily continue indefinitely. I believe that we should wait on events for the present, in the hope that E.C.A. before it winds up and other factors at work, such as the tripartite financial arrangements, will substantially reduce the great disparity between the creditor position of the United States and the debtor position of the other countries.

9. There may be more effective means not based directly on the North Atlantic Treaty of tying together in some organization the economic interests of North America and Western Europe. It has, for example, been suggested that the United States and Canada should become members of O.E.E.C., and some thought has been given to this in the Department of State, not as an immediate possibility but as something that might prove beneficial in 1952. If this were to come about, the economic provisions of Article 2 of the Treaty could well be employed to support the entry of the United States and Canada into the larger European organization.

10. What I have said is not meant to imply any criticism of the inclusion of Article 2 in the Treaty. My observations relate solely to the question whether at this time collective action for the "implementation" of Article 2 could help toward the solution of the great economic problems which confront the North Atlantic community.

11. What then might be done at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council? I think that we should not support any proposal for the early creation of new machinery, and I am doubtful whether it would be wise to support the initiation of a study the purpose of which would be to lay definite recommendations before the Council at its September meeting. If either an expert group is set up or the question of closer economic collaboration is referred to the Working Group for study and report, it should be recognized that the process of study will take a considerable time. The tactics of the meeting, however, must depend in part on what other Foreign Ministers have to say, and notably Mr. Schuman and Mr. Acheson. Ends.

TELEGRAM 767 London, April 22, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 541 of April 18th, North Atlantic Council.

1. Such evidence as is so far available here of public or political support for Article 2 was sent to you by air bag yesterday in our despatches Nos. 899† and 902.† You will see from these despatches that there has been little official, or even unofficial, public discussion in the United Kingdom of this Article in the Treaty. There would seem to have been more discussion of, and enthusiasm for, the subject in France during recent weeks, as evidenced particularly by Bidault's speech on April 16th in Lyons. To some extent it is felt here that this relatively new French attitude may reflect a growing belief that the United Kingdom is unlikely to participate wholeheartedly in an "integration" project unless it includes the United States and Canada (and permits of a satisfactory relationship with the sterling area). The French may now be coming around to the view that the prospects for an effective North Atlantic (or even broader) economic arrangement may be better than for the economic integration of Europe alone.

2. Several of the reports in the press have emphasized the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the practical application of Article 2. In particular, a report from the Ottawa correspondent in the Manchester Guardian of April 18th expressed the view that the Canadian Government had foreseen "that the North Atlantic Pact, in the guise of a purely military instrument, might not have found favour in sections of Canada where isolationist sentiment is still strong". The correspondent added that "other motives were also operating at Ottawa to create a special interest in a programme of economic collaboration". He cited as an example the remarks by Mr. Howe in the House of Commons of March 31st, which were interpreted as implying "that the prospect of any serious recovery of Canada's export trade with Europe would be greatly dimmed if the countries of Western Europe, in making their arrangements, took scant cognizance (or none) of Canada's need for markets overseas and left her mainly at the mercy of the United States for the disposal of her heavy exportable surpluses". The Guardian correspondent then indicated that Canadian delegates at the North Atlantic Council meeting "will press vigorously for wholehearted economic collaboration between the signatories of the Pact".

3. From officials in the Foreign Office and Treasury with whom we have talked on the subject of Article 2 during the past few days, it is gathered that official thinking on the United Kingdom side has not yet reached the point of considering what, if any, formal arrangement is required under Article 2. United Kingdom officials do not appear to have come to any conclusion yet, even as to when, or how, the question should be investigated. Much thought is, of course, being given here continuously to the future of OEEC and of the Council of Europe. It may be doubted, however, whether by the time of the North Atlantic Council meeting United Kingdom officials will have reached any conclusions on the future of these bodies or on their possible relationship to Article 2. Berthoud of the Foreign Office has promised to let us know as soon as possible how their thinking is developing.

4. My own preliminary comments on the tentative sketch in your telegram of what the Minister might say on the subject at the Council meeting are indicated below.

5. In the first paragraph of the sketch it is suggested that "the time has come to consider how it (Article 2) can be applied". I assume that this thought will not be presented in such a form as to imply that, in the absence of formal machinery, nothing is now being done to apply Article 2. Presumably it should be recognized that the principles of that Article are already finding some expression through national policies and through bilateral (e.g. United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee and other bodies involving pairs of countries, as well as through ordinary diplomatic channels), trilateral (e.g. United States-United Kingdom-Canada talks last July and September), or even multilateral (e.g. OEEC) discussions. In addition, some contribution to the "elimination of conflict in their international economic policies" and to the "encouragement of economic collaboration between any or all of them" is presumably being made by the participation of the North Atlantic countries in various wider economic bodies with that objective (e.g., GATT, IMF, ECOSOC, etc.). I think it most desirable to avoid any impression that we think nothing is now being done in the spirit of Article 2 or to prejudge the question of whether any special North Atlantic machinery for this purpose will turn out to be necessary (particularly since it is proposed in the sketch that this question be remitted to a group of experts for study). I think the introduction might well emphasize what is already being done without special machinery and might then go on to enquire whether even more might be accomplished if a suitable North Atlantic body were to be established.

6. On the second paragraph of the sketch I wonder if it might not be considered somewhat indelicate at this stage for the Canadian representative to remark that "military production plans fall far short of targets" and that "this emphasizes the need for collaboration in military production". In any event, I should think that the emphasis in this section should be on (a) the narrowness of the present supply and financial bodies of the North Atlantic Organization (mentioning the rather restrictive directives to the DFEC, MPSB, etc.), and possibly (b) the extent to which even the limited activities of these bodies might be assisted by closer collaboration on policies in the broader economic field.

7. The next section might point out, as the sketch suggests, that such closer collaboration might not only assist the activities of those bodies but might strengthen the economic positions of individual countries and further improve economic (and political) relations among the NAT members. In that connection it would seem appropriate to give expression to our concern at certain aspects of various proposals for, or developments in, Europe and also to our recognition of the probable interest of the Europeans in the future course of United States and Canadian import, investment (and immigration) policies. The Minister might remark that Canada has a special interest in developments both in Europe and the United States since we are a substantial creditor of the one and a substantial debtor of the other in the international balance of payments.

8. The next paragraph of the sketch mentions "existing bodies for promoting European economic co-operation" and speaks of the special problems to which the wider membership of those bodies would give rise in the event that machinery for closer North Atlantic co-operation were to replace them. Those problems are doubtless very real (particularly in the cases of Sweden, Switzerland, Ireland and Western Germany). Possibly equally real, however, is the probable reaction of countries further removed (such as those which will be at the Sydney talks in which we shall also be participating) which accept the existence of OEEC because it originated as a necessary accompaniment of Marshall Aid, but would not readily understand the establishment now of some similar arrangement on a strictly North Atlantic basis. Even though the Minister's remarks will presumably not be made public, I should have thought it desirable in this section to take account not only of the interests of the non-North Atlantic countries in OEEC but also of those countries outside (or having extensive economic relations outside) both OEEC and the North Atlantic area. I should have thought this approach desirable also for the reason that, in fact, many of the economic problems cannot be solved on a purely North Atlantic basis. The Minister might observe that just as it is not desirable to establish exclusive European or North American economic groups within the North Atlantic area so is it undesirable to make the North Atlantic Organization itself into an exclusive economic group without regard for those countries outside the Treaty (in Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America). The fact, however, that such a large part of the economic prosperity — and occasionally the economic difficulties — of the world depends on developments in the North Atlantic area gives outside countries as well as those within the area an interest in seeing close and effective economic collaboration among North Atlantic countries. Collaboration among the North Atlantic countries should always take full account of the position of those friendly countries outside the Treaty. Any arrangements for North Atlantic collaboration should, of course, be fitted in with broader international bodies seeking similar objectives.

9. On the suggestion in the last paragraph of the sketch for the reference of the question of Article 2 to a group of experts, I should think that any such group, if it is to serve a useful purpose at this stage, would have to be given fairly broad instructions. If we were convinced that new machinery is, or will be, required, and if we could say definitely what kind of machinery might serve the purpose, it would probably be sufficient to instruct the group of experts to work out the detailed arrangements, taking account of such bodies as now exist or are in process of formation. Since, however, there appears to be uncertainty as to the need for, and appropriate scope of, any new North Atlantic body, the expert group could hardly do their job merely by undertaking a fairly mechanical review of the functions and composition of existing bodies. If they are to make a useful report on whether new North Atlantic machinery will be needed, and if so what kind, they will presumably have to consider and report on:

(a) What sort of problems there are, or are likely to be, in economic relations among the North Atlantic countries (and possibly also between North Atlantic countries and the rest of the world).

(b) What needs to be done about them.

(c) Whether existing machinery is likely to be adequate for the purpose.

(d) If not, what kind of new machinery should be set up.

10. In short, I feel that any group of experts which might be established at this stage should be allowed (or required) to consider the substance of the various possible problems in economic relations before attempting to examine the question of machinery. Otherwise we shall find ourselves establishing still more machinery for its own sake without any very clear ideas as to what it is intended to do. For that reason I feel also that the group should consist of top level experts on the economic problems and not merely experts on organization.

11. If a group of experts is to be set up, and Canada is to be represented on it, it will probably be necessary to envisage the representation of, or the inclusion of experts from at least seven countries from the various regions (United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, Norway, Italy, and Belgium).

12. Finally, I am sure it is unnecessary to warn you of the possible risks in proposing the establishment of general North Atlantic economic machinery, particularly since these dangers may well be outweighed by the benefits, for Europe and for ourselves, from further consolidation of the North Atlantic area. I might, however, mention some of the cautions which come to mind:

(a) While new machinery might help to persuade countries to do what is necessary, it may equally well create expectations which cannot be fulfilled. The disappointment of such expectations might have unfortunate consequences.

(b) The establishment of general North Atlantic economic machinery may weaken our own direct relations with the United States and United Kingdom.

(c) While such new machinery may enable us to be more effectively critical of various European policies, it will probably also be regarded by the Europeans as an instrument for securing concessions from us.

13. On the non-economic aspects of Article 2 (the type of question envisaged in item 4(b)) of Washington's teletype WA-817 of April 7th†) we hope to send you some comments early next week. Ends.

SECRET

With further reference to your EX-680 of April 21st concerning the agenda of the North Atlantic Council, we were informed by MacArthur[19] today that Mr. Acheson had formally agreed to your suggestion that the duration of the Council might be extended two or three days longer if this is found necessary. Mr. Acheson in expressing his agreement, hoped that this would not mean his being detained in London longer than another two or three days but he accepts your idea that no fixed limit to the duration of the Council meeting should be set in advance, in order to ensure that full and effective consideration is given to the substantial agenda which the Council will be taking up. Incidentally, the State Department, as I indicated in my previous message WA-924,† are rather pleased that we took the initiative in raising this question.

Douglas MacArthur II, Deputy Director of European Regional Affairs, Department of State of United States.

2. It is expected that there will be at least two more meetings of the Working Group before the Council meets, to explore and exchange views of Governments on some of the items on the draft agenda, particularly on items 2, 3 and 5 as given in my message WA-876 of April 17th.† The State Department at present are consulting with the Defence Department on what might be considered in connection with the report of the Defence Committee and on the suggestions which came out of The Hague meeting concerning the further studies required on the economic and financial arrangements necessary to support the military defence plans. Under Item 5 the State Department are particularly concerned in having preliminary exploratory talks on the possible additional central machinery which might be set up. Any preliminary comments you may have on this point would be particularly welcome.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference my preceding teletype.† North Atlantic Council agenda (United States and United Kingdom tentative proposals for additional central machinery for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization).

1. At the meeting of the Working Group on Friday, April 28th, the United States and United Kingdom representatives put forward certain tentative proposals which they said indicated the trend of thinking in the State Department and Foreign Office respectively on the kind of central machinery that their Foreign Ministers might favour when Item 5 D is under discussion in the Council.

2. In general, the United States and United Kingdom appear to be thinking along similar lines, but there are one or two points of difference.

3. The United States view is that consideration of any additional machinery should be related strictly to consideration of the tasks which should be done in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and which under present arrangements, are not being done. These jobs particularly relate to

(a) The co-ordination of military and economic activities of the kind which would be considered by the Council under Items 2 and 3 of its agenda;

(b) The indicating of new activities in the economic and political field contemplated under Items 5 A, B and C of the agenda.

4. The Council, itself, cannot be expected to meet more than two or three times a year with Foreign Ministers present; the case can be made out for providing political guidance at a high level for the various activities under the North Atlantic Treaty through the establishment of new machinery.

5. The kind of new machinery which the United States at present appears to favour is a permanent Commission, consisting of deputies of Foreign Ministers who would be given power to act on behalf of Foreign Ministers between meetings of the Council. Their powers would either be specifically limited or possibly embrace those of the Council itself. In addition, the United States would favour the appointment of an individual of high political standing who would give leadership and direction to the activities under the North Atlantic Treaty as a whole. They have no clear idea as to the title that such an individual might be given. Four possibilities were mentioned, — a permanent Chairman of the Commission, a Director-General, a Secretary-General or Executive Vice-Chairman of the Council. In private, MacArthur thought that the position they had in mind would be comparable to that of Stikker vis-à-vis the O.E.E.C.

6. The United States also contemplated that each representative on the Permanent Commission would have supporting staff who would be available to meet in Working Groups. Such staff might include specialists or experts in given fields who might meet on an ad hoc basis.

7. The United States did not exclude the possibility of a Secretariat, but they do not appear to favour such an idea, as it would give rise to an international budget and the creation of further bureaucracy.

8. In elaborating slightly on the type of presentation contemplated for the permanent Commission, the United States representative indicated that what they had in mind was top level Civil Service representatives who would give their full time, if necessary, to the work of the Commission. They emphasized that it was their desire to see the permanent Commission given sufficiently authoritative status. Provision might be made for Foreign Ministers themselves to attend meetings of the Commission on permanent basis if they so desire.

9. The United Kingdom tentative proposal does not suggest a permanent Commission as such. Apparently what they have in mind is that each Foreign Minister should appoint a deputy of high standing who would be free from other responsibilities so that he could devote his full time to North Atlantic Treaty matters if it is required, and that the Council should, if necessary, therefore, itself, be regarded as being in continuous session. The deputies would presumably have small staffs attached which would make possible the organization of study groups or groups to take up ad hoc matters. In addition, there would be a Secretary-General on an international basis with a small international Secretariat.

10. The functions which the United Kingdom contemplated these deputies might fulfill are

(a) The co-ordination of policy in the political field with respect to common defence problems of the North Atlantic area;

(b) The co-ordination of information programmes concerning North Atlantic Treaty matters, while leaving responsibility for national programmes to each country, and

(c) Such ad hoc tasks that might be agreed upon.

The main purpose of this organization, in the British view, would be to provide a more satisfactory method of co-ordinating the programmes of the various bodies under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization into a programme of action than is now provided by the occasional meetings of the Foreign Ministers themselves. In commenting on the function of "the co-ordination of policy in the political view with respect to common defence problems of the North Atlantic area" the United Kingdom representative said it might be further defined as "co-ordinating the essential military, financial and economic factors into an effective defence programme, and considering the equitable division of the financial burden and of production tasks".

11. There was no mention by either United States or United Kingdom representatives of the possible location of the new central machinery which is contemplated.

12. Ignatieff was given to understand by MacArthur that Messrs. Jessup and Perkins are at the moment consulting with the Foreign Office in London on the nature of the new central machinery that might be set up, but so far no definite scheme has been worked out.

13. The Chairman of the Working Group (Martin) said that he hoped to be in a position to put more definite proposals to the Working Group at its next meeting, and invited the comments of other representatives. He also suggested that the Working Group should at least put forward alternative possibilities of organization of some new central machinery for the consideration of the Foreign Ministers, and that the Council should agree on a solution rather than refer the matter to the Working Group for further study.

14. I would be grateful for your comments, if possible before the next meeting of the Working Group.

TELEGRAM EX-738 Ottawa, May 2, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Your telegram WA-984 of April 28. North Atlantic Council.

1. Following are comments on tentative proposals for additional central machinery put forward by United States and United Kingdom representatives in Working Group.

2. The need for additional central machinery to function in the intervals between Council sessions seems to us to be becoming increasingly evident. We have been thinking along the lines of a Permanent Commission or group of deputies to Foreign Ministers of the kind and at the level indicated in United Kingdom, United States suggestions. On the other hand, I am inclined to agree with the view of Acheson as reported in your telegram WA-879 of April 28† regarding the necessity for having a closer accord as to the objectives to be pursued before deciding on the precise character of the machinery itself. I think it only sensible to have a clearer idea as to what jobs would be given the Permanent Commission before trying to draw up a detailed constitution for it. It is all too easy to devise new machinery and the Tripartite Group of officials in London seem to be forging ahead in this direction but to have been less successful in defining the functions which the Commission might reasonably be expected to fulfill. Considering Item 5 of the draft agenda and the new Tripartite proposals put forward in the Working Group together you have a range of subjects including the co-ordination of foreign policy and promotion of closer economic collaboration both fields which stretch out to indefinite horizons. Also it is now suggested (see paragraph 10 of your telegram under reference) that the Commission should co-ordinate "the essential military, financial and economic factors into an effective defence programme and considering the equitable division of the financial burden and of production tasks". This all adds up to a pretty tall order even for a group of "top level Civil Servant representatives". It can only be visualized as working in practice if we conceive of it as flanked by groups of experts in various fields, hence a further proliferation of working groups. This raises difficult organizational problems. For example, how could the Permanent Commission (or group of deputies) composed of Civil Servants be expected to co-ordinate and review the efforts of Ministers of Defence and of Finance? On what basis is the relationship of the Commission to the military organs already operating under the Treaty to be established? Is the Commission as the creature of the Atlantic Council to be regarded as the "senior" body with overriding powers where political issues are involved in co-ordinating defence planning? If not, how is its relationship to the military bodies to be worked out? The question of the extent of the Commission's power in relation to governments will have to be closely considered. The United States proposal that the powers of the Commission might "embrace those of the Council itself" and that it would be "given power to act on behalf of Foreign Ministers between meetings of the Council" seems to us to suggest more than would ever be realized in practice, although we appreciate that the United States cannot have in mind giving any powers of decision on policy questions to the Commission as the Council itself, of course, has no such power. As you know, I have always emphasized that before taking decisions of policy arising out of Council meetings I would have to discuss these matters with my colleagues in the Government. In practice, the deputies of the Foreign Ministers meeting in the Commission would inevitably have to refer back any question of policy to their governments for decision. It would be illusory to suppose that they could wield any greater or different powers than these.

3. As the definition of the functions of a Permanent Commission raises so many political questions, I think that the Council should itself examine the dimensions of the problem and the difficulties involved without being tied beforehand even by implication to any cut and dried proposals worked out by the Tripartite group in London. The Council could then after considering the proposals put forward in the Working Group (it is probably advisable that it should have some tentative plan or alternative plans before it) and after discussion of the wider implications involved either take a decision to set up machinery now or give a directive to the Working or some other ad hoc group to draft a detailed plan.

4. The wider implications to which I have just referred include the special relationship which we should hope to build up with non-signatory countries in those spheres in which association with our North Atlantic group is indicated. In this connection the central problem is, of course, that of Germany. If Germany is to be associated more closely with the West both economically and politically this can probably only be done effectively within the framework of the North Atlantic group of nations. Our political and economic machinery should be so flexible that it could, in due course, provide for the association of Germany on the economic and political side. The need for flexibility in working out machinery is further indicated by the functional character of the groups of experts working in various fields. For example, the group of economic experts concerned with Article 2 while it would not necessarily include all signatories of the Treaty might hope to include in the long-run some representatives of non-signatory countries.

5. These are long-term (although not so very long-term) considerations but they may have a bearing on the character of the machinery which we have to create. Similarly, M. Schuman's proposal for a Council which should attempt to co-ordinate not only the activities springing out of the North Atlantic Treaty but the relationship of the North Atlantic Treaty with the Council of Europe, O.E.E.C., and the Brussels Treaty Organization raises complex problems which will have to be faced in the pretty near future. Indeed one of the tasks of the Permanent Commission may be to consider the more far-reaching French proposals.

6. In suggesting some of the difficulties which the organization of additional central machinery with such wide and varied functions may encounter, we are not implying any negative attitude towards the creation of continuing central machinery. For your own information we are, in addition, turning over in our minds the possibility of putting forward at the appropriate stage a more radical suggestion bearing on the composition of the Council itself which would, we think, help to ensure greater political co-ordination of the defence and financial aspects of the Treaty Organization.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

My immediately preceding teletype.† North Atlantic Council.

1. The following is the tentative revised agenda referred to in paragraph 3 of my teletype under reference.

2. Text begins:

1. In the year which has elapsed since the signature of the North Atlantic Treaty, the following progress has been achieved:

(a) The Treaty has been ratified by all signatories and has entered into force.

(b) The Defence Organization of the Treaty Powers has been established and has started work.

(c) A strategic concept has been adopted as the basis for the defensive planning of the North Atlantic area.

(d) The Standing Group using a planning date of 1954 produced on the basis of regional plans a first draft of a medium-term plan for the defence of the North Atlantic area. This plan was approved both by the Military Committee and the Defence Committee. The estimate of the forces required to support this plan was approved by both Committees as "a first approximation". The Military Committee has already instructed the Standing Group and the Regional Planning Groups to review this first edition of the plan and estimates with a view to achieving the maximum economy compatible with the essential security of the North Atlantic area.

(e) A security system for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has been agreed upon. It is not yet fully operative but will be as soon as technical arrangements have been completed.

2. Defence planning has up to date been hampered because the planning bodies awaited information from the Defence Financial and Economic Committee on what finance would be available for defence purposes while at the same time the Defence Financial and Economic Committee awaited detailed information on the cost of an integrated defence program. In order to emerge from this vicious circle, the Defence Financial and Economic Committee has now officially requested the Defence Committee to prepare an estimate of the finances required for a strategically adequate defence plan, setting forth priorities. The Defence Committee has also requested the Defence Financial and Economic Committee to examine to what extent the North Atlantic Treaty Powers could potentially increase their defence expenditures and to consider new and more adequate financial and economic measures for implementing an integrated defence program.

3. The above represents substantial progress. Moreover there have been certain accomplishments which materially contribute to the ability of the North Atlantic Treaty powers to defend the North Atlantic area:

(a) The Governments of the North Atlantic Treaty countries have embarked on increased military production. Their estimates of future production show that they plan to increase it still further.

(b) In particular, the members of the Western European Regional Planning Group, as parties to the Brussels Treaty had already agreed before the North Atlantic Treaty entered into force on an additional military production program. This program is already showing results.

(c) The United States Mutual Defence Assistance Program has entered into effect and supplies are arriving in the recipient countries in Europe.

4. However the main fact which emerges from this review is that, while much has been done, the North Atlantic Treaty Powers have still to put into effect an integrated program for increasing their forces to the size required for the implementation of a 1954 medium-term plan. Such an integrated program involves four lines of approach on the first three of which work is proceeding.

(a) A list of forces required must be produced.

(b) Itemized lists of the equipment needed for these forces must be produced.

(c) The cost of maintaining the increased forces listed in (a) and of providing the equipment required in (b) must be worked out in detail.

(d) Decisions must be taken on the contributions to be made by individual Treaty Powers to the increased forces listed under (a) and to providing the additional equipment listed in (b).

As indicated above, the Defence Committee and its subordinate bodies and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee, are at work on the first three of these four stages. What is now needed is that the Council should co-ordinate the work of these bodies and ensure concurrent action on the first three stages so that the fourth stage can begin.

5. In order to use the resources available to the North Atlantic Treaty Powers most economically and to the best possible purpose, methods of achieving a balanced collective force, rather than balanced national forces and of achieving an integrated military production program must be examined.

6. It is for consideration by the Council whether the absolute priority at present accorded to economic recovery should not be re-examined with a view to giving efforts to build up security equal priority with efforts to achieve recovery without endangering the economic and political foundations necessary to national strength. Text ends.

We referred to you this morning a copy of Mr. Wrong's message, WA-1011 of May 2nd, giving the text of a United States draft paper under discussion in the North Atlantic Working Group, in preparation for the forthcoming meeting of the Council. As the Working Group was to meet at noon today, we had time only for a hasty consultation among the officials available in the Department and, as a result, we advised Mr. Ignatieff in the Working Group to make the following points:

(a) That it had been our understanding that the Working Group was to produce a factual paper to assist the Council in its consideration of what is now Item 4 on the Council's agenda, reviewing the progress in implementing the Treaty in the year since its signature, including reports of the Defence Committee and the Defence

Financial and Economic Committee. The draft which the Working Group are now considering involves many questions of policy and, if a decision was expected at today's meeting of the Working Group, we would have to say that we could not accept the paper in its present form.

(b) That the essence of our objections was that the Working Group should not be prejudging question of high policy which the Ministers should be free to discuss, without prejudice, at the meeting of the Council.

(c) That our Minister had not yet been able to consider the paper nor to consult with his colleagues.

(d) That, at the official level in the Department, we specifically had serious doubts about the wording of paragraph 2 and the first sentence of paragraph 3, and about paragraph 6 in its entirety.

2. For lack of time, these instructions were given by telephone, but we should like you to know immediately that we have not subscribed to the U.S. draft paper and do not propose to do so in its present form. It is one thing for Ministers to raise points of this sort in the meeting of the Council, but, it seems to us, quite inappropriate for officials to try to indicate the sort of decisions that the Council might reach, although we are prepared to admit that it may be desirable for the Working Group to point up some of the issues which are likely to be raised at the Council, if this can be done without implying any recommendation and without expecting governments to approve such a document overnight.

3. We also told Mr. Ignatieff that he might approve the revised agenda for the Council, the text of which was contained in message WA-1012 of May 2nd,† which was also referred to you this morning. Our only suggestion for improving the agenda was to drop the first three words in Item 3 of the text, which would then read:

"Exchange of views on world political developments...".

DISCUSSION OF GERMANY AT THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

At Canada's suggestion, it has been agreed in the Working Group that the subject of Germany in the form of a report from the Occupying Powers should be discussed probably under Item 3 of the Agenda which reads: "Review of and exchange of views on world political developments as they affect the security and well-being of the parties in the light of Treaty objectives".

2. As you will remember, our objects in proposing that Germany should be discussed were two. First, that in view of developments in Germany and of the tripartite discussions on policy towards Germany we hoped to obtain up-to-date information on the German problem from the Occupying Powers. Secondly, we felt that a full discussion of Germany in the Council would be useful in itself as the non-occupying powers represented there would have an opportunity to contribute their own views.

3. It is not thought feasible at this stage to provide you with a draft speech to deliver on Germany: (a) because we have no pocket solution to German problems to produce; (b) because in any case the tripartite discussions immediately prior to the Council meeting may result in important decisions of policy on Germany. In the light of these decisions, suggestions for dealing with specific German problems which might make sense today may be out of date next week.

4. You will find attached instead of a policy statement a paper† prepared in the Department discussing what seemed to us to be the three essential aspects of the German problem: (a) German unity; (b) German integration in Western Europe and (c) German rearmament; and raising in the form of questions certain salient points affecting these issues.

5. The question of the "integration" of Western Germany with the rest of Western Europe raises problems both of substance and organization all the more difficult because no one has ever given a clear definition of what "integration" means. It has become one of those useful political "hold-alls" into which every kind of concept can be conveniently stuffed. Until quite recently it was hoped to integrate Western Germany into Western Europe or into a European Union and the wider question of the relationship between this Western European bloc and North America had not been faced. Now, since M. Bidault's and M. Schuman's speeches, this wider question has been brought out into the open. It is significant that the French have taken the initiative. They realize that without the inclusion of Germany politically and economically, the Western European bloc would not make sense. On the other hand, they are terrified of being left alone to compete with the Germans for the leadership of Western Europe. They are frightened — and with reason — of the Germans getting the upper hand. This was one of their most pressing motives in trying to bring the United Kingdom into the Council of Europe so that there would be a powerful counter weight and they would not be left alone in the cage with the Germans. United Kingdom reluctance to be integrated has emphasized the need for a wider framework. The French have now launched the idea of an organization to include the O.E.E.C. countries, Germany, the United States and Canada. This poses a problem in terms of organization. With the same objective in mind we have been thinking in terms of extending the political and economic machinery of the Atlantic Treaty so that special relationships could be built up with certain non-signatory countries including Germany. We have been hoping that by keeping machinery flexible enough we might bring Germany and other O.E.E.C. countries under the umbrella of the Atlantic Treaty on the political and economic side without associating them with its military aspects. This may now prove an impossible operation. It would certainly be a very delicate one. In Europe the North Atlantic Treaty is, of course, regarded primarily as a military alliance. Countries like Sweden and Switzerland would be very shy of being associated with it in any way. To associate Germany with it would bring instant protest from France and other European signatories who would feel that this was the first step towards accepting Germany as a military partner. On the other hand, Bidault's suggested peace council seems to foreshadow a new international organization comprising the Atlantic Treaty signatories and the O.E.E.C. countries. The idea of yet another international organization will certainly not prove attractive to the United States, or perhaps to ourselves. These organizational difficulties will have to be discussed either at this council session or by a permanent commission set up under the Council. But the present conglomeration of committees and of alphabetic labels should not obscure to our view the necessity for a major political and diplomatic manoeuvre which will bring Germany into a grouping of which the United States and ourselves are members. That is the underlying and perhaps crucial question.

6. If this is to be the objective, the technique of approaching it must be improved. The story of the attempt to bring Germany into the more limited field of the Council of Europe is a sad instance of bungling. The French by tying up this question with the Saar, the United Kingdom by adhering to the timid notion of bringing Germany in as an "associate member", all the Occupying Powers by their procrastinating methods have almost succeeded in throwing away any political advantage to be derived from this offer to Germany. The same sort of muddling applied to the question of dismantling of German industrial plant was equally unfortunate. The Occupying Powers are making the same mistake which was made after the 1914-18 war. Grudging gestures, displays of strength followed by hurried and embarrassed concessions to the Germans are creating that very impression of uncertainty and weakness which has always fed the German appetite for domination. At the present moment the German Chancellor instead of eagerly accepting the offer for German admission to the Council of Europe has been able to manoeuvre himself into a position in which it will be a favour on the part of Germany to the Occupying Powers if Germany condescends to accept the invitation. When the question of associating Germany with a wider grouping including the United States and Canada comes up we should try to secure that the objective is clearly delimited, that the consequences of accepting Germany as a partner are accepted without fear or fuss and that any German attempts to exploit differences between us are met with unity and firmness. All this is easier said than done. Nevertheless, we being less directly engaged in squabbles with the Germans over minor points in occupation policy may be able to exercise a salutary influence. While the question of the association of Germany with the wider Atlantic grouping may not present itself concretely at this meeting it will no doubt be the background for any discussion of Germany.

7. If we could draw a firm line and say that we would encourage the political and economic restoration of Germany but would set our faces against German rearmament in any form our task would be easier. Unfortunately, it is becoming more and more difficult to do this. The temptation to utilize German manpower and German industry in the defence of Western Europe may in the end prove irresistible and there are some who urge that we should begin this process now. In the first place, the association of Germany as a military partner in the North Atlantic Treaty would probably at this stage or even in any immediately forseeable future break the Treaty wide open. Recent information from Paris indicates that the French would simply refuse to accept Germany's membership and the same is probably true of Belgium and the Netherlands. It is more than doubtful whether any French Government which was willing to enter into a military alliance with Germany could survive. German rearmament is, however, a vague term. If it means the recreation of the German arms industry and of German military formations whether in the shape of a separate German army or in some way included as part of a "composite European force" it would present the Kremlin with the most direct threat. General Robertson when commanding the United Kingdom occupation forces in Germany expressed the opinion that the rearmament of Germany would be the one decisive factor in inducing the Soviet Union to start a war. It is difficult to imagine that the Soviet Government could sit by and watch the recreation of the German armaments industry and the German army which so nearly overwhelmed the Soviet Union only a few years ago with the knowledge that this formidable military machine was backed by United States power. The very knowledge that such a development was planned might precipitate a decision by the Soviet Government to take over Western Europe at any cost before the threat had materialized.

8. In any event the question of German rearmament in the broader sense is not likely to come up at sessions of the Council. It is still too explosive a subject for anyone to raise in such mixed company. It may, however, be discussed behind the scenes in United States-United Kingdom talks. It appears to us that despite the strong military arguments for enlisting Germany as a military ally, the political arguments against such a course at this stage outweigh military considerations and that the military association of Germany in the North Atlantic Treaty would (a) increase the danger of a Soviet preventative war and (b) shatter the unity of the alliance. In addition, the German Chancellor, Dr. Adenauer, has publicly declared that Germany has no wish to be rearmed, a view with which the German Socialist Opposition Party have associated themselves.

9. A narrower and more immediate question concerns the creation of a West German armed police force. The tactics of the Soviet Government have been, as you know, to make an East German para-military police force the entering wedge for rearmament in the Soviet zone. It may well be that the Occupying Powers before the Atlantic Council have met will decide that a similar force be created in Western Germany. To this we should have no objection. In fact, it seems obvious that we are justified in meeting any Soviet threat to make use of para-military formations in the Eastern Zone by counter measures in Western Germany. The Russians in this case are setting the pace. This is separable from the larger issue of German rearmament. Meanwhile as there is still insufficient equipment to rearm our Western European allies and while the fear of Soviet aggression has still not precipitated any desire for German rearmament among Western European countries it would be premature to embark on so dangerous a course. The more so as no one can predict what course both a rearmed and politically resurgent Germany might pursue. Instead of being the bulwark of Western resistance to Soviet aggression Germany might prefer to play the role which she played in 1939 and we might be faced with a new version of the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact. We must remember that once Germany is rearmed and politically independent we shall have no further real control over her actions.

Thus we reach the conclusion that while German political and economic restoration and close association with the North Atlantic bloc is desirable and should be pursued the risks of German rearmament at this state outweigh the advantages

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

1. The Working Group, at its meeting on Wednesday, 3rd May, approved the tentative revised agenda as contained in my message WA-1012 of May 2nd,† with one verbal change in Item 1 which now reads, "adoption of the proposed agenda" (instead of "agreed agenda").

2. The Working Group also revised the "review of progress in implementing the North Atlantic Treaty in the year since its signature" which was contained in WA-1011 of May 2nd. Rather unexpectedly we found strong support for revision from the United Kingdom representative who had received firm instructions to oppose the inclusion in the review of any statements which might prejudge the decisions taken by the Council on the progress of the military planning to date and further action required. In the light of the preliminary comment given to Ignatieff by telephone, our representative also took the position that the Working Group should not prejudge the discussion in the Council and that the review should, as far as possible, be a factual statement.

3. I shall be sending a revised text of this review as soon as it is available. The main changes agreed were:

(a) The omission in paragraph 2 of reference to defence planning having been "hampered" because of lack of information from the D.F.E.C.

(b) The rewriting of paragraph 4. The paragraph as rewritten will indicate the action which the Council has been invited to consider in the reports from the Defence Committee and from the Defence Financial and Economic Committee. Our representative particularly took objection to the form of sub-paragraph (d) which could be interpreted as implying that decisions regarding contributions to be made by individual Treaty Powers might be taken by N.A.T. bodies rather than by individual Governments.

(c) It was agreed to delete paragraphs 5 and 6 altogether.

4. In the discussion, the representative of the United Kingdom and ourselves took the strongest line in favour of the substantial revision of this paper along the lines indicated above. The United States representative was very reluctant to support these changes and was given strong support by the French representative. Other representatives, lacking instructions, took little part in the discussion although, on the whole, the Portuguese representative gave the United Kingdom and ourselves support. The French representative, De Margerie,[20] who had participated in the drafting of the paper, said that paragraphs 4 and 5, as previously drafted, generally represented the views of the French Government as to further action required. Particularly, he said that the French Government was anxious that immediate steps be taken to translate the "paper plans" into "forces in being", even before present defence plans were fully revised and completed. The United States representative made it clear that paragraphs 4, 5 and 6, as previously drafted, represented the considered views of the United States authorities and indicated that it was possible that the United States delegation in London would submit formal proposals along these lines.

5. It was agreed that, in order to facilitate discussion of the Defence Committee and D.F.E.C. reports in the Council, the Working Group would attach letters of transmittal indicating the action required. The United States representative said that, in the view of his Government, Foreign Ministers should feel free to discuss and suggest action on any report, even though it had been submitted to the Council for information only. A list of documentation is also being prepared.

6. The discussion on "the preview of progress" consumed most of the afternoon and there was little time for the consideration of the question of "additional central machinery". The United States representative did not come forward with any endorsement of the tentative proposals worked out in London, which were reported in my messages WA-984 of April 28th and WA-996† and WA-997† of May 1st. Ignatieff gave a brief summary of our views, as contained in your EX-738 of May 2nd, emphasizing the difficulty of deciding the precise character of any machinery until there had been a closer accord as to the objectives to be pursued. The United States representative indicated that the State Department was thinking along similar lines. He also referred to the difficult organizational problem raised by the London proposal that the Council should be considered in continuing session through Deputies as it would affect the relationship of the Council to the Defence Committee and the D.F.E.C., to which you referred in your message EX-738.

7. The French representative outlined the views of his Government in rather general terms. He said that his Government was thinking of two types of additional central machinery:

(a) Machinery to coordinate military planning and the financial arrangements involved in rearmament. These functions could be fulfilled by a Permanent Commission, along the lines of the Brussels Permanent Commission, with each country represented by a Deputy of the Foreign Minister. Each Government should decide what kind of representative would be chosen. He said his Government had no fixed ideas as to the possible location for such a Commission.

(b) A high level body, which has been referred to by M. Bidault as the "High Atlantic Council", the function of which would be to undertake the long-term problem of coordinating on a trans-Atlantic basis the North Atlantic Treaty Organization with the activities of existing European bodies such as the O.E.E.C. This body would be concerned with non-military activities and would include countries who were not signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty as well as North Atlantic Treaty members. He indicated that the French Government would request a study of their proposals at the meeting of the Council.

8. The Chairman suggested that the Working Group would probably have to meet again to discuss the question of additional central machinery. He said that the United States Government's views were by no means clear on the question yet.

9. The United States representative also touched upon Item 3 on the agenda — "review of and exchange of views on world political developments...". He said that Mr. Acheson would probably take the occasion of the discussion on the German question, requested by ourselves, to bring up questions relating to the East German zone and would probably have some proposals to make on this matter.

10. There was also a brief discussion on procedural questions particularly arising out of discussions which have taken place in London in the "Shuckburgh Committee".[21] Apparently this Committee had made the suggestion that there should be no public meeting at the commencement of the Council session and only a public meeting at the end. The reason put forward for this proposal was that the Foreign Ministers would probably have more to say at the end of the discussions than they would at the beginning of their meetings. Our representative took the position that the Working Group in Washington had already considered the matter and that the consensus in the Working Group had been in favour of opening with a public meeting and leaving it to the Foreign Ministers to decide the manner in which they would conclude their discussions. It was agreed that the "Shuckburgh Committee" would be informed that the Working Group were not disposed to re-open consideration of this matter, although the French representative gave some support to the suggestion which had been made from London.

11. Several representatives expressed the view that the "Shuckburgh Committee" should concern itself at the present time with procedural and administrative questions only. The Chairman suggested, however, that when the respective delegations had individuals in London who were briefed to deal with substantive matters, it would probably be necessary to transfer the work now being done by the Working Group in Washington to London. It was agreed, in the meantime, that the "Shuckburgh Committee" would be informed of the discussions in the Working

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETING IN LONDON (4TH SESSION)
SUMMARY OF REPORT, MAY 15 - 19

1. The North Atlantic Council meetings held in London from May 15-19 offered the first opportunity for a full-dress review of the work of the North Atlantic Organization since its establishment. Hitherto Council meetings had been largely pro forma to approve recommendations of subordinate bodies. But the Treaty organization having now been established for some eight months and work having begun under its various committees, a review of progress and discussion about future policy was due. At London, for the first time since the first meeting in September last, the Foreign Ministers of all the Parties were present. The Council meetings, moreover, were preceded by extended discussions on foreign affairs including North Atlantic matters between the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States, and France. Although the sessions were short (four days in all) there was much more time for discussion than at previous Council meetings.

2. For the first time, the Council agenda permitted of a general discussion on world developments as they affected the North Atlantic area. This part of the session was, however, rather disappointing. It had been hoped that the "Big Three" would be prepared to reveal the results of their talks together preceding the Council meetings, but despite prodding by Mr. Pearson and others, the "Big Three" contented themselves with broad generalities, and carefully side-stepped giving information to the Council about their discussions, except incidentally to the discussion on other items on the agenda. On the other hand, the Council meeting did provide a useful occasion for informal discussions between Foreign Ministers and between officials outside the meetings.

3. The most important problem with which the Council was required to deal was the report of the Defence Committee regarding the Medium Term Plan. It was evident that the so-called Medium Term Plan was not really a military plan for the defence of the North Atlantic region, but a summation of the four regional plans (no plan was put in for the North American region) which had been hastily thrown together in order to meet the United States timetable for release of aid under the M.D.A.A. As General Bradley had described the plan, it was merely a "first approximation of forces required" and a great deal of refinement was needed, to say the least. It was clear that the deficiencies in force requirements listed were far beyond total present budgetary appropriations of the North Atlantic area, and if implemented might well strain severely the financial and economic positions of certain members. Although there was no direct discussion on the estimate of force requirements, there was an underlying assumption in the discussions that the present Medium Term Plan was unrealistic and could safely be scaled down.

4. Three major conclusions were reached by the Council:

(a) It recommended that members proceed as rapidly as possible with the build-up of their defence forces on the basis of "balanced collective forces rather than balanced national forces." A resolution to this effect was introduced by the United States, but was initially opposed by Mr. Schuman of France, and questioned by Mr. Lange of Norway among others. Mr. Schuman's view was that since France had commitments outside of Europe, France required balanced national forces, and that in any event there was no necessary incompatibility between the principles of balanced collective forces and balanced national forces. Mr. Lange pointed out that the peoples of Europe having been over-run once demanded security and that the principle of balanced collective forces should take account of this demand. He pointed out that in the event of aggression Norway would be remote from the location of tactical and strategic reserves and might need balanced national forces to hold the enemy. Mr. Acheson, while recognizing that certain countries and regions had special problems, strongly supported the principle of balanced collective rather than balanced national forces on the ground that it was the only way that adequate defence forces for the North Atlantic area could be financed. The United States resolution, after amendment to take account of criticism in the Council, was unanimously approved. Although this principle was perhaps implicit in the paper on strategic Guidance, previously accepted by all North Atlantic members, express approval of the principle by the Council will now ensure that it becomes a basic principle of NATO planning, as well as a guide to members for progressive build-up of national forces, and probably as a guide to the United States Administration in its distribution of mutual aid appropriations.

(b) There should be adequate forces in being and on the spot to fight successfully the initial battle. A resolution to this effect was introduced by the French and after considerable discussion and amendment by the United States to provide that the principle was accepted subject to NATO plans, the French proposal was accepted unanimously. This principle perhaps modifies the principle of balanced collective forces, but in any event would seem to entail the provision of more forces in being in the three European regions to meet the initial attack than if defence plans merely called for liberation and final victory; and it would tend to give assurance of more immediate assistance to continental European countries by non-continental countries in the event of aggression.

(c) It was agreed that Deputies to the Foreign Minister should be promptly appointed by all members to provide for continuous supervision and more effective co-ordination of North Atlantic organizations.[22] The Deputies are to have their headquarters in London. This arrangement was evidently agreed to by the United States, the United Kingdom, and France before the meetings, although the draft resolution was presented by the United Kingdom.

5. Other steps taken were: approval of the establishment of a North Atlantic Planning Board in Ocean Shipping, as recommended by the Working Group in Washington; approval of studies initiated by the Defence Committee and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee; approval of a United States resolution urging members to make their "full contribution through mutual assistance in all practicable forms to achieve the integrated strength necessary for the defences of the North Atlantic area."

6. The association of the United States and Canada on a permanent basis with O.E.E.C. (subject to formal invitation from O.E.E.C.) was agreed to outside the Council, but was announced during the meetings. The Canadian view with regard to the North Atlantic Treaty from the outset has been that it must be more than a mere military alliance, and during the negotiations leading to the Treaty Canada was successful in obtaining the inclusion of Article 2, which provides among other things for economic co-operation between the members. No machinery had however been provided for carrying out Article 2, nor had it been agreed that machinery is needed. On the other hand, with the approaching end of Marshall Aid (1952), it was felt that some continuing association for economic co-operation between both sides of the Atlantic was necessary. One difficulty about established machinery under Article 2 is that some European countries, notably Sweden, Ireland, and Switzerland are not Parties of the North Atlantic Treaty, although they wish to continue close association with North American countries. On the other hand, they are members of O.E.E.C. The association of the United States and Canada with O.E.E.C. seemed for the time being to meet the difficulty.

7. It was apparent from the outset of the North Atlantic alliance that it would be little more than a paper alliance unless the United States were prepared to support it actively. The United States has, however, taken an active lead, and at the meetings in London it again demonstrated that it attaches real importance to the Treaty and is prepared to continue strong support. During the course of the meetings Mr. Acheson, as has been noted, strongly supported the principle of balanced collective forces. He also supported in principle the French thesis that there should be sufficient forces in being to fight successfully the initial battle. Mr. Acheson also indicated clearly during the meetings (and evidently more explicitly in the preceding Three-Power conversations) that, at least as far as the United States Administration is concerned, they are fully aware of the necessity for continued economic support for Europe beyond 1952, and active steps are being taken to meet the need. The general conclusion which emerges from the meetings is that the United States, morally at least, is committed to continued economic and military support of Europe more definitely than heretofore.

8. Yet, if further mutual aid is to be forthcoming, the United States Administration are obviously under the necessity of being able to convince Congress that other North Atlantic Treaty members are assuming their fair share of responsibility. Moreover, it would seem that the Administration are now thinking more in terms of aid for defence than of aid for economic recovery. Mutual aid agreements with European members worked out under last year's Mutual Defence Assistance Act provided that European members should give priority to economic recovery. It is not without significance that the United States representatives at the Council in their resolution approving a recommendation of the Defence Committee that the Defence Financial and Economic Committee should launch an enquiry into the potentialities of the Treaty nations to support additional military appropriations, proposed that in this enquiry considerations of defence and of recovery should be given equal priority. It is also significant that the United States representatives pressed for and secured the adoption of a resolution recommending that "each Party make its full contribution through mutual assistance in all practicable forms to achieve that integration in strength necessary for the defence of the North Atlantic area," and that Governments should "supply the necessary instructions to facilitate and hasten the implementation" of this recommendation. Pressure on any member who appears to be leaning on its oars may perhaps be anticipated.

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION

COUNCIL DISCUSSION ON FURTHER COLLABORATION UNDER ARTICLE 2

64. The importance of close and lasting economic collaboration was emphasized at various points during the Council meeting. In the discussion on the reports from the Defence Committee and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee, it was observed by several Ministers that economic collaboration (as well as internal economic stability) was essential even to the strengthening of the Area's military defences. It was also recognized that, quite apart from questions of military strength, Article 2 of the Treaty imposed on the signatory countries the obligation to collaborate on economic matters and to avoid conflicts in their international economic policies. As Count Sforza remarked, this Article has come to be regarded as "one of the most precious assets of the Pact". Finally, the importance of further evidence of effective economic collaboration was underlined in Mr. Acheson's opening remarks, when he intimated that the review of United States economic policies which had recently been undertaken would be assisted by such collaboration:

> "Under the direction of the President of the United States, we have established in Washington a Cabinet Group which is working out with great diligence the steps which are necessary to be taken by the United States in order that it may play its part in continuing close economic relationship with Western Europe, and we are sure that the Western European nations will wish to study what can be done within Europe and together we can study and act upon the steps which must be taken on both sides of the Atlantic to bring about a closer relationship, a continuing relationship, and a growing strength in the whole Atlantic community".

65. Mr. Acheson re-emphasized this point at the Fourth Meeting of the Council:

"As was mentioned earlier in our opening session President Truman has directed that under the leadership of a former Secretary of the Army, Mr. Gordon Gray, and as a matter of urgency we proceed at once to get the Governmental position clear of what we should do post 1952, and, in some respects, before 1952 to carry on the association which the United States has had with Western Europe. That work is proceeding very urgently in the United States, and it would be most helpful indeed to have a body in Europe which would co-operate with our efforts under what would be a continuing relationship".

66. Mr. Pearson stated, in the following terms, the problem of increasing the collaboration envisaged in Article 2:

"We have laid the foundation of the North Atlantic community, and we are now approaching, I suppose a much more difficult stage in our work, where we have to contemplate the conversion of some of these principles into performance, which is, of course, always more difficult than agreement on principles. In this I include the question which is dealt with in Article 2 of the Treaty, the question of economic and social co-operation. I hope that during our meetings we will try to clear up in our minds what we mean by the obligation we have all undertaken in that Article, what we can do to begin to carry it out, and how we can relate the obligation of economic collaboration which we have undertaken in that Article to the wider and possibly more important obligation of economic co-operation in the Western world generally. So, Mr. President, I hope we may be able to agree to deepen and make more practical collaboration among ourselves and consider how we can relate that co-operation generally, at least in certain fields of activity, to wider international co-operation".

67. Although the need for economic co-operation was clearly recognized at an early stage in the Council meeting, there was considerable discussion — and some difference of opinion — on the best method of promoting such co-operation. Four groups of suggestions were put forward:

(a) An ad hoc committee might be established by the Council to explore the question of continuing and improving economic collaboration.

This suggestion was mentioned by Mr. Lange of Norway who thought that it would be difficult at this stage to choose between a broad organization for Western economic co-operation (consisting of the OEEC countries supplemented by the United States and Canada) and an economic body "within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization". He thought that a choice between these alternatives should be deferred and that the problem should be studied further before any decision is taken concerning permanent arrangements. He observed that if a permanent group of Deputies was to be established the problem might be studied by that group rather than by an ad hoc committee. As the discussion developed Mr. Lange did not press his tentative suggestion for the establishment of an ad hoc body to study this particular question.

(b) The question of any further action to be taken under Article 2 of the Treaty might be studied by the Deputies.

This possibility had been mentioned by Mr. Lange and was envisaged in paragraph (e) of the first United Kingdom draft resolution regarding the establishment of more effective machinery under the N.A.T.O., which had provided that the Council, or the Deputies, acting for the Council, "should consider what further action should be taken under Article 2 of the Treaty".

(c) The OEEC, with the co-operation of the United States and Canada, might study the question of economic collaboration or might even itself become the permanent machinery for economic co-operation.

This suggestion was pressed particularly by Dr. Stikker of the Netherlands. He noted that, in any event, the OEEC would have to study the question of the relationship between the dollar area and Western Europe after 1952 and that any study of this subject which might be undertaken within the NATO would largely duplicate this work. He felt that if both OEEC and NATO were to undertake similar studies, there would not be sufficient experts to perform both tasks. There would also be considerable difficulty in co-ordinating the results of two such studies. Dr. Stikker thought that OEEC had the experience on which to base an investigation of this problem and would also have the advantage of participation by Germany and the "neutral" countries, which would not be practicable in any purely NATO project. If the OEEC were to be entrusted with this study Dr. Stikker expressed the wish that the record should indicate the desire of the other OEEC countries in the Council that Canada and the United States should be associated with the study through OEEC.

Mr. Schuman also felt that co-operation should be secured between the European members of the OEEC and the United States and Canada and that such co-operation should extend beyond the period of the Marshall Plan. He thought, however, that the problem of long-term co-operation should also be studied within NATO, although he did not want eventual collaboration to "exclude any free European country".

Similar views concerning the desirability of extending economic collaboration to include countries outside the Atlantic Pact were expressed by Count Sforza, Mr. Lange, Mr. Rasmussen (of Denmark) and several other Ministers.

(d) The question of further action under Article 2 of the Treaty might be studied by the Deputies, "taking into account the work of existing agencies in this field".

Commenting on Dr. Stikker's suggestion that an expanded OEEC might be given the responsibility for looking into the question of longer-term economic collaboration, Mr. Pearson remarked that the OEEC is regarded as an organization for European co-operation, whereas Article 2 is concerned with co-operation not only between European countries but also between European countries and North America. He noted Dr. Stikker's suggestion that the United States and Canada might in some manner be associated with the OEEC for the discussion and examination of questions relating to such broader co-operation. He observed that, "Possibly this might be done". He expressed the opinion that "some effective action in regard to this matter might be taken during the week" but he did not consider such an association with the OEEC to be necessarily inconsistent with the undertaking of a study by NATO. In fact, he thought that such a North Atlantic study might avoid duplication by enabling a central group to review the whole position, including the functions of existing agencies such as the OEEC, the Council of Europe, the Brussels Treaty Organization, and so on. In order to ensure that duplication would be avoided, the instruction to the Deputies might note "that there are already agencies for economic co-operation and that in the examination to be made under Article 2 this fact should be kept in mind". He thought it essential that any resolution emerging from the Council meeting should make it clear that "Article 2 is still an important part of our Pact and we should do what we can to implement the ideals embodied in Article 2 whether we do it in the North Atlantic Treaty or through one of the other existing organizations, or whether we do it in some other way".

68. As indicated above, Mr. Schuman, Count Sforza, and several other Ministers agreed that the instructions to the Deputies should include provision for a study regarding the application of Article 2 even though some modification of the language might be required to ensure that such a study would take account of existing agencies.

69. The approach of the United States delegation to the question was given by Mr. Acheson in the following form:

> "May I say briefly that the question of what my country can do in future co-operation with Europe was discussed in the tripartite discussions which took place between Mr. Bevin, Mr. Schuman and myself. After those discussions took place we had the opportunity of discussing the matter with Mr. Pearson so that we could broaden the whole question of what North America could do, the action which it should take and could take and the points came out exactly as Mr. Lange has mentioned, that a decision could not be reached because other countries were involved and study was required; ... So far as function is concerned, it would seem to me that there are two matters that we should consider. One is the economic aspects of defence of a very specific nature, those would seem clearly to be matters which relate primarily to this group here. The other is the broader economic matter of strengthening the entire economy of Europe and bringing the economies of North America into continued relationship. In regard to that second part we then have the question of time. The first point is how would you proceed immediately, in the immediate future to deal with that, and there the importance of the OEEC which Mr. Lange has mentioned is very obvious. So far as the more distant future is concerned, the question is what permanent relationship should be set up, and that obviously requires a great deal of study and thought, as Mr. Lange has said...".

70. In the end, it was decided that paragraph (e) of the resolution regarding new machinery should read:

> "Consider what further action should be taken under Article 2 of the Treaty, taking into account the work of existing agencies in this field".

71. Two other aspects of the study relating to Article 2 were also discussed at the Council meeting. These had to do with the question of the priority to be assigned to the study regarding Article 2 and the question of whether this study could be undertaken only in London.

72. The first United Kingdom draft had stated flatly that "first priority in the work of the organization should be given to points (a) and (b)", i.e., to the points relating to defence planning and financing. Mr. Pearson expressed the hope that the final text "would not give the impression that no examination or activities under (e) need be initiated until (a), (b), (c) and (d) have been discussed and dealt with". He added that, "I think it is obvious that first priority should be given to (a) and (b) of the terms of reference, but I hope that will be put in such a way as not to minimize the importance of the other subjects which are enumerated". Several Ministers, including particularly Mr. Lange, expressed similar views. Accordingly, the text was redrafted to read:

"Without minimizing the importance of any of the points listed above, first priority in the work of the Organization should be given to points (a) and (b)".

Mr. Lange enquired whether the reference in the resolution to the fact that "the Deputies will meet in London" would prevent them, or their sub-committee, from meeting in Paris or in any other location that might be convenient for the discussion of the matters involved in Article 2. Mr. Acheson replied that, in his judgment, this phrase was not to be taken as meaning that the Deputies could not meet anywhere else, but merely that "their headquarters will be in London".

73. Although there were various references to "social and cultural" activities under Article 2, the discussion at the Council meeting was concentrated largely on economic collaboration. The instructions to the Deputies are, however, sufficiently broadly worded to enable them to consider what further action should be taken in respect of any subject covered by Article 2.

PRIVATE CONVERSATIONS AMONG THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM, FRANCE AND CANADA CONCERNING RELATIONS WITH THE OEEC IN THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE

74. During the tripartite (U.S., U.K., France) meetings which preceded the Council session, France initiated a discussion on the subject of long-term economic relationships between North America and Western Europe.[23] In the course of those talks, there was apparently a fairly definite difference of opinion between France and the United Kingdom.

75. It is understood that the French favoured some form of permanent association between the OEEC countries on the one hand and the United States and Canada on the other. They were opposed to the establishment of an agency under the aegis of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty for two reasons. In the first place, they thought it would be unrealistic for the countries of Western Europe to discuss problems involving long-term economic relations without the co-operation of Germany and the other "neutral" countries of Europe which were not parties to the Treaty. At the same time they were not prepared to contemplate the admission of Germany into the circle of North Atlantic countries even for the purpose of economic discussions. In the second place, they were very much opposed to the establishment of any new international body which would overlap or duplicate the functions of existing agencies such as the OEEC. In addition the French may have thought (although they did not say it) that for domestic political reasons it would be preferable to continue economic collaboration outside the North Atlantic Treaty at the present stage in view of the rather military flavour given to the Treaty in French political controversy. In any event, the French are understood to have taken the position that long-term relationships between Western Europe and North America should be worked out through an expanded OEEC rather than through any new machinery directly related to Article 2.

76. The United Kingdom (and particularly the Foreign Office), on the other hand, did not wish to accept the OEEC arrangement as permanent beyond the period of ECA assistance, and were even averse to using the OEEC machinery for studying what sort of longer-term arrangement might be required. United Kingdom officials thought it possible that Germany and the other "neutrals" might be associated with economic and social arrangements (which might be kept quite separate from the military arrangements) under the North Atlantic Treaty at an earlier date than the French apparently were prepared to envisage. In any event, if some arrangement under Article 2 was not immediately practicable, United Kingdom officials wished to avoid any decisions at this stage which might appear to fix the relationship of their country to Europe and which might seem to establish the basic pattern for long-term co-operation in economic policies between the countries of Europe and the countries of North America.

77. The United States representatives apparently did not share the anxiety of the French to steer the consideration of economic problems away from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, but, at the same time, they found attractive the French suggestion for some immediate relationship between North America and the OEEC countries. For the purpose of assisting Mr. Gordon Gray's group in Washington, it appeared to them easier and more expeditious to use such existing machinery than to await the creation of any special machinery under the Treaty.

78. These various points of view were brought out in the preliminary conversations regarding Article 2 which took place among United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian representatives on the first day of the Council session. As a result of these conversations, it appeared that, without prejudging the nature of any longer-term arrangement which might eventually be made, it would be desirable for some closer relationship to be established between the United States and Canada on the one hand and the OEEC on the other to facilitate collaboration on the more immediate economic problems involving both Western Europe and North America. A statement was drafted on the following day expressing the hope that the United States and Canada would be invited to establish, on an informal basis, a working relationship with the OEEC. This draft statement took note of the fact that the North Atlantic Deputies would be considering what further action should be taken under Article 2 of the Treaty and also noted that "formal organizational" arrangements might be required in the future for that purpose.

79. The proposed interim arrangement appeared to have many advantages:

(a) From the Canadian point of view it would provide an immediate opportunity for participating in the discussion of certain policies and developments in Europe which were causing concern. Moreover, to the extent that it might help to influence United States policies in the right direction, Canada would probably stand to benefit at least indirectly. While this informal arrangement would provide evidence of constructive action relating to Article 2, it would not significantly prejudge the nature of any more permanent arrangements under that Article which might be desired, particularly since the Deputies would be considering, at the same time, the question of further action under Article 2.

(b) From the United States point of view, this arrangement should reinforce the efforts of Mr. Gordon Gray's group.

(c) From the French point of view, it would make possible a degree of collaboration between North America and Western Europe in the immediate future without raising the question of Germany's status in relation to the North Atlantic Treaty.

(d) From the point of view of other OEEC countries particularly concerned about their relations with the "neutrals", it would make continued collaboration possible, at least for the time being, without raising embarrassing questions concerning the relationship of these "neutrals" to the North Atlantic Treaty.

(e) From the United Kingdom point of view, the non-permanent character of the arrangement (unless later it should generally be decided to continue it) and the fact that no new machinery would be set up at this stage, were doubtless attractions.

It was envisaged that the proposal for such an arrangement would be embodied in a statement which the Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada might make after the Council session. It appeared both impracticable and undesirable to attempt to have the statement made by all the Ministers on the North Atlantic Council. In the time available, it seemed impracticable to seek the agreement of all twelve Ministers on the Council to a single text. Even if such agreement might have been secured, it appeared undesirable, in any case, to have the statement identified as a recommendation of the entire North Atlantic Council since it might then have seemed that the OEEC was being converted into a North Atlantic body with consequent embarrassment for the "neutrals".

80. Accordingly, the concurrence of the other North Atlantic Ministers was not sought. In fact, since the statement was only being worked out as the Council session drew to a close (and agreement on the substance of the statement was secured only late on the 17th of May), it was not possible even to inform the other members of the Council that such a statement was likely to be issued on behalf of the four governments. Oblique references to the fact that conversations on this subject might be taking place among the four countries and that something might be arranged were made during the Council's discussions on May 17th by Mr. Acheson and by Mr. Pearson, as indicated in the section of this report dealing with Article 2. It also appeared from the general discussion on Article 2 in the Council that other Ministers, particularly Dr. Stikker and Mr. Lange, would welcome some closer association between North America and Western Europe through the OEEC. It was understood that the French and United Kingdom delegations were probably keeping the other interested OEEC countries informed on the progress of these private conversations. The Canadian delegation also hinted, in talks with Dr. Stikker and Mr. Lange (and with the Irish High Commissioner, whose Government had previously taken considerable interest in the possible association of Canada with the OEEC) that something along these lines might develop. At the closing meeting of the Council, however, it became apparent from informal conversations that several of the other interested Ministers, including Dr. Stikker (who is the Chairman of the Council of OEEC), were not aware at least of the precise form or timing of the proposed statement. The text of the statement, which had been put in final form only that morning, was then shown to Dr. Stikker, who appeared somewhat unhappy about it. Following a hasty conversation, it was agreed with him that the words "after consultation with the Chairman of the OEEC" should be inserted before the words "stated their hope" in the third paragraph of the text. Copies of the text were then shown informally also to Mr. Lange and to Count Reventlow, the Danish Ambassador.

81. The text of the statement by the Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, Canada and France was released for publication at the same time as the general communiqué of the North Atlantic Council. The final text is attached to this report. Later the same day Mr. St. Laurent read the text of the announcement to the House of Commons and made a statement on the subject. The text of the Prime Minister's statement is also attached. (Since the Council meetings, invitations to the United States and Canada have been issued by the Council and accepted)

PRIVATE CONVERSATIONS REGARDING CONTINUING ARRANGEMENTS FOR ECONOMIC CONSULTATION AMONG THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADA

82. Prior to the Council meeting it had been contemplated, particularly by the United Kingdom, that Mr. Acheson, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Pearson might have a private conversation regarding progress in the "A.B.C." tripartite consultations at the official level in Washington and regarding the possibility of a meeting before the end of this year of the ministerial group from the three countries which had met in Washington last September.[24]

83. In preparation for such a conversation, a brief memorandum was prepared by officials from the three countries. Originally the memorandum was accompanied by an appendix, indicating the progress, or lack of progress, made in dealing with the various subjects assigned to the "A.B.C." tripartite official group in Washington. Since it was felt that even the routine review of progress presented in this appendix might raise questions of substance, it was decided to discard the appendix and to submit only the covering memorandum to the Ministers. Even the remaining memorandum (of which the text is attached) was not, however, discussed jointly by the three Ministers. Apparently it would have been difficult to have held such a joint conversation in London, even though questions of substance might have been left out of the discussion, without bringing in Sir Stafford Cripps. It was equally apparent that Mr. Acheson would have found difficulty in taking part in any such conversation, in the absence of Mr. Snyder, if Sir Stafford Cripps were to be present. Such considerations, as well as the pressure of other activities, prevented any formal conversation between the three Ministers on the subject of the "A.B.C." tripartite arrangements. Each of the Ministers did, however, indicate separately his attitude towards the points raised in the memorandum.

[24] Voir/See ibid.

84. On the United Kingdom side the memorandum was approved by Mr. Bevin and the other United Kingdom Ministers concerned. Mr. Acheson and Mr. Pearson saw the memorandum and, without approving it textually, indicated their general agreement with the recommendation that the present arrangements for tripartite consultation in Washington should be continued and that a further meeting of the Ministers concerned from the three countries should probably be held this year some time after September.

85. Mr. Acheson stated that he would not wish to come to any definite conclusion regarding arrangements for a ministerial meeting later this year until he could discuss the date, place and other details with Mr. Snyder and Mr. Hoffman.

86. Mr. Pearson indicated similarly that he would not wish to express a definite view on the possible arrangements for a ministerial meeting until he could discuss the matter with Mr. Abbott and other ministerial colleagues. Mr. Pearson also suggested that if the text of the memorandum were to become a formal document the words "all the" might be deleted before "Ministers concerned" in the first sentence of paragraph 6, since in fact it might prove either impracticable or unnecessary for the whole group of Ministers who met in Washington last September to reassemble for any meeting which might be arranged for the latter part of this year.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 8-50 [Ottawa], January 5, 1950

TOP SECRET

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE ORGANIZATION:
OFFER OF TRAINING FACILITIES

1. At a meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee, on 22nd December, 1949, a proposal to offer a limited number of vacancies at Army and R.C.A.F. training establishments to the Armed Forces of North Atlantic Treaty countries was considered. It had previously been ascertained through informal discussions that such an offer would be welcomed by the majority of participating European countries.

2. Without increasing capital plant or instructional staffs, the Canadian Army could offer 149 vacancies at the various Corps schools. Under the same conditions, the Royal Canadian Air Force could provide instruction for 50 pilots and 50 navigators. All personnel administration, including rations, laundry, transportation in Canada, and medical care, would be provided by the Canadian Armed Forces; the cost of transportation to and from Canada and the pay and allowances of the personnel under training would be borne by their respective governments.

3. The charges for this scheme would be absorbed in the normal Service appropriations and would not be the basis for a special appropriation.

4. At a future date, it is possible that arrangements of a similar nature may be made by other North Atlantic countries and that Canadian Service personnel will participate on a reciprocal basis.

5. In order to indicate Canada's willingness to assist as far as practicable in the development of the North Atlantic Defence Organization, Cabinet Defence Committee felt that the offer of training facilities should be made with the least possible delay and that the invitation to participate should be extended by the Minister of National Defence to his opposite numbers in the other countries.

6. The Cabinet Defence Committee recommend that approval be given to the proposed scheme of training, subject to the conditions outlined above, and that the Minister of National Defence be authorized to extend an invitation to the North Atlantic countries to participate in this training programme.[25]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], January 18, 1950

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION UNDER ARTICLE 3 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

This is the main item on the agenda. Mr. Gill has circulated an explanatory memorandum, attached,† which we drafted so as to place the question before the members of the committee with the least possible bias. Although I know you have followed developments in this field closely, you may find it useful to have us attempt to review the whole problem in the broadest terms, and to hazard some comments on the important questions of policy involved, both international and domestic.

(a) The Form of Our Contribution

As your know, Mr. Pierce has favoured the ad hoc approach. If Cabinet were asked now to fix a sum which would constitute our contribution to the North Atlantic Organization for the next fiscal year, Mr. Pierce has assumed that the sum would probably be smaller than the total ad hoc contributions which the Government might make to meet specific requests based on proven deficiencies. It might be easier for the Government, Mr. Pierce has thought, for our contributions to be financed through supplementary estimates rather than for an overall North Atlantic figure to be included in the budget in a year of declining economic activity and revenue, when there are so many domestic demands upon the Government.

Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Wrong have insistently favoured the announcement by the Government of an overall figure for our contribution. Mr. Wrong, in particular, has emphasized repeatedly the necessity for a Canadian contribution of reasonable size if we wish to win the sympathetic consideration of the U.S. Administration and of Congress in meeting our balance of payments difficulties arising from the U.S. dollar content of our military expenditures.

We do not know what the responsible Ministers are thinking, but we think that Mr. Pierce, and perhaps Mr. Robertson, have now come to the conclusion that Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Wrong are probably right; that the political and economic advantages for Canada of an early announcement of our overall contribution outweigh the possible advantages for our European partners in the more flexible procedure of considering each specific request on its merits as it arises. With the probable exception of Dr. Clark, there appears to be general agreement on the official level that an overall figure should be decided and announced fairly soon, or that, at the very least, an announcement of part of what we are going to do should be made.

(b) The Amount

How much our contribution to aid the defence of our North Atlantic partners should be, in addition to what we are spending on "self-help" on our own domestic budget for defence, is, of course, a question for the Government rather than for officials, but the Government will, no doubt, wish to bear in mind the relative contributions of other countries for 1950-1951 as a rough yardstick of what might be expected from Canada:

Self-Help (Defence Budget) (In millions of $ US)		Mutual Aid (Under Article 3, for other NAT countries) (In millions of $ US)
U.S.	- 13,500 (?)	U.S.	- 1,000
U.K.	- 2,200 (?)	U.K.	-500 (?)
Canada	- 387 (425 Can.)	Canada	- (?)

From the above very rough table, it will be seen that the probable Canadian defence budget figure is, in proportion to our national income (15:1), less than half the U.S. figure. Again, on the basis of proportional national income, a Canadian contribution of $75 million (Can.) would be approximately equal to what the U.S. is contributing to NAT countries under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, not taking into account the much larger U.S. contributions for non-military purposes under E.R.P. and for military purposes under the M.D.A.A. to areas outside the North Atlantic Treaty.

(c) What We Could Contribute

The Cabinet has agreed that our contribution under Article 3 should probably be made within one or more of the following categories:

(i) provision of training facilities

(ii) provision of raw materials for defence purposes (in addition to our normal exports)

(iii) provision of military equipment available from Canadian production or stocks surplus to North American requirements.

Re (i): Cabinet may soon consider a proposal of Mr. Claxton's that training facilities should be provided in Canada for a sizeable number of Army and Air Force personnel from participating European countries; all expenses in Canada, with the exception of the salaries of those being trained, to be borne by the Department of National Defence within their appropriation. This specific proposal may or may not be raised at the Panel by Mr. Drury. If it is, Mr. Plumptre has suggested that, in order to obtain the greatest political credit abroad for our efforts, a generous estimate might be made of the cost of such training facilities and this item transferred from the defence vote to the North Atlantic vote, assuming there is to be one.

Re (ii): From our preliminary discussions with officials of other Departments, it would seem that the way in which we can most readily contribute, with the least harm to the Canadian economy, is by the provision of raw materials for defence purposes. We know informally that Mr. Bryce has for some time been considering the possibility of stockpiling in the United Kingdom such strategic items as aluminium, wheat, zinc, copper and a few other base metals that we can produce in greater quantity than we can sell either at home or abroad, but we do not know what Dr. Clark's views may be. It would, perhaps, be stretching the word "contribution" too far to consider stockpiling our anticipated food surpluses such as apples, salmon and eggs, but there would surely be a good argument for stockpiling wheat or other stable bulk foods that would have to be carried across the Atlantic, in the event of war, by the hazardous and wasteful process of convoying, at a time when military items would undoubtedly have greater priority. Mr. Robertson and Mr. Pierce are attracted by this proposal. Mr. Pierce regards it as a means of expanding our contribution by possibly retaining title to the goods stockpiled in the U.K. (or in Europe) so that we should not require an item in the budget to cover the transfer, but the goods would none the less be available in the right place and, in the event of war, there would be no difficulty in giving them to our partners who were able to use them. However, it would seem to us more straightforward to transfer title to the North Atlantic Council or Supply Board, if this is legally feasible, and include it on our budget item for North Atlantic.

The only possible objection which we can see to stockpiling in the United Kingdom a major portion of our contribution to North Atlantic defence this year, would be the desire of our continental partners for a proportion of the stock pile to be transferred to their countries — to which there might be some objection on strategic grounds, in view of the vulnerability of the continent at present. Nevertheless, we are taking a calculated risk in all military items which we send to Europe and I suppose that we might just as well stockpile on the continent as in the United Kingdom. By transferring title to the Council or Supply Board, we might avoid having to decide where our stockpile contributions should be stored, and when and how they should be used.

It seems to us that this is a field that should be further explored at the official level and that a paper might be prepared jointly by officials of the Departments of Finance, Trade and Commerce, National Defence and ourselves for the next meeting of the interdepartmental panel. The paper would attempt to set out what strategic raw materials we may expect to have available during the next year, would assess our normal exports of these materials to the other North Atlantic Treaty countries, and would estimate the financial cost which would be involved if the Government were to purchase any surpluses.

Re (iii): The third kind of contribution considered by the Cabinet (the provision of items of military equipment from production or stocks) raises a serious difficulty not encountered in considering the other two kinds of possible contribution — the U.S. dollar content of our military equipment. We understand from Mr. Pierce that it is, in fact, unlikely that we shall have any substantial surplus production capacity in those lines in which our European partners are deficient and which they cannot more economically obtain from the United States. Although offshore purchases for European account are permitted under the M.D.A.A., it seems probable that in nearly all required items, U.S. mass production will undersell Canadian plants organized on a smaller scale. No renewal of the Hyde Park Agreement seems to be on the horizon. Considering the declining level, to take only one example, of the U.S. aircraft industry, it is difficult to see how Congress will swallow the deal which we have been trying to make with the U.S. Military Establishment for selling them F-86 aircraft. The procurement of military equipment in Canada for European account under M.D.A.A. would be one means of helping to balance our international payments with the United States on military equipment, but, as we have suggested, it does not appear to us to be an approach to the problem on which we could count, even if we win the sympathetic consideration of the Administration and a number of Congressmen by making a respectable contribution to North Atlantic defence. All that Canada can hope from the United States, we suggest, is that

(a) they might be prepared to consider as part of their contribution the U.S. dollar content of Canadian military production which we may give to other NAT countries, and,

(b) some relief from the "full cost in advance" provisions of the M.D.A.A.

Further, even if our production of needed military equipment was found to be competitive with that of the United States and some satisfactory arrangements were made for covering the U.S. dollar content of such military equipment, we must still consider whether, in fact, we are going to have any appreciable surpluses of military equipment from production now in progress or foreseen. Mr. Pierce doubts that Canadian automobile manufacturers, for example, are going to be much interested in switching to some lines of military vehicles when they can sell at a profit all the ordinary civil types they can make. The establishment of plant capacity in the United Kingdom to produce picrite when we have idle capacity at Welland is an example of the sort of production problem that should have been avoided (but probably would not have been) had the North Atlantic Organization been in operation a year or two earlier. All we can foresee in the immediate future is the possibility of producing some ships (in which we are in competition with a number of European NAT countries) and such electronic devices as radar and proximity fuses (in which we can hope to compete effectively), but our capacity to produce should probably be more carefully studied in conjunction with the Departments concerned.

Another technique which might be considered as a means of overcoming not only our procurement difficulties but those of other countries which are short of U.S. dollars, might be by means of a radical standardization of military production throughout the North Atlantic area. Mr. Robertson has been thinking about the possibilities of such an approach. If it were possible, for example, for all twelve countries to agree to standardize on the Canberra jet bomber, the U.K. would be able to produce this bomber not only for the European countries, but also for the U.S. and Canada. Instead of defence expenditures being a drain on dollar sources, standardization could be turned into a means of earning dollars. The types of equipment would probably, in most cases, be American, but the best of the British and European designs might also be chosen and accepted as standard for U.S. and Canadian forces. Where U.S. lines were to be made in Europe, M.D.A.A. could cover at least part of the cost of the machine tools necessary for their production. In this way, the European countries might at least be able to earn enough dollars to pay for those items of military equipment which they will have to buy from the United States.

The proposal has many attractions, particularly when the long term European disequilibrium with the United States after 1952 is considered, but the political difficulties from the U.S. point of view, in accepting cutbacks on military production in the United States so as to enable certain types of equipment to be produced for them in Europe, appear almost insuperable, as our own difficulties with the F-86 already indicate. Mr. Pierce thinks that the only type of radical standardization which it is practicable to consider is to apportion the production of new types of military equipment, such as guided missiles and various electronic devices. However, even in this field, the urgent desire of the U.S. authorities to concentrate, for example, all atomic production in the United States will not make it easier for the logic of the argument to carry the day.

The vulnerability of Europe is another argument against this sort of standardization which could only be carried through by creating stand-by plants in North America for all major items being produced primarily in Europe; and this, too, would be expensive for the U.S. and Canada.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO NORTH ATLANTIC

You will recall that at the last meeting of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence,[26] Mr. Robertson said that he thought budgetary considerations would prevent the Government from deciding to make a lump sum contribution under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, and that for this reason, it looked as if we should expect an ad hoc approach, at least for the fiscal year 1950-1951.

I have been thinking of possible alternative ways in which a lump sum contribution might still be considered, for the reasons which have been brought out so strongly by Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Wrong. Although there may be many technical difficulties, it would simplify the Government's political problem if, in some way, part of the surplus which it is expected we shall have in the present fiscal year, could be earmarked for North Atlantic. I have not gone into this rather delicate matter, as there may be insuperable difficulties that have not occurred to me, but if you think the suggestion has any merit, I should like to explore it further with those who are familiar with our budgetary procedures.

What I have in mind at the moment is that a supplementary vote might be passed during the current fiscal year authorizing the Government to spend up to whatever total sum our contribution is to be, and placing this amount in the category of future year commitments. In other words, we shall be spending part of our revenue surplus for this fiscal year during the next fiscal year, as is done with a large fraction of the votes of such departments as National Defence. The Government might be able to justify this questionable accounting procedure on the grounds that some of our other North Atlantic partners have already announced the amounts which they will be contributing to the alliance and it would be of great assistance for planning purposes for the organization as a whole to know that they could count on Canada to contribute a definite amount.

For the last two or three years, the Department of Finance have consistently (and no doubt quite deliberately and wisely) under-estimated our revenues. Last year, we had a large surplus and I understand that we can expect a sizeable surplus this year, although one that will be smaller than last year. Even if this year's surplus is only about half of last year's, our contribution under North Atlantic would probably come to less than a quarter of the surplus, allowing for the retirement of another segment of the public debt.[27]

ITEM NO. 4 ON THE AGENDA FOR THE FEBRUARY 16 MEETING OF THE PANEL ON ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF DEFENCE QUESTIONS

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY: POSSIBLE CONTRIBUTION UNDER ARTICLE 3: STOCKPILING OF RAW MATERIALS IN THE U.K.

In December, Mr. R.B. Bryce prepared the attached personal memorandum to Mr. Robertson which he forwarded with a letter† (not attached) explaining that his memorandum did not represent the views of his Department and that he recognized that there were serious objections both in detail and in principle to the sort of stockpiling which he is suggesting.

2. As the memorandum has only just been circulated, at Mr. Robertson's suggestion, and with the consent of Mr. Bryce, it is unlikely that there will be more than a general discussion of it at tomorrow's meeting, but it presents an excellent review of the financial (and some of the military) arguments for stockpiling in the United Kingdom (or in Europe) base metals, wheat, lumber, and possibly clothing and other supplies on the assumption that total war will demand total preparedness and the severity of a modern bombing attack would call for dispersions of stockpiles of everything that would be needed by a population in an emergency — not just the so-called "strategic" items.

3. As we pointed out in a memorandum prepared for you when the subject of our contribution under Article 3 of the Treaty was first considered by the Panel, copy attached, it seems probable that Canada could make her most useful contribution in the supply of raw materials rather than finished military equipment, in view of our limited industrial capacity for producing military equipment, apart from a few specialized lines. The supplying of raw materials also happens to suit the Canadian economic picture fairly well as we are likely to have surpluses during the early 1950's.

4. Mr. Bryce's suggestion would be an operation that would not only enable us to make a capital contribution to the preparedness of the North Atlantic area of a non-recurring kind, but would have the added advantage that we need not necessarily enter anything in the budget, as we could keep title to our stockpiles in Europe. I think this is the most questionable part of the proposal from our point of view, as it would surely be desirable from an international point of view to make a contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty under Article 3 and, if it is domestically possible, to do so in some such way as Mr. Bryce has suggested. It is possible that title to the stockpiles could be turned over to the North Atlantic Organization and the stockpiling divided geographically among the European North Atlantic countries on whatever basis they may agree among themselves.

Agreed. Mr. George might seek an opportunity for a word with Mr. Bryce. R.A. M[acKay].

5. It seems to me that we might also tie to this idea the condition that, as it became necessary for these stockpiles to be replaced in course of time, the turnover should be accomplished by the country in which the stockpile was located taking out of the stockpile what it needed for its own use and purchasing the replacement quantity from Canada for cash. This part of the proposal would, of course, not apply to most base metals, but would apply to lumber and wheat, which cannot be stored indefinitely.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du sous-ministre adjoint des Finances pour le secrétaire du Cabinet

Memorandum from Deputy Minister of Finance to Secretary to Cabinet

RE STOCKPILING POLICY AND WAR RESERVES

1. Canada is now devoting resources to the value of roughly some $400 million a year to defence. This is going almost entirely into the military forces, research and administrative overhead to prepare them for their role in a possible war. Most of it is of a recurring and non-capital nature, and little of it results in forces that will be immediately available for operational duties in the early weeks or months of a war. Consequently it is basically expenditure to maintain our preparedness to provide military services after a substantial period of mobilization.

2. Experience in the last war suggests that Canada's usefulness to the Allied cause in a war in the 1950's would extend far beyond the provision of military services (including, of course, air and naval services and facilities) and, in particular, would include substantial help in providing raw materials, military supplies, food, and even civilian supplies, to Allied countries in support of the general war effort. Relatively little has been done in preparation for possible war activity in these fields. In part, of course, that is because they are civilian activities similar to those of peacetime, and we assume they could and would be relatively quickly adopted and directed to war purposes. In part it is because we have had full employment, and war preparation in these fields would have diverted resources needed for immediate civilian purposes. Finally, it is because in Canada's peculiar position she cannot now expect to obtain much in the way of definite information on, let alone orders for, these supplies which her major allies will wish to have from her in the event of war in the 1950's.

3. This memorandum is intended to suggest that it is worth considering a number of possible measures of economic preparation for war in the 1950's which might be taken as soon as any substantial slack develops in our economy. Such slack would enable this preparatory work to be done without serious diversion of resources from export or from normal domestic purposes. Indeed, these preparatory measures might be better suited industrially to maintaining total production and employment than the conventional measures such as those covered in the recent report to the Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy.

4. These measures of general economic preparation for war have several other features which merit consideration before going into detail. First, in contrast to the military measures they are of a capital and non-recurring nature, not leading to an annual drain on our resources nor to an organized military hierarchy with a natural and reasonable interest in maintaining their programmes. Secondly, the preparations would result in capital that could be devoted to ordinary civilian purposes in later years, should the risk of war diminish. All that would be lost would be the interest — and its real equivalent in the delay of use — which will be unimportant if the work is done at times of slack. Thirdly, there is little danger of obsolescence in contrast to specific military preparations. Finally, in so far as this non-recurring need is met on a substantial scale during a period when employment might otherwise decline seriously, it helps in defence by what is one of the best and yet most subtle ways — by preventing at least in the areas affected that "crisis of capitalism" upon which our potential enemies so heavily rely for assistance and perhaps as the signal for their attack. One of our urgent problems is to find means for providing support to employment during the 1950's, for this very important security reason, which is not such as to distort our economic structure nor saddle our budget with permanent fixed charges or groups with a vested interest in the indefinite continuation of programmes.

5. The general measures of preparation which it is suggested we consider are those which can be covered by thinking of stockpiling in the broadest sense. Heretofore stockpiling seems to have been considered almost entirely in respect of certain conventionally "strategic" raw materials normally imported. Yet experience in the last war shows that shortages become almost universal in modern war, and many sorts of materials, semi-finished or finished goods that could be stored, are apt to be short, as well as transport services, shipping in particular, which can be stored in effect by having stockpiles as close as possible to locations of use.

6. The largest and most potentially important project of this nature that I suggest for consideration on both technical and economic grounds is the stockpiling in the United Kingdom and allied European countries of Canadian-owned wheat. This, of course, would be for the purpose of saving shipping under the very difficult and dangerous conditions likely to be present in the next war. While the assessment of the submarine danger seems to have become less terrifying than a year ago, it remains most serious. Moreover the outbreak of war this next time would seem likely to give rise to a very large early demand for shipping for military purposes.

Shipping is now in embarrassingly good supply, and cargo rates low. Wheat supplies are beginning to accumulate as surpluses. Apparently it is technically feasible to provide ample storage facilities not only at European ports but at more dispersed and strategically valuable internal points. Yet the importing countries clearly cannot afford the dollar expenditures that would be required to accumulate these war reserves. As long as it does not interfere with our other exports, which seems possible, nor reduce the stocks Europe would hold on her own account, Canada should not lose by shipping some of her own excess supplies, and even some of her normal year-end stocks, to overseas storage, using the present excess of Canadian ships. The building of storage facilities will presumably be necessary and this will probably be a limiting factor, but it does not seem a serious enough obstacle to prevent what appears otherwise on first sight to be a sensible policy. The movement overseas of, say, 100 million bushels of wheat in the next two years would as war preparation be equivalent to a considerable naval and shipbuilding programme, having in mind the convoying and losses that would be necessary in moving it under war conditions. The presence of these war stocks could also be expected to be a considerable comfort to the allied countries, and a form of joint action quite appropriate under the Atlantic Treaty. Of course, in reckoning potential requirements of allied countries, account must be taken not of their peacetime needs so much as their needs under the highly disturbed conditions of the next war. In the event these stocks were captured by the enemy, they would add relatively little to his war potential, as this is a type of supply which we may reasonably expect him to have fairly abundantly, but if it is considered necessary, it might be possible to arrange measures that could be taken at the last moment to render such emergency stocks unfit for eating.

It seems worth adding that if research could develop some cheap and satisfactory way of storing wheat for long periods in relatively small quantities, some of these war stocks could be dispersed as potential emergency rations to be available in allied countries even in the face of a breakdown in their internal transport system — a condition that seems quite possible in view of the strength of the medium and short range air attack power of the potential enemy.

7. Similar considerations might apply to the holding overseas of Canadian-owned stocks of certain of our other staple export products. Metals are an obvious case, particularly in respect of the United Kingdom, and storage of them ought to be relatively easy and cheap. Presumably the United Kingdom will be using metals in production at least during the early months of the war. Lumber and some other wood products may also be worth holding as well, if suitable arrangements can be made for keeping the stocks "turning over". Indeed this should be possible even if the normal sources of supply are to be "non-Canadian", for our important action will be in furnishing (and financing) the inventory from our surplus, and we could without additional expense — other than that of holding — replace it and keep turning over the stocks by use of the normal non-Canadian supplies. In view of our own exchange situation, and for budget reasons, the accumulation of these stocks overseas should be done only when we have excess production or capacity in Canada that enables the war reserves to be set up without loss of export income.

8. Perhaps one should carry thinking and action a stage further, if the United States will consider matters of this kind. Prospects for Europe in the event of an all-out Russian attack — and that is what we must expect — seem so seriously bad that we can hardly anticipate much in the way of normal civilian production being carried on. The destruction and disorganization behind the lines on the Continent and in the United Kingdom would seem likely to be far greater than on either side in the last war. Possibly the U.K. and the others will have to do as Russia apparently did at the height of the last war and suspend altogether the organized production of most civilian goods — even those normally considered essential — and devote what productive efforts they can organize to war purposes and the support of their own and allied services. This obviously will impose great hardships on the civilians and might seriously upset civilian morale, particularly when combined with all the suffering and the all-pervasive propaganda that must be expected. Such a situation might be helped in a very valuable way by the provision of minimum supplies of the most urgent civilian goods from overseas. But here again shipping and competing demands of war would likely seriously restrict, it not prevent altogether, the furnishing of even urgently needed items. This possibly could be provided against by holding in stock in the United Kingdom and Continental allied countries war reserves of important storable items of essential civilian supplies — utility clothing, textiles, medical supplies, items to repair or replace housing, and household necessities likely to be destroyed on a large scale by bombing. These supplies are of types which might well be obtainable in the next few years from surplus North American capacity. Their total potential value, and the warehousing problems to which they would give rise, are so large that a program of this kind would only be feasible if undertaken in large part by the United States. If, however, Canada successfully commenced a modest program in respect of wheat, metals, and perhaps lumber, it might lead the United States to consider a larger and more general programme.

9. The transfer of these war reserves to allied countries in the event of war would probably have to be made without payment, just as would the transfer of most currently produced supplies at that time. This should not be a material objection to the plan, however, as it is manifestly going to be impossible to carry on the next war except by very widespread application of Mutual Aid principles, and no other international preparations for it can be made without also running into this same eventual transfer problem.

10. Stockpiling of our reserves in Canada would also appear to be worth consideration in relation to preparations for our own war production program, particularly if we run into serious need for widespread action to maintain employment. Experience in the last war shows how quickly and widely bottlenecks can develop. Large scale inventories of raw and semi-finished materials could do a great deal to overcome, or at least delay, such difficulties. The importance and possibilities of adequate inventories as an aid not only in this way but in making possible more efficient use of labour and equipment can hardly be over-emphasized (see the article by J.R. Hicks in Lloyds Bank Review in 1947). The accumulation of large reserves of both non-ferrous and specialized ferrous metals, for example, could be a partial substitute for creating additional capacity that would be excess in nearly all normal times, and would appear to be a much cheaper and more sensible way of providing for peak requirements of wartime. Moreover, these stocks could be so distributed as to reduce the probable requirements for internal transport at the peak of the war effort. Further, this is the type of goods most likely to be left in surplus supply when domestic capital investment slackens, and for which it is difficult to stimulate alternative demands on short notice. I would therefore suggest we should analyze and consider the possibilities of utilizing surplus Canadian metal production capacity to create substantial war reserves to be stored relatively close to probable centres of use in the event of war. Of course, such a program should be related to, and supplement, the stockpiling program of the United States, and it would be important that we do not accept responsibility for financing stockpiles for U.S. production.

11. While metals are the most obvious items for such a programme, there are substantial arguments in favour of considering a broader programme. The facts that Canada's war production must be largely for forces other than her own, that she is to some extent a marginal supplier, and that it is difficult to get definite indications in advance of what will really be required by her allies, make it difficult to carry out adequate preparation for industrial production of war equipment. Moreover, the advance production of military equipment for reserves entails the risk of serious obsolescence. Yet experience suggests that when war arrives, our industrial capacity will be fully required after the initial organizing period and civilian requirements will compete with war supplies for labour and raw materials, if not for factory capacity. More productive resources for war use can be made available by advance action to provide for these civilian requirements. Many of them are of a relatively standard nature — or can be under war conditions — and can be stored for long periods. Their production by excess capacity and labour in times of economic recession in the early 1950's could add substantially to our potential capacity to wage war in later years — and should war dangers disappear, such supplies are of a type that can be used either in Canada or abroad. The possibilities in this line extend from standard items of clothing or textiles to standard models of cars, on the consumers' side, and from such things as paper and packaging materials to standard items of industrial and commercial equipment and their component, possibly even railway rolling stock. Indeed it would be possible to go even further and make ready a supply of prefabricated hutments and housing for meeting the almost inevitable shortages of housing and other accommodation that we seem likely to face in a war in the middle or late '50's, particularly having in mind the increasing ability of the potential enemy to reach North American centres with bombing raids that now we must regard as more than merely diversionary.

12. The large scale application of ideas mentioned in the last paragraph would, of course, be limited by warehousing space, and would require considerable construction of reserve storage centres in those locations that would minimize transport requirements in wartime.

13. Apart from consideration of costs and possibly more useful alternative means of employing unemployed labour and capacity, there will be obstacles to any programme along these lines from those who fear the possibility of the dumping of these reserves in future peacetime markets, and the possible depressing effects on prices of the existence of such dangers. Even if a Government pledged itself not to release such stocks on the domestic market in peacetime, there might be fears that a more radical future Government might use them as a means of bringing pressure on business. It seems unlikely, however, that a Government would wish to exert the depressing effects upon production and employment that would result from liquidation of large war reserves except in boom conditions when the effects might be desirable as anti-inflationary measures.

14. The financing required for a programme of this kind and the costs of storage and interest, as well as potential losses on peace-time liquidation (possibly abroad) in the event that war does not come, are, of course, the principal objections to it and must determine the limits within which it would be worthwhile applying it. These must be set against our judgment as to the danger of war, and our willingness to accept a share of the costs of preparation for it. The issue will also be affected by the extent to which excess capacity and unemployment develop in Canada. Should the Government judge the danger of war later in the '50's as serious, and feel an obligation to accept a larger share of the Allied preparatory effort, the stockpiling of war reserves seems worth consideration as a means of using the type of resources that seem likely to be available in surplus supply in Canada in the next few years.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

TOP SECRET Ottawa, February 20, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC

It is appreciated that in view of our very tight budgetary situation, the present may not be the appropriate time to press for a contribution to mutual aid under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty. We may anticipate however considerable needling from our North Atlantic partners, especially from the United States, within the next few months, and, indeed, we have already been subject to some pressure.

The question arises whether contributions could not be related to the domestic situation. We are experiencing a substantial measure of unemployment, both in certain primary and secondary industries, and, although the economic prospects for 1950 appear to be good, employment may well remain below the 1948-1949 level unless some steps are taken to relieve the situation. There is the further problem of the decline in agricultural prices and the probability that the Government may be faced with substantial holdings of commodities purchased at floor prices. It may be that later in the Session proposals for the provision of mutual aid under the North Atlantic Treaty would be more timely, especially if it could be related to the employment situation. Officials of the Department, in consultation with officials of other departments, are therefore continuing to give consideration to a possible programme of mutual aid.

Attached is a very preliminary memorandum on which your comments would be appreciated.

Note de la Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison Division

TOP SECRET Ottawa, February 20, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY: CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

Article 3

"In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

1. As the Minister said in the House of Commons on November 16, 1949, the establishment of working organizations under the Treaty does not mean that our task has been completed. In fact, he said, it has only begun. He then went on to say, "In broad terms we are committed to provide such aid as we can reasonably be expected to contribute, in the form in which we can most effectively furnish it." He added that our contribution would be limited by our foreign exchange position and would be considerably facilitated by any arrangements which might be made to integrate military procurement within the North Atlantic area.

2. We have, of course, a general obligation to maintain a healthy economy and provide for our own defence. In view of our geographic location, our resources and the present level of economic activity, however, our more exposed and poorer partners are undoubtedly looking to us for some direct contribution to their assistance. Indeed, some of the questions raised in the meetings of the Defence Financial and Economic Committee Working Staff have been fairly pointed reminders that the Canadian Government should be considering how it can best make its contribution under Article 3, not only to self-help, but in the form of mutual aid as well.

3. In a memorandum for use in the Department, it is hardly necessary to elaborate on the statement that the international situation is the most compelling argument in favour of making a positive contribution to the partnership on which the national security of Canada largely depends. Recent reports from our Missions in Europe reflect the fear and uncertainty which have coloured political attitudes towards the Atlantic Pact, especially since the loss of U.S. atomic monopoly and since the recent decision to develop the hydrogen bomb, coupled with U.S. reluctance to make any new move towards reaching agreement on international control. Considering the pioneering role which we played in the creation of the North Atlantic Treaty, our partners, including the United States, may question our sincerity if we make no mutual aid contribution, especially if we continue to enjoy a surplus of revenues over expenditures and a comfortable working margin of U.S. dollar holdings (now running at about one billion).

U.S. and U.K. Contributions as a Yardstick

4. Under their Mutual Defence Assistance Act, the United States are giving $1 billion in 1950 and 1951 for military supplies for North Atlantic countries — half a billion in cash and half a billion contract authority. The European countries will be making their contributions chiefly through limited transfers of stocks and military production. However, the United Kingdom Government will probably be giving the equivalent of about $125 millions, mostly in the form of creating additional military production in order to rearm its Western Union partners. This places their contribution to mutual aid roughly on a par with that of the United States in proportion to national income (8:1), although the U.K. contribution will, of course, be more than offset by what they will receive under M.D.A.A. By the same yardstick, Canada would during the next two years, have to contribute about $75 millions (Canadian) to make a comparable "mutual aid" contribution.[28] (Taking our 1950-1951 defence budget of $425 millions, our contribution towards "self-help" — our own defence forces — is less than half that of the United States, and about half that of the United Kingdom, in proportion to national income; and we are currently making no contribution to the economic recovery of Europe nor to the military security of areas outside the North Atlantic.)[29]

5. Such comparison is, at least to some extent, misleading. Ours is not the major role; we are the only country of the North Atlantic pact that will be paying cash for all our supplies from the United States;[30] no other North Atlantic country probably pays such a high proportion of U.S. dollars for its military equipment, including components; we have a thinly spread population and a vast area to defend; and our political problem is complicated by a tradition of extremely small peacetime forces and correspondingly low defence budgets, a tradition from which we are now beginning to depart under the compulsion of events.

Domestic Ground on which Contributions Might be Justified

6.(a) Maintenance of a Canadian Defence Industry

Orders for military supplies for the Canadian armed forces alone will not be sufficient to maintain or develop in Canada even the essential nucleus of an armament industry that would be vital to us in time or war, unless we sell or give arms to other countries. The Canadair plant in Montreal, for example, will probably be tapering off production of F-86 aircraft for the RCAF by the end of 1952 and without further orders might well have to close down. If we see our role in a future war as an immediately available arsenal for Europe, the nucleus of our defence industry must be built up.

Known Western European deficiencies in military equipment that Canadian industry is capable of supplying include the following items:

Army — Motor Transport Armoured Vehicles
Signals Equipment
Engineering Stores
Navy — Aluminum Mine Sweepers
Electronics (anti-submarine, radar and fire control)
Air Force — Day and Night Fighters (such as F-86's and CF-100's)
Radar Equipment

(b) Price Support Policies

It is probable that we shall shortly have surpluses in a number of agricultural products and surplus capacity in base metals production. Even in cases where there will be sufficient export sales to keep companies going (such as aluminum), there may well be idle capacity which will be reflected in rising unemployment figures. Spending the public funds in order to supply raw material stockpiles for the defence industries of the European industrial countries would be a worthy contribution to meeting their needs which, at the same time, would help to support important parts of the Canadian economy. The stockpile scheme could be extended to a variety of durable commodities in surplus. In total war civilian as well as military supplies would be required and our shipping space would be at a premium; the time to stockpile is before an emergency arises, when strategic materials are available and shipping rates cheap.

(c) Maintenance of Employment

A contribution to our North Atlantic partners could probably be spent, as suggested in (a) and (b) above, in such a way as to help to maintain a high level of employment in Canada, as well as serving other ends. Possibly to some extent military equipment and other commodities which might be made available to our partners could be selected with a view to maintaining employment.

The Form of Possible Contributions: Lump Sum or ad hoc

7. In Ottawa it has been generally assumed that a lump sum contribution was not possible during the fiscal year 1950-1951 for budgetary reasons — that the Government would be extremely reluctant to add to the great pressures which have already been placed upon the budget in a year when our revenues will be substantially reduced by last year's taxation cuts and probably by a declining level of economic activity as well, while, at the same time, there are more demands than ever for domestic expenditure, e.g., for defence and to meet unemployment and welfare demands. The alternatives of increasing taxation within a year of the election, or budgeting for a deficit while we are near the top of the economic cycle, are equally distasteful. From this point of view, it would appear that the only course open to the Government would be to make a very limited contribution to mutual aid for other North Atlantic countries and to make that contribution on the basis of ad hoc decisions on specific requests for our assistance based on proven deficiencies within the North Atlantic area.

8. As against the ad hoc approach, both Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Wrong have reiterated their strong views that the Government should announce, as soon as possible, a lump sum which would represent the financial limits of our contribution, without necessarily saying how, in detail, that sum might be spent until we know more precisely what the deficiencies of our European partners would be on the basis of present and planned forces.

9. Mr. Wilgress has put forward the argument that if we wait until specific requests come to us, we shall be getting the tag ends of orders that nobody else wants to meet. The great advantage of deciding what we are going to do now would be that it would enable us to cut the coat of our aid to suit the cloth of our economy, tailoring our contribution not only to meet European deficiencies but also to give relief to some of the hard-pressed sections of the Canadian economy.

10. Mr. Wrong has laid special stress on the more general political argument that an ad hoc approach will have no dramatic appeal whatever, even if we were to spend as much in meeting specific requests as we would if we announced our target figure for North Atlantic aid now. He has repeatedly drawn to our attention the understandable United States fear that other North Atlantic countries might be coasting on United States aid without exerting themselves on their own behalf. It would clearly be of some help to the United States Administration if Congress knew, before they considered their foreign aid appropriations for the next fiscal year, that we were going to pull our weight within the limits of our resources. A further advantage might well be that we would receive more sympathetic consideration from Congress in our request for legislation to meet our procurement difficulties.[31]

11. Even if the ad hoc approach were adopted, it is difficult to see how it would in fact avoid the necessity for making appropriations of funds to cover the cost of the supplies and equipment which we would send to Europe. The Department of National Defence, with a defence budget of $425 millions, cannot afford to pay for anything more than specialist training facilities for about 250 army and air force personnel from North Atlantic countries. Mr. Abbott has agreed with Mr. Claxton that other forms of aid will have to be financed from other sources, not from the defence budget; no doubt other departments are in the same position; so that sooner or later an appropriation will be necessary if anything is to be done.

Possible Courses of Action

(a) A general statement might be made saying what form the Canadian contribution under North Atlantic was going to take (training, defence raw materials and military equipment have already been discussed by Cabinet), but not specifying how much we would spend. This course of action would hardly meet the requirements of our international situation and would not inspire much enthusiasm in Washington or elsewhere.

(b) Parliament might be asked for an appropriation before the end of the present fiscal year; that appropriation would simply reduce the surplus which we under-

It should be the other way around. [L.B. Pearson] stand is expected to be of the order of $300 millions, and would avoid having to make any appropriation in the budget for the coming fiscal year.[32] So that the funds would be technically "spent" before the end of the fiscal year, it would be necessary to turn over the money to the Canadian Commercial Corporation or in some other way which could be devised, get it off the books of the Canadian Government before March 31, 1950. (An operation of this kind was put through in the spring of 1946 when the bulk of our UNRRA contribution was hastily transferred.) This course of action could obviously lead to some criticism of the Government on the grounds that what was being done was a fairly transparent device for spending this year's funds next year.

(c) An announcement by the Government now that during the next two years Canada would be prepared to spend up to, say, $75 millions (or whatever sum is proposed) for mutual aid for our North Atlantic partners. In implementing this announcement, we could in fact provide for only a part of the expenditure during 1950-1951. The remainder would then be included in the budget for the fiscal year 1951-1952 when it might be more acceptable politically to find means of securing additional revenues, if that should be necessary. Both the U.S. and U.K. aid programmes are planned for a two year period: the United States will be spending only a fraction of their M.D.A.A. appropriations during their current fiscal year ending June 30, 1950.

Timing

An early announcement of Canadian intentions to contribute would have the following advantages:

(a) Since European "shopping lists" were to have been completed and given to the Standing Group in Washington by February 15, the chances of Canadian industry getting orders would be materially improved. Without a contribution from the Canadian Government, Canadian firms may get little or no orders at all.

(b) It should make easier our current negotiations with the U.S. for a revision of legislation to provide for procurement of military supplies and to permit of reciprocal purchases of military components. It might even be possible to have the U.S. meet out of M.D.A.A. funds the U.S. dollar content of our contribution.[33]

Le premier secrétaire du haut-commissariat au Royaume-Uni à la Direction de liaison avec la Défense

First Secretary, High Commission in United Kingdom, to Defence Liaison Division

SECRET AND PERSONAL London, February 25, 1950

Dear Jim [George],

I was much interested in your letter of February 18th† and the enclosure[34] concerning a suggestion that certain raw materials might be stockpiled in Europe as part of Canada's contribution towards North Atlantic defence. Although I would not pretend to have any "special ideas" on it there are some thoughts which come to mind which might be of interest to you.

To begin with, I note that the memorandum accompanying your letter appears to consider that any country which takes out material from the stockpile for its own use (even though such an operation might be required in order to secure the necessary turnover of stocks) should "purchase the replacement quantity from Canada for cash". This feature seems to me politically — or psychologically — dangerous. I think it would be desirable (if at all practicable) to combine any stockpiling arrangement with some provision for the free supply of similar materials (either on our own or in co-operation with the United States) to European countries which have need of them now in connection with their defence programmes. In the absence of some such provision it strikes me that the proposed arrangement might be misinterpreted by the Europeans, some of whom would doubtless regard it as confirming their worst suspicions that we may be prepared to see them thrown to the wolves (or is it bears?) — with all sorts of fine provisions for ensuring supplies of food and raw materials after they are in the clutches of the wolves and with every good intention to rescue them from the wolves as soon as possible. If we are to finance the building up of stocks in Europe for free distribution in the event of war but were to insist that any quantities withdrawn from such stocks (or imported separately) for the purpose of advance defence preparations must be paid for in cash, some Europeans might well say that our willingness to help in the event of war was all very commendable but would it not be rather a good idea to concentrate more on strengthening them in order to prevent a war — and that can only be done by supplying them with materials and equipment now.

I know that, even apart from any Canadian budgetary difficulties, it might be difficult to allow the distribution of materials needed for defence purposes at bargain prices or on a free basis. In the first place, it is hard to distinguish between materials destined for North Atlantic military production in a particular country and similar materials destined for civilian production — as the United States is finding out in connection with requests for the supply of raw materials under the M.D.A.A. Presumably, however, this is a problem which will have to be got over if that part of the United States Mutual Defence Assistance programme aimed at increasing European production is to be carried out, and it should be possible for us to make use of the results of this United States experience in devising arrangements for making raw materials available (either from stockpiles or from our current output) for strictly North Atlantic military production in Europe. In the second place, the release of Canadian materials might discourage the United States from allowing some off-shore purchasing in Canada under the M.D.A.A. On this point, I gather that your advices from Washington are to the effect that such off-shore purchases are not likely to be large in any case. If it is thought that some off-shore purchases might be forthcoming in the absence of the free provision of such materials, it should be possible to work out some arrangement with the United States whereby the provision of materials of the sort included in the proposed stockpiles would not seriously prejudice (and might actually improve) the prospects for United States off-shore purchases of similar materials in Canada.

I would not presume even to sketch the sort of arrangements which might be required for building up the proposed stocks, for storing them (an aspect of the problem into which, I believe, the FAO went at great length in the case of perishable commodities in connection with the earlier proposals for a World Food Board), for the custody of them (which I should have thought would have to be vested in the Canadian Government since the NATO is unlikely for some time to be competent — either legally or otherwise — to accept custody), or for controlling any peace-time releases in a manner which would not depress prices and sales of similar Canadian commodities in ordinary trade with the NAT countries. I am sure, however, that if the objective is accepted, it is not beyond the wit of man to devise satisfactory arrangements.

I think what I am saying, in brief is really that the provision against the contingency of war represented by Bryce's stockpiling suggestion should be accompanied by some evidence of activity to prevent a war, or to prevent defeat of Western Europe in the initial stages, if some rather dangerous political consequences are not to be invited. The easiest way to avoid the unfortunate political implications mentioned above, it would seem to me, would be to make available currently for defence purposes in Europe at least some quantities of the kinds of materials which are going into the stockpiles. If this is not practicable, it might be possible to avoid the mischievous political interpretation of the stockpiling project by making a fairly substantial contribution to the current strengthening of Europe's defences in fields quite unrelated to the stockpiled materials.

By itself the proposed project seems to me to be somewhat dangerous politically, but even by itself it might still be better than nothing.

When I discussed this stockpiling proposal and my comments on it with [Major General] Fin Clark informally yesterday afternoon, he made some observations regarding certain strategic and military considerations which might be of interest to you. Those observations are summarized in the enclosed note.

In addition to asking for any "special ideas" which we might have on the stockpiling proposal, you also enquired concerning our views on the general question of the form which the Canadian contribution might best take. Briefly, the following is about the order of priority which I would suggest (and with which I think Fin Clark would probably agree).

(1) Finished military equipment — From the point of view of strengthening European defences as rapidly as possible it is obvious that our most effective contribution would be military equipment which, if the need arose, could be used at once. The making of our contribution in this form would also seem to have the additional advantage from our point of view that it would place us in a better position to supply an increased volume of equipment in the event of war. If we do not start supplying equipment now (and I can quite appreciate that it might be difficult to turn over much capacity to military production at this stage) we may find ourselves left to supply only raw materials and components for United States or United Kingdom equipment if war comes — with some rather unfortunate consequences for our commercial position after such a war (on the assumption that we survived). Furthermore, the supply of finished equipment at this stage might be preferable from the point of view of helping to maintain employment in Canada — although it would be regrettable if we came to regard the production of armaments as justified merely in order to keep up employment. While there are many considerations to be balanced against one another, it would seem to me that it would be best for us to supply finished equipment so far as possible both in the interest of strengthening Europe as effectively and rapidly as possible and in the interest of protecting our future commercial position and possibly of helping to maintain employment.

(2) Raw materials and components for the current production of military equipment in Europe. Although this form of contribution would not have as direct or immediate effects on the defensive strength of the European countries, it might appear to have the advantage that it would have less disturbing consequences for our peace-time pattern of production. The European countries might even prefer this form of contribution since it would help them to maintain employment. In this connection, you will probably recall that the Belgians wanted the United States to supply less finished equipment and more raw materials in order to help them avert a degree of unemployment which might itself threaten the security of Western Europe. A contribution of this kind however (in addition to making a less immediate contribution to effective defence) would have the disadvantage from our point of view that when it was all over we might find ourselves left as the "hewers of wood and drawers of water".

(3) Stockpiling of essential military and civilian types of raw materials, accompanied by some related Canadian contribution to the immediate strengthening of Europe's defences (whether such stockpiles should be located in Europe or North America is a matter which would require consideration.)

(4) Stockpiling of such materials without a related contribution to the immediate strengthening of Europe. This type of contribution would seem to me (for the reasons explained in this letter) to be the least satisfactory.

In all of this I am not, of course, presuming to judge whether (and in what proportions) in the interests of the North Atlantic area as a whole it is better for Canada to strengthen her own defences or to divert resources to the strengthening of other North Atlantic countries. My remarks relate merely to that part of Canada's resources which it might be decided to divert to the assistance of others.

I apologize for the rambling character of these various observations, but I hope you will find them of some interest.

In concluding this quite informal and personal note I would merely observe that an announcement regarding any proposed Canadian contribution would probably have much more effect if it were to be made within the next two months than if it were to be delayed until later in the year. As you will be aware from our reports on the Western Union financial discussions, serious difficulties are being encountered and there is a real likelihood that some projects may get held up as a result. Similarly, as you know better than I, the United States Administration is probably in for a pretty sticky time for the next month or so in attempting to persuade Congress to make a further contribution to mutual defence assistance. Finally, there is the prospect of a series of quite important meetings within the North Atlantic Defence Organization (and in the Western Union Organization) around the end of March or early in April. Under these circumstances anything that could be said regarding the probable character of the Canadian contribution under Article 3 might help to break some of the log-jams and to get things moving. It is probably too much to hope that anything can be done by that time, and I am sure you appreciate, without my saying so, that late March or early April would seem to be a good psychological moment for such an announcement with really telling effect — if it were only practicable.

Yours sincerely,

ED RITCHIE

It seems to me that assistance given by Canada to any other member of the North Atlantic Treaty should be calculated to achieve the object set out in Article 3 of the Treaty, that is to "maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack". Mr. Bryce's proposal, if put into effect, would not appear to achieve this object in that the material stockpiled could not be used except in an emergency. Unless the countries holding the stockpiles are permitted to draw from them in order to build up their military equipment so as to discourage armed attack or failing this effectively to resist it, I do not consider that the object of Article 3 is achieved. It is unfortunately probable that a state of emergency will nearly correspond in time to the beginning of hostilities. The effective use of stockpiles could not be made until after the beginning of war and, while it is desirable to have stockpiles of strategic materials available for production during war, the location of such stockpiles is of great importance. With the present disparity between the forces which the USSR could employ against Western Europe and those available for its defence, it is eminently desirable to have the maximum number of well-equipped and well-trained forces in Western Europe. If the allied forces in Western Europe are insufficient to deter aggression and insufficient to prevent the USSR from over-running the greater part of Western Europe in a short space of time, then the stockpiles of materials could not be used either to deter aggression or in time to make equipment calculated to save Western Europe, but could be used by the enemy for the further prosecution of the war.

It is therefore my opinion that the best way to achieve the object of Article 3 is to give the Western European countries priority for finished military equipment and to stockpile strategic materials principally in North America.

A contribution to the object of Article 3 would still be made if Canada were to supply raw materials for the immediate manufacture of military equipment by the Western European countries.

My argument may be woolly and full of fleas but, to summarize, the points I wish to make are these:

(a) The object of the exercise is to deter aggression and, failing this, successfully to resist armed attack. The chances of achieving this will be increased by having well-equipped and well-trained forces properly located.

(b) European members of the North Atlantic Treaty should be given high priority for finished military equipment. Canada could give aid to the European members of the North Atlantic Treaty in the form of finished military equipment or in the form of raw materials which could be made into military equipment by these countries now and not after the opening of hostilities.

(c) Stockpiles of strategic material should be kept in areas unlikely to be overrun by the enemy.

SECRET AND PERSONAL [London], April 18, 1950

Dear Brooke [Claxton],

When I last saw you in The Hague you invited me to write you personally on occasions, and I am taking advantage of this invitation now to consult you on the question of whether we should consider making a contribution of army equipment (in stock as war reserves) under Article 3 of the Treaty.

As you know, one of my duties is to study the most critical deficiencies among North Atlantic countries and to communicate with Ottawa so that further consideration can be given to the question of mutual aid. Any messages I send I propose to make fairly specific so that a decision may be taken on each item, one way or the other. As I understand it, we are looking for some items which

(a) would be regarded as typically Canadian, and therefore politically acceptable;

(b) we are making in small quantities for our armed forces and a larger production run would effect economies for us;

(c) if produced would have other collateral advantages such as assisting to overcome local unemployment problems, etc.

There are some items which appear to meet partially the above conditions such as Arctic equipment, aircraft, electronics, and picrite, but before raising any of these for consideration I feel that we should review the possibility of contributing from our reserve stocks of army equipment. This idea is not new of course, as I recall that on occasions in the past some reference has been made to the advantages that would accrue to the army if they were able to dispose of some of their reserve equipment and replace these gradually with modern types, possibly of U.S. design. It would seem to me, therefore, that if we are able to make any further contribution under Article 3 we should first consider the question of supplying divisional equipment or selected items of such equipment in reserve stocks which are urgently needed by the ground forces of Western Europe who would be the first to meet an enemy attack, whereas it would be perhaps twelve to eighteen months before a Canadian expeditionary force would be mobilized for overseas. In the meantime some of the equipment might be becoming obsolescent and if no emergency occurs in the next few years it would seem doubtful whether the Government would permit a force to go overseas with last war's equipment.

There is no doubt that the shortages in divisional equipment are amongst the most critical, and although present estimates are of a preliminary nature, any new calculations of deficiencies based on regional defence plans will almost certainly increase rather than decrease these estimates (that is so far as army equipment is concerned, although this is not necessarily true of naval equipment).

The case of the Netherlands is known to you. They are repatriating forces from Indonesia and plan to retain a portion in the service and return a portion to civil occupations. This programme, which is a difficult one at best, is seriously handicapped by the shortage of equipment without which they cannot arm the additional divisions that would be formed either for training or for fighting purposes.

It is a safe conclusion too, that the shortages of divisional equipment are of such a scale that no combination of measures such as new production programmes and U.S. aid will fully satisfy the requirements.

The conclusion one draws from this is that a contribution from our reserve stocks of full divisional equipment or such items as vehicles, anti-aircraft guns, and others that we are holding would be regarded as a useful gift and would be welcomed by army [sic] provided of course, that a replacement programme was authorized outside of present appropriations. This, as I see it, is the crux of the situation, and it is for this reason that I am consulting you in advance.

I am, of course, assuming that External Affairs will take the initiative concerning the question of any further contribution under Article 3, and if proposals are made to Cabinet Mr. Pearson will be the Minister who sponsors them. Therefore, before raising the question of war reserves for consideration I should like to ascertain whether the proposition has your support. General Clark and I have discussed the matter at some length and he feels that from a military point of view there is much to be said in its favour. He tells me that he has had some correspondence with the C.G.S. on the subject. If, however, there are military or other considerations which cause you to regard the proposal with disfavour I will direct my efforts in other channels. I wonder if you would mind letting me have your reaction to this as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,
[E.W.T. GILL]

SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, April 27, 1950

Dear Evan [Gill]:

Many thanks for your letter which I found very interesting. While one cannot disagree with what you say, I find any approach to this subject difficult indeed.

What must be recognized is that the Department of Defence is going to have an appropriation this year (I hope) of $425,000,000 and not a cent more for any purpose whatever.

Insofar as there is equipment in existence which is surplus to our requirements, that equipment can no doubt be made available to North Atlantic Treaty nations, with or without payments and upon such other conditions as the Government may decide.

It is understood, however, as you know, that anything in the nature of materials or new equipment would be the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce. This Department has no vote for this purpose and I doubt very much whether a vote would be forthcoming, except in consequence of some all-round arrangements which really began to tackle the problem of standardization and procurement.

For example, an arrangement whereby we send British type equipment to NAT countries and replace this with American type equipment manufactured in Canada, would be so much in our interest and in that of the United States as well as of the NAT organization as a whole, that we believe that it should lead the United States to pay or contribute to the cost of such Canadian made equipment.

In circumstances similar to these we could apply some of the money available for the acquisition of new equipment for ourselves and if the run was large enough so as to reduce the cost substantially, we could probably make a pretty fair size contribution.

Consequently I agree completely with the desiderata contained in your paragraphs (a), (b), and (c). There still, however, remains the question of payment and as I have said above is, as you know, the decision of the Government up to this time.

In this connection I enclose a copy of the speech I made at Sherbrooke last week in which I deal with some aspects of procurement.[35] This was discussed a good deal on my recent visit to the United States with Mr. Johnson and others. I must say the discussions were very favourable indeed but as we have found in the past there is apt to be a pretty wide gap between agreement at a high level and action below.

Incidentally, the exercise and demonstration at Fort Benning and Eglin Field were very interesting. It gave an impressive demonstration of United States power.

I hope you are enjoying things. With all the best,

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 898 London, May 12, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD

At May 10th meeting of the PWS agreement was reached on the procedure for distributing the Belgian surplus stocks of United States origin. Reference was made to these stocks at The Hague meetings. They are made up of a fairly wide range of army equipment, of which a large proportion is spare parts. The equipment was left in Belgium after the war and the United States turned it over to the Belgian Government, retaining a half interest if and when the material was sold. The United States have now waived their interest and the Belgian Government are making it available free of charge except for transportation costs to be paid by the receiver.

2. Briefly, the arrangements are as follows:

(a) Belgium will distribute to each country through the PWS inventories of the equipment available for transfer.

(b) Each country shall appoint a person to act as their agent and applications for equipment will be made through him direct to the Belgian office of mutual aid. The deadline for receiving applications is June 30th.

(c) Arrangements may be made through the agent for inspecting the material between May 15th and June 15th.

(d) OMA Belgium will advise PWS where applications exceed availabilities and PWS will act as the allocating agency. In performing this duty, they may seek advice from General Kibbler's organization, the American Military Advisory Group, who have full knowledge of deficiencies and end-item aid.

3. They are not expecting us to apply for any of these stocks and unless instructions are received to the contrary we will not take any action to be included among the applicants. We expect, however, to receive a catalogue and we will send this to you as soon as it is delivered.

4. During the discussion of this item in the PWS the Chairman referred to the feeling at The Hague meetings that little or no progress has been made in implementing the mutual aid principle of Article 3 of the Treaty and observed that the Belgian transfer was a concrete achievement under this head. He hoped "without pointing the finger at anyone" that other countries would review their stocks and determine whether they had anything which could be made available to other countries to meet deficiencies.

5. It is interesting to observe as a result of this offer that in the United States draft resolutions for the forthcoming Council meeting, copy of which was sent to you in the Minister's telegram No. 890,† Belgium is linked with the United States and United Kingdom as a mutual aid contributor.

6. In my immediately following telegram, I suggest that we review our existing stocks of army equipment to see if there is anything that could be made available as mutual aid.

NORTH ATLANTIC MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD

Reference my immediately preceding telegram.

It is my understanding that when the question of a possible Canadian contribution under Article 3 was raised early this year, it was decided, except for the offer of training facilities,[36] to wait until the deficiencies of North Atlantic countries had been determined and then consider whether anything could be done in the way of mutual aid towards overcoming these. I am therefore commenting on certain deficiencies reported by North Atlantic countries so that the Government, if it so desires, may review their position with respect to mutual aid.

2. Lists of deficiencies have now been compiled. These are only of a preliminary nature and are now being reviewed on the basis of military plans with a view to producing more accurate estimates. The military plans may well be modified and the requirement for equipment reduced accordingly. Certain of the deficiencies are, however, of such magnitude that they are unlikely even if scaled down, to be satisfied by United States aid, additional military production programmes, transfers, or any combination of the measures now planned. These deficiency lists show critical shortages among Western European countries of army equipment generally, including such items as ammunition, vehicles, anti aircraft guns, mines, some signal equipment and engineering stores.

3. The position of the Netherlands is, I think, known to you. They are in the process of repatriating about 100,000 troops from Indonesia, a proportion of which they plan to retain in the army and a proportion to demobilize for employment in civilian occupations. The success of this programme, which is a difficult one at best, is prejudiced through lack of army equipment, without which they cannot arm new divisions even on a training basis.

4. As reported in your telegrams Nos. 206 of February 14th† and 302 of March 7th† and other correspondence, a preliminary survey in Ottawa has indicated that Canada has virtually no surpluses of military equipment, but we suggest that the time has come to review policy with respect to the retention of war reserves in the light of our obligations under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty. In such a review, you might wish to consider whether any equipment now held in war reserves could be made available to the European signatories to meet their immediate needs and where it will be of greater use in the overall defence of the North Atlantic region since it would be of immediate service in the event of an emergency.

5. In submitting the above proposal, we have it in mind that the defence authorities in Ottawa have on occasion indicated that an arrangement which would permit us to dispose of our United Kingdom type equipment and embark on a replacement programme of United States types would be a step towards standardization and integrated production and would be very much in the general interests of North Atlantic defence as a whole. There may be certain items of equipment which we particularly wish to replace now with United States type or with respect to which development on a successor type is well advanced. If there are, we might accept the risk involved in reducing our present stocks and make them available to other countries in the form of mutual aid. Vehicles and light anti-aircraft equipment are in the critically short category and these might be examined first. (We note from External Affairs telegram EX-593† to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington that some light anti-aircraft equipment has recently been released for sale to Israel.)

6. Any risk involved in reducing our existing stocks, in our opinion, be weighed not only against the advantages of replacement with new designs but also the advantages to be gained by Canada making a mutual aid contribution. The arguments in favour of a lump sum contribution of mutual aid have been stated fully in my letter of 12th December 1949, to Mr. Heeney,[37] as well as in communications from Mr. Wrong and in departmental memoranda. While the advantages of early action on our part have to some extent disappeared with the passage of time, the reasons put forward then in favour of a contribution still obtain and are applicable to a contribution of the kind now proposed. As time goes on pressures for mutual aid are bound to increase and in the absence of any further Canadian contribution our position will become more embarrassing. For example, the draft United States resolution for consideration by the Council at their forthcoming meeting stresses the importance of mutual aid and recommends "that each party make its full contribution through mutual assistance in all forms to achieve that integrated strength necessary for the defence of the North Atlantic area." Any offers we could make now of army equipment likely to be of use to the Western European countries, even if of modest proportions, would be an earnest of our good intentions to do something towards implementing the mutual aid principle of Article 3.

7. If this is given favourable consideration, we think it would be advantageous to notify the Supply Organization as soon as possible of the stocks we are prepared to make available and the terms on which this would be done.

SECRET AND PERSONAL London, [May] 17, 1950

Dear Arnold [Heeney],

The High Commissioner's telegram No. 899 of May 12th suggests that the Government review their policy with respect to the holding of reserve stocks of military equipment and decide whether anything could be offered in the way of mutual aid to other North Atlantic countries.

This proposal carries the judgment of Norman Robertson, Bert MacKay and General Clark as well as the High Commissioner. We hoped to clear it with the Minister before despatch but had no opportunity to do so.

The course proposed seems to us to have so many advantages — political, strategic, military and financial, some of which were touched upon in the telegram — that I hope it will be given some consideration.

From a strategic standpoint, a Canadian contribution of divisional equipment might mean the difference between having or not having a European division in being to meet an initial attack, and it appears to us more important to have one there than to have one in reserve which would not be available for operations until a year or 18 months after the commencement of a war. From a financial standpoint, it would appear that a contribution of this type could be made without involving any additional expenditure this year (unless it be transportation costs) and possibly only a small expenditure next year since the replacement programme could normally be phased over a three or four year period. If the international situation deteriorates and the replacement programme has to be accelerated then conditions are likely to be such that the problem of financing higher defence expenditures largely disappears.

As to our reserve stock position, I understand that Army has several thousand vehicles which they are drawing on at the rate of a few hundred a year in order to meet current requirements. I understand too, that this equipment is likely to become obsolete within four or five years. It would, therefore, seem reasonable for us to hold say three or four years supply at peacetime rates of consumption and offer the balance to European countries where it could be put to immediate use. Since this information is based on hearsay it should be used guardedly.

If the subject is to be considered by the Defence Economic Committee I suggest that it await Norman Robertson's return. Coming fresh from the Council meetings where a resolution has been passed calling for greater effort in mutual assistance he will perhaps have some views on this aspect of North Atlantic co-operation.

While realizing that the Government has not been disposed to consider a lump sum contribution, the High Commissioner and his officials connected with North Atlantic planning here remain of the opinion that Canada's obligation under the mutual assistance principle of Article 3 can best be met in this way. As it is conceivable that this decision will be reviewed in the light of the Council's resolution regarding mutual assistance I have in preparation a departmental memorandum on other possible forms of Canadian aid, such as military equipment from new production, raw materials, stock-piling, and stand-by production capacity, any of which might form part of a Canadian aid programme. In my mind, however, these should be regarded as possibilities for the future. The immediate contribution of some military equipment from reserve stocks could be a self-contained contribution, or the first phase of a larger aid programme, whichever the Government feels disposed to do.

Yours sincerely,
EVAN [GILL]

Memorandum from Head, Defence Liaison Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, June 3, 1950

PANEL ON ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF DEFENCE QUESTIONS

There is to be a meeting of the Panel next Tuesday, June 6th, at 11 a.m. in the Privy Council Committee Room.[38] The agenda is attached.†

[38] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Mr. MacKay, Thanks — will you attend with me please. June 5 A.D.P.H[eeney].

2. As you will see, the first three items on the agenda are to be reports by Mr. Drury, General Foulkes and Mr. Robertson. Mr. Robertson's report will lead into a discussion of the fourth item on the agenda, the possibility of making a contribution of military equipment to our North Atlantic partners, which is, I think, the only item on which you will wish our comments. The fourth item has been broadly phrased, deliberately, but is intended to lead into a discussion of Mr. Gill's proposal that, in view of the political difficulties in deciding on an overall contribution to North Atlantic mutual aid, we should at least put before the Government a specific plan for making available certain standard items of army equipment in which we have adequate reserves, although not more than we would need to mobilize two divisions in wartime.

3. The attached Panel Document, E.D. 14,† which was prepared in the Department in order to give the necessary background for the discussion of this item, avoids raising some of the broader issues which will undoubtedly be brought up once the Panel get into a discussion of the subject.

4. From our discussions with officials of National Defence, we believe that General Foulkes may not be entirely sympathetic with Mr. Gill's proposal unless he can get Government approval for a programme for replacing Canadian Army equipment before any of his present stocks are sent abroad. Although he is evidently prepared to take a fairly broad view of the concept of "balanced collective forces" as it applies to Canada, and has, for example, recommended to his Minister since his return from the U.K. that we should be making more fighter and transport aircraft, he would naturally oppose any suggestion, which we understand Mr. Robertson may have in mind, that we supply from our holdings those items of Canadian Army equipment in which our European partners are deficient, up to a limit of equipment in these categories sufficient for one division; the question of replacement need not, in Mr. Robertson's view (as we have it second hand) be decided until the Government have reached a decision on the question of "balanced collective forces" — in other words, on the future size of the Canadian Army which could conceivably be cut down to one division so that we could spend more on air forces and possible anti-submarine naval forces.

5. If we are to make available equipment for one division from Canadian stocks, General Foulkes would rather try to get the United States to replace perhaps up to half of the equipment on condition that we made or bought the rest ourselves. His argument is, of course, that it is more logical for ground and air forces in North America to be equipped with U.S. type equipment and it is in the interests of the United States to have us make the change; there is a further argument that the value of the equipment we may give away would in all probability be only 1/5 or even 1/10 of the cost of replacing it with the latest U.S. type equipment.

6. At our request, the Chiefs of Staff Secretariat prepared a paper, copy attached,† which we had hoped would be suitable to circulate to members of the Panel as an introduction to the discussion of this item. I think you will agree that it was not suitable and, with the agreement of Brigadier Smith, we are giving copies only to you and Mr. Robertson. It shows, however, the line that General Foulkes may take if he is afraid that sending Canadian Army equipment to Europe may be the first step towards a smaller Canadian Army. The attached paper raises two arguments that are, I think, largely "red herrings":

(a) that the equipment we could make available is obsolescent and would not be wanted by our European partners unless we were prepared to follow it up with an offer of replacing it with better equipment later, and,

(b) that the whole subject is too complicated to consider without setting up elaborate governmental machinery to examine the implications of the proposals, and particularly the question of how we could replace the equipment from our own production or by other means.

7. As you will recall from their last meeting, the Chiefs of Staff Committee agreed that some sort of interdepartmental agency should be set up in order to correlate information and policy in respect to Canadian war production. So that you may have a better idea of what we expect the Chiefs may shortly be proposing to the Panel on Economic Defence, I am enclosing a copy of the memorandum† prepared by the Chiefs of Staff Secretariat on the establishment of a Joint War Production Board.

8. I think that the argument of (a) above is perfectionist because surely our European partners would rather have some equipment, and have it now, than, for example, a promise of better equipment in a year or two. The fact that our European partners know that we regard a six-pounder gun as pretty useless against the latest Soviet tanks does not mean that they would not welcome six-pounder guns and be able to use them effectively against lighter or older Soviet Army vehicles.

9. As regards (b), the lack of a proper organization to study questions of this kind in Ottawa is, I believe, valid, but I wonder whether we might not avoid political difficulties for the Government in having to decide on the establishment of a Joint War Production Organization by, at least for the purpose of the present study, simply setting up an ad hoc working group appointed by the Deputies represented on the Economic Defence Panel.

10. I am also enclosing for convenience of reference Mr. Gill's personal letter to you of May 19th and personal Telegram No. 1029 of May 26th,† as well as two telegrams from London, Nos. 898 and 899 of May 12th on which the discussion under this item is to be based.

IV. CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

24. The Chairman noted that the North Atlantic Council meeting had laid a good deal of stress upon the obligations of all members of the Treaty to make mutual aid contributions in all practicable forms. He then referred to the suggestion which we had received from Mr. Wilgress, that we should see whether it was possible to make certain items of Canadian military equipment available to our European partners.

25. Mr. Drury said that as far as the Air Force and Navy were concerned, their plans called for the use of all equipment at present available from the outset of a war, and that therefore any equipment they might make available would have to be replaced before mobilization. The Army, however, could spare some of their mobilization equipment if it were to be replaced shortly after mobilization.

26. General Foulkes thought that before we could deal either with the request received from London or with the request of The Netherlands' Government for army equipment, we should first have to know in detail what were the requirements of the North Atlantic area in the light of the recently accepted principle of building "balanced collective forces". As soon as we knew where our forces would fit into this broader plan, and what the forces of our partners were going to be, we should have a clearer idea of what we might be able to part with, as well as of what they needed to meet their deficiencies. However, he emphasized, he saw no way of making a mutual aid contribution without it costing us something, as we had no surpluses available. He thought that we might perhaps persuade the U.S. to help us to replace, with U.S.-type equipment, any of our stocks of U.K.-type equipment which we might be prepared to make available to our European partners. It seemed more logical for U.K.-type equipment to be used by the forces of The Netherlands and Belgium, who were already trained and equipped on this basis and would be fighting in the same sector as the British, and for Canada to go over to U.S.-type equipment, although he realized that we could not expect the U.S. to provide us with replacements for U.K.-type equipment on a one for one basis — we would have to buy or make at least part of what we needed to replace anything made available to Europe.

27. Mr. Wrong observed that the Americans could not make military equipment available to us without an amendment to the Mutual Defence Assistance Act.

28. Mr. Robertson thought that there were three aspects to this problem which should be considered at a high level and decisions reached for the North Atlantic area. There was first of all the long-term policy of standardization; secondly, the production and procurement policies which would have to be developed as a result of decisions on standardization (these were important in considering the question of replacement of any Canadian military equipment made available to Europe); thirdly, we would have to think through the concept of balanced collective forces and the broad application of our general objective of lessening the real cost of effective re-armament. It was in these terms that the subject had significance, rather than in terms of equity in sharing the defence burden. In other words, he said, strategic decisions for the North Atlantic area would have to be taken and married to supply and production policies.

29. Mr. Pierce thought that it was useful to think in terms of a timetable; that there were some questions which required long-term planning, but that our immediate objective was the strengthening of the defence forces in being of our European partners. We should therefore turn our attention, he suggested, to items of equipment that we could make available as soon as possible to supply known deficiencies of our European partners. He felt one of the items we should consider most carefully was army vehicles.

30. Mr. Robertson did not disagree with the immediate objective but felt that we should use this opportunity to put forward our views to the U.S. authorities, especially as U.S. cooperation was in fact the great contingency in our plans for the future.

31. Mr. MacKay felt that we could make a distinction between considering what might be done about sending certain items of army equipment to Europe shortly, and the broader question of the role of Canadian war production in replacing those items of equipment and possibly supplying some of the requirements of our partners as well.

32. General Foulkes thought that he should correct any misapprehensions which might exist as to the reserves for the Canadian armed forces. While certain items might perhaps be replaced within the first six months of hostilities, we were committed in our joint planning with the U.S. to provide two fully equipped divisions within a year of the outbreak of war. We had a number of vehicles and 25-pounder guns, but even in these categories our stocks were limited.

33. Mr. Drury and General Foulkes then raised the question of what military equipment we should be planning to raise in Canada in the event of an emergency, not only for our own armed forces, but also for our allies. Apart from the obvious desirability of getting early agreement to standardize on such items of equipment as the 88 wireless set that we have developed, General Foulkes thought that a good case could be made for setting up plant capacity in Canada to make jeeps. We had had a lot of experience during the last war in the manufacture of vehicles, and there was every indication that still more vehicles would be needed another time. An effort was being made to develop standard types and fewer of them, and as far as he could see, the jeep was one of the types that we could make most efficiently in Canada.

34. Mr. Robertson also raised the question of whether we might not be able to make an effective mutual aid contribution by means of stockpiling in the United Kingdom such commodities as wheat, and, possibly, base metals. He saw possibilities of using an offer to stockpile wheat in the United Kingdom as a means of persuading the U.K. Government to reduce their planned wheat acreage. If they could be assured of a greater stock of wheat in storage in the United Kingdom, they would not need to grow so much and, as General Foulkes also pointed out, anything that we were able to store in the United Kingdom against emergency use would not only utilize shipping space while it was available and cheap, but would cut down shipping requirements which would be extremely heavy in wartime.

35. In this connection, Mr. Robertson wondered whether we could not get such countries as Norway to make part of their mutual aid contribution by transporting across the Atlantic anything we could make available under mutual aid to our partners.

36. Mr. Wrong observed that we had, so far as he was aware, avoided much serious criticism because of our record during and since the war on economic assistance to other countries. However, it was becoming increasingly difficult to explain our present inaction, especially when our public statements on financial and trade matters were so optimistic in tone, and he felt it would not be long before we would find that our partners, and particularly the United States, would be asking us why we had "dropped out". He therefore thought it important, for political reasons, that we should show our hand soon, and say what we intended to do to help our North Atlantic partners in one way or another.

37. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that we should take every opportunity of exploring informally at an early date the views of the U.S. authorities on the range of questions which the Panel had been considering, bearing on "balanced collective forces", standardization, production and procurement policies, and the question of replacements for any items of Canadian military equipment that might be made available to our partners; in particular, an enquiry should be made as to what the U.S. Government were thinking of doing in response to the Netherlands' request for equipment for their forces returning from Indonesia; but,

(b) that it was desirable that any mutual aid contribution the Canadian Government might make should be tabled in the North Atlantic Organization (as the Belgian Government have done with their gift of U.S. military equipment) to be divided in accordance with the principle of "balanced collective forces", and that we should not make bilateral deals with the Netherlands or any other country.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, June 14, 1950

Dear Evan [Gill]:

We had a meeting last week of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions in order to consider the proposal which Mr. Wilgress and you had advanced for reviewing Canadian holdings of army equipment with a view to determining whether we might be able to make certain items available to our European partners in the North Atlantic Treaty. I am enclosing copies of the Minutes and of the preliminary papers prepared for the Panel meeting — a memorandum dated June 2nd† for members of the Panel and a memorandum dated June 3rd for Mr. Heeney. I am also enclosing a copy of an earlier brief on standardization prepared for Mr. Heeney for the meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on May 31st.†

Unfortunately, Mr. Heeney was not able to attend the second session of the Panel meeting when we discussed Canadian mutual aid. As you probably know, his father has had a stroke and he had to be with him that morning.

As you will understand from reading these documents, a good deal more has been discussed than has been put on paper. Briefly, from the discussions on the official level with the Department of National Defence, the prospect of any immediate gift or contribution of equipment does not seem very good and I think the chief difficulty is the fear on the part of the Army that any equipment given from their present war reserves might be difficult to replace and might even lead towards a decision to reduce the size of the army we are committed to raise in the event of war.

As you will see from the Minutes, there is to be no further study of Canadian Army equipment reserves until we hear from our people in Washington what are the views of the U.S. authorities on the range of related subjects mentioned in Section A of the Panel's conclusions. For your own information, General Foulkes maintained at the meeting of the Panel that we had less than a thousand vehicles of standard army types in stock, of which a little over one-third were three-ton lorries. These figures were not included in the Minutes in the hope that National Defence may later find it easier to revise their arithmetic.

However, as you know, Mr. Pearson has indicated his willingness to consider some specific proposal for Canadian mutual aid and I think he will have been encouraged by the debate in the House last week on his report on the Council meetings (Hansard for June 5th) and on the defence debate later in the week (Hansard for June 8th and 9th). As I read the debate, the House now realizes that there must be a "price tag" on our membership in the North Atlantic Treaty and is anxious to know what it is — in terms of mutual aid, and in terms of the application to Canadian armed forces of the principle of "balanced collective forces".

Your memorandum on "Offer of Military Equipment from War Reserves"† was received too late for consideration by the Panel at its June 6th meeting, but has been circulated and will be discussed at the next meeting. I think your emphasis on the need for an offer of not less than divisional scale of equipment that is modern and serviceable is a good corrective to what has perhaps been our tendency in the Department to press the more modest proposal for sending overseas now equipment that we would not be prepared to use for a Canadian overseas force in four or five years' time. Those items of equipment would, of course, be the easiest to pry loose from army reserves, and for that reason we have concentrated our arguments on that limited objective. I think that we should now change our tune somewhat, for, as you point out, the North Atlantic countries would no longer be so grateful for border-line items as they would have been a few months ago. I think we have probably missed the boat on those categories of equipment, especially since the general acceptance in London last month of the idea that the defence of the west should be based on quality weapons as we cannot match Russian quantity of manpower.

We shall be sending you a telegram tomorrow in answer to the immediate points raised in your Telegram No. 1108† about the Copenhagen meeting of the M.P.S.B. and we are prodding people for the rest of the material you will require from Ottawa before the Board meets.

I am sending a copy of this letter to George Ignatieff for his personal information, together with copies of the enclosures.

Yours sincerely,
R.A. MacKay

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, June 15, 1950

Dear Evan [Gill]:

I wrote to you yesterday about the last meeting of the Economic Defence Panel and the difficulties which we were running into in considering a mutual aid contribution to our North Atlantic partners.

I might add that one of the unofficial results of the last Panel meeting is that an ad hoc working group is to be formed of Mr. Drury, Mr. Pierce and General Foulkes to look into the matter of Canadian mutual aid. I think Mr. Robertson's idea in suggesting it was that if Mr. Drury and Mr. Pierce could persuade the

C.G.S. to be a little more enthusiastic about the idea, the technical study could then be turned over to officers at the working level.

For your encouragement, I am sending a copy of a speech which the Prime Minister made at the National Defence College a couple of weeks ago.† I am sending it to you personally as the speech has had a very restricted circulation here.

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MacKay

MEETING OF THE DEPUTIES OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

1. In view of the developing international situation the State Department would like to propose that the Deputies of the North Atlantic Council should meet in London sooner than had been previously anticipated (see my message WA-1401 of June 26th).† They suggest that the meeting should take place in London on 18th July.

2. The State Department would envisage this meeting being of the permanent Deputies themselves, at which Spofford would attend.

3. While the 18th is now proposed, it is possible that, should the international situation take a turn for the worse, an earlier date might have to be fixed.[39]

4. The State Department have no definite proposals for an agenda but the idea is that the Deputies would concern themselves with matters of substance as quickly as possible and not confine their attention to organizational questions as previously contemplated for the initial meeting of the "provisional" Deputies.

[39] Cette réunion a par la suite été convoquée pour le 25 juillet 1950.
The meeting was eventually scheduled for July 25, 1950.

NORTH ATLANTIC MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD MEETING, COPENHAGEN

1. With MPSB 77 of June 30th† we sent you the agenda and supporting documents for the Supply Board meetings on July 12th-13th. Previously with MPSB 72 to 74 inclusive of June 19th† we sent you advance copies of the papers on Standardization, Industrial Mobilization and Critical and Strategic Materials with some comments thereon.

2. We have now reviewed with Pierce the reports that are to be put before the Board at their forthcoming meeting, and we feel there is a need for guidance on how far our representative can go in advocating a more empirical approach to the problem of equipping North Atlantic forces. In general, the reports show that very little real progress has been made in carrying out the main tasks that have been assigned to the Board, such as recommending ways and means of integrating production and of meeting deficiencies. The obstacles in the way of greater progress have been enumerated in the document "Analysis of PWS Activities and Recommendations MPSB(50)23)".† In the main, the lack of significant results is attributed to lack of a firm statement from the military authorities as to their requirements (qualitative and quantitative) under the medium-term plan, and of estimates from the D.F.E.C. as to the funds that are expected to be available for defence purposes. The tasks, it is claimed, are essentially long-term ones and military and financial guidance are needed to form the basis of sound planning. The short-term projects which have been undertaken while waiting for more military and financial information, such as the review of current production programmes to achieve some measure of integration, and the matching of surplus production capacity in European signatory countries against known deficiencies have not been successful because in the first case insufficient data about the production programmes was tabled and plans were too far advanced to permit any major adjustments. In the latter case, a number of reasons are given for the lack of more tangible results. Primarily, the difficulty lay in the fact that the P.W.S. were working with "net" deficiencies (i.e. after planned production programmes had been taken into account) and no funds were available to utilize the surplus capacity which was shown to exist.

3. With regard to other activities of P.W.S. some progress is reported in the transfer of surpluses, and a start has been made in standardization and spare parts production planning as well as in the new fields of industrial mobilization and critical and strategic materials.

4. We appreciate the difficulties under which the Board has operated. It is in its first year and it has been preoccupied with organizational and procedural matters. The medium-term plan is recognized to be only a first approximation of the forces required and the introduction of the concept of balanced forces will involve a revision of early estimates. We acknowledge that there are indeed a number of valid reasons why the Board could not do more to accomplish the very complicated and comprehensive tasks which its terms of reference assigned to it.

5. In taking stock of the present position, we feel that the Board has been overly concerned with general objectives not too well defined, and has taken too general an approach towards their attainment. For example, a considerable effort has been expended to date in trying to integrate production without placing it in its true perspective. In our opinion, the efforts of the Board should be directed primarily to finding ways and means of furnishing the armed forces of European signatory countries with weapons and supplies. The other tasks of the Board are important but are subordinate to this main objective and should be pursued in the light of it. It seems to us that from the Board's point of view the time to study integration of production is when it has been ascertained that the equipment needed cannot otherwise be supplied and where integration gives promise of greater and more efficient production.

6. In the case of standardization the military are vitally concerned from an operational standpoint, and the Board from a production standpoint. Standardization, which contributes neither to operational efficiency nor to production should not concern us now. In other words, we should take care not to regard integrated production and standardization as isolated objectives or as ends in themselves, but primarily as means of fulfilling the Board's main objective.

7. If this concept is accepted, it seems to us that the Board might make a more concentrated and purposeful effort towards meeting the most critical of the large and varied deficiencies that are known to exist while it is waiting for qualitative and quantitative statements of military requirements under the medium-term plan. U.S. aid is designed to assist in overcoming shorter-term deficiencies. Our proposal that the Canadian Government review its stocks of military equipment to see if some items could be offered, was also designed with the same immediate end in view. While individual countries should continue to consider on their own initiative what they can do now to give effect to the mutual aid principle in Article 3, the Board for its part should seek to supplement such contributions by directing to member countries specific enquiries for specific items of equipment accompanied by a statement of need. In other words, it is our opinion that the Board while continuing to press the military for a comprehensive statement of their total requirements supported by a statement of priorities, should direct a good deal of its energies towards meeting immediate and urgent deficiencies of which it is aware and future deficiencies as they become known. With the information now at hand and with what could be obtained later we think the Board should establish a "task force" for each of the main categories of equipment in critically short supply. It would be the duty of the task forces to canvass all available sources. In practice they would start with the easiest (i.e. existing stocks, both surplus and reserve, and M.D.A.A. availabilities) and proceed thence to investigate production possibilities. This will turn up a number of problems, both technical and financial. It may reveal the necessity for integrating production or the necessity from the production point of view of standardization. Thus, as we move towards the main objective we would do much to fulfil the subsidiary functions assigned to the Board. The financial problems which would emerge could, under this procedure, be expressed in specific terms and would be referred to the D.F.E.C.

8. It is our feeling that we will make more headway by this method even in the solution of financial problems than if we rely entirely on forecasts of finances that will be available for defence purposes. A recent example of how a job gets done when a clear need is made manifest is in the case of the infrastructure programme. As you know, the Western Union countries a few months ago said that no funds could be spared for this project, but when the clear need was put to them they found some £33 million and no one is quite sure where the money came from. Either there was leeway in national estimates, or the infrastructure was given a higher priority than some planned national projects.

9. Unless you feel differently we are disposed to promote this line of thought in our informal discussions with Board members and possibly with the Board itself.

TELEGRAM 1315 London, July 6, 1950

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your telegram No. 933 of July 4th.† North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board meeting.

1. We have only a few additional comments to make on specific questions which are likely to be discussed by the Board.

2. The programme of work which the PWS proposes for itself in the standardization field is, as you have concluded, the empirical approach. This is indeed the proposed pattern in several fields of endeavour such as integration of production and provision of spare parts. In the former the United Kingdom are putting forward specific proposals of this kind which are likely to be discussed under Item II of the agenda. Where our proposals as set forth in telegram No. 1299 differ from others is that we suggest that the problems of integration of production and standardization should be examined as part of the main task of overcoming deficiencies of Western European signatory countries and that they be related thereto, whereas the PWS proposals envisage parallel efforts in each of these respective fields. There would seem to be little doubt that the Board will adopt the specific approach to their problems in one form or the other. If they were to decide to set up the "deficiency task forces" for the purpose described in telegram No. 1299 it would not necessarily mean that integration of production and standardization studies would be suspended. Problems turned up by the "deficiency task forces" in these areas would be referred to the appropriate Working Group for examination. In the meantime they could work away at limited objectives.

3. With regard to standardization, we consider that the interchangeability of fuel, ammunition and high mortality parts of automotive equipment is a promising field leading towards "operational standardization" and we would like to see this examined initially. If you decide that we should go along with this idea it would be useful to have some suggestions from the army as to which items they consider fall into the category of high mortality parts, or which should be standardized for operational purposes. In addition to fuel and ammunition, tires, spark plugs, distributor points, valves, batteries and engine steel have been mentioned. We would caution you against drawing up too large a list, otherwise the effort will be dispersed. In our view it is better to concentrate on a few promising items as a start and then move on to another group. It really boils down to a question of priorities.

4. The maintenance of equipment and the provision of spare parts is as we have said above, another problem with regard to which it is proposed to adopt the specific approach. In the light of the large volume of United States equipment that is being supplied to European signatory countries this is a serious problem and it is one that has integration possibilities. It is proposed to tackle this problem piecemeal and the effort will be concentrated in the first instance on the following categories of army equipment: vehicles, electronics, small arms artillery. This project is now confined to the Western European signatory countries and we have considered whether it would be useful for us to participate in it as we have been invited informally to do. On balance it would seem that our participation would serve no useful purpose. On the one hand we are not making much in the way of United States spares which could be supplied to European signatory countries. If on the other hand we wish at some future time to procure United States spares from European sources we can do so without necessarily participating in the project. We would welcome your comments on this point.

5. You will appreciate of course that if the PWS are instructed to proceed with their work along specific rather than general lines there will be a demand on individual countries for technical persons or specialists in the fields which are tackled, e.g. vehicles, electronics, etc.

Note de la Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Defence Liaison Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, July 6, 1950

RE ITEM 4 ON THE AGENDA FOR ECONOMIC DEFENCE PANEL JULY 7, 1950
PROPOSAL FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A WORKING GROUP TO STUDY BROAD ASPECTS OF MUTUAL AID PROBLEMS

The memorandum that has been circulated to members of the Panel as Panel Document ED 16† was prepared in the Department and proposes that the time has come when the Panel should give more detailed study to the problems raised by the possibility of the Canadian Government making a contribution to the mutual aid of our European partners. Mr. Ignatieff has complained, in a personal letter† to me, also attached, that the discussion of this question at the last Panel meeting was too vague and he would like more specific proposals developed to lay before the U.S. authorities, who, he says, are sympathetic towards the idea of helping the Canadian Government with the U.S. dollar problems which would be raised by our making a contribution of military equipment, at least part of which would have to be replaced by purchase from the United States. We have discussed this proposal with Mr. Robertson, Mr. Drury, Mr. Chappell and Mr. Wright and I think the Panel will probably agree to establishing a Working Group. The question then becomes one of how much priority the various departments concerned will be prepared to give to the Working Group's study. As Mr. Ignatieff says in his personal letter to me, the meeting of the Joint Industrial Mobilization Planning Board in Ottawa on August 8th will give us a good opportunity to discuss these matters informally with the U.S. members, and we should be ready to take full advantage of this opportunity with as much factual information as possible on what we could contribute and what form of help we would like from the United States.[40]

2. It should perhaps be emphasized that our proposal to set up a Panel Working Group is not intended in any way to supplant the National Defence study of what items of military equipment might be made available immediately, as suggested by Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Gill. I am afraid the tendency will be for National Defence to postpone a decision until they see what prospects there are of getting replacements for any items of military equipment they might make available, with or without the assistance of the United States. It would certainly be much easier for our representatives in Washington to negotiate satisfactory arrangements with the U.S. authorities if the Canadian Government had already decided in broad terms that it would be prepared to make a respectable contribution to mutual aid if we had some help from the United States in meeting the U.S. dollar problem involved in replacing our equipment.

Mr. W.R. Wright (Privy Council Office)
Mr. James George (Department of External Affairs).

I. POSSIBLE CONTRIBUTION OF CANADIAN MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY COUNTRIES

1. The Chairman inquired whether any further progress had been made concerning possible Canadian contribution of military equipment to North Atlantic Treaty countries since the last meeting of the Panel.

2. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee reported that the Army could make available immediately for use by N.A.T.O. countries approximately $1 million worth of explosives and shells of U.S. design.

With regard to further contributions, it was suggested that, if an offer of equipment of U.K. design were to be premised on replacement by the U.S. of a proportion of the amount donated, then we should approach the latter with a proposal in fairly specific terms. For instance, it might be possible to offer N.A.T.O. 200 25-pounder guns, which it was understood were urgently required by the Dutch, if the U.S. would supply us with 100 105mms.

If the U.S. were planning on providing additional equipment to countries already using that of U.K. design, the only place that such equipment could be obtained was from Canada or the U.K.

3. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs inquired if there was any equipment, in addition to 25-pounders, which might be made available.

4. General Foulkes said that there were other items which could possibly be contributed in certain circumstances.

The deficiency lists which had been circulated by the Military Production and Supply Board were based on operational requirements, and were subject to review.

He understood that the Dutch lacked even training equipment for their troops returning from Indonesia.

If we could ascertain from the U.S. what the urgent Dutch requirements were, we might be in a position to offer to supply a specific part of them, if the U.S. were willing to give us a proportion of U.S. equipment in return. The offer should be put in positive terms asking if Canada were willing to make a definite commitment, how much would the U.S. do to assist us in the way of replacing the equipment involved.

5. The Chairman asked whether the terms of the M.D.A.A. would authorize such a deal.

6. The Deputy Minister of National Defence said that he thought the M.D.A.A. would permit this kind of arrangement. Further, the terms of the new National Defence Act authorized his department to retain any monies acquired from this kind of negotiation for expenditure on defence purposes.

It was suggested that the extent of the offer Canada was able to make to the Dutch would have a direct bearing on the willingness of the U.S. to help us replace part of the equipment thus made available. Unless it were able to have a fairly substantial effect in keeping the Dutch on U.K. equipment, the U.S. might not be interested.

7. Mr. Chappell suggested that, if any arrangement were negotiated on a reciprocal basis, the U.S. might consider that the value of the equipment should be deducted from the $15-$25 million figure established for the reciprocal procurement account for next year.[41] We should try to ensure that a deal of this sort must be considered outside the present limits of the reciprocal purchases account.

8. Mr. Heeney suggested that any contribution that Canada decided to offer might be tabled with the Standing Group with a request that it be used in a specific way.

9. Mr. Drury suggested alternatively that such contributions might be negotiated bilaterally and then tabled with N.A.T.O.

10. During the course of the ensuing discussion, a number of arrangements, such as barter or outright purchase, were suggested for negotiating the kind of arrangement put forward by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

11. Mr. Heeney said that the recent international developments gave a much greater sense of urgency to the problem. The U.S. had already indicated that, because of their activities in the Far East, a slowing up of the M.D.A.A. might be expected by the European countries.

It was suggested that this sort of question was one that might be discussed by the ad hoc working group proposed under Item 4 of the agenda for the study of broad term aspects of mutual aid.

12. The Chairman suggested that, if such a committee were formed, it might be preferable for it to give consideration to specific proposals rather than to study general principles. While the Panel had agreed at the previous meeting that consideration should not be given to individual requests for assistance, and that bilateral deals should not be undertaken, it appeared that more immediate progress might be made by such methods than by proceeding on a more general basis. The gaps were so great that anything that tended to fill them would be of assistance. In addition, the quantities of equipment that Canada was likely to be able to make available would not be sufficient to interfere with the concept of balanced forces. We might base our approach on the sort of arrangements that the U.S. and the U.K. had been making with European countries over the past year. We should think in terms of the kind of participation that we could practically and usefully make rather than in terms of a contribution donated on a comparative basis.

13. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Canadian representative on the Military Production and Supply Board be informed that the Canadian Government were considering making available to N.A.T.O. approximately $1 million worth of U.S.-type ammunition;

(b) that the question of a further contribution of training equipment for use by the Dutch Army be considered by the ad hoc working group to be established for the study of mutual aid problems, bearing in mind the desirability of making a specific offer;

(c) that the Canadian Military Attaché at The Hague be asked to determine from the Dutch authorities their urgent requirements for training purposes;

(d) that our representatives in London and Washington be informed that the question of meeting some of the Dutch deficiencies in training equipment was being explored;

(e) that, on the basis of the Panel Working Group's study of the report from our Military Attaché in The Hague on Dutch deficiencies, a recommendation be made to Cabinet Defence Committee that the U.S. authorities should be informed that consideration was being given by the Canadian Government to a specific proposal for meeting certain of the Dutch deficiencies (i) if they regarded the proposal as useful and (ii) if they would consider assisting Canada in replacing with U.S. equipment part of the equipment made available to the Dutch.

II. MEETING OF MILITARY PRODUCTION AND SUPPLY BOARD IN COPENHAGEN

14. The Chairman drew attention to the telegrams† from the Canadian High Commissioner in London, which had been circulated, recommending that Mr. Pierce as Canadian representative at the Copenhagen meeting of the Military Production and Supply Board on July 12th should press for a more empirical approach to the problems of integration, standardization, and so on, as the Board had been making very little progress towards reaching agreement on broad principles or their application over the whole field of military production and supply.

15. Mr. Heeney said that he felt the M.P.S.B. had been giving too much attention to studying overall problems and not enough to the attainment of specific results.

16. The Chairman thought that the approach recommended would probably also be more acceptable to the Canadian Government on political grounds, while Mr. Deutsch agreed and said that it was the only way he could see in which the M.P.S.B. and D.F.E.C. could break the circle of theoretical studies and get down to practical business.

17. The Chairman added that he thought the suggestion that spares for U.S. equipment should be made in Europe was in accordance with the arguments we have for some time been putting to the U.S. authorities in favour of reciprocal purchases; the idea of specialized task forces was successfully applied in Canada during the last war by Mr. Howe, through industrial advisory committees.

18. The Panel agreed that the empirical approach seemed to be the best way to achieve positive, if more limited results, and asked the Department of External Affairs to advise Mr. Pierce accordingly.

III. STANDBY ARRANGEMENTS FOR PRODUCING U.K.-TYPE MILITARY AIRCRAFT IN CANADA

19. The Chairman reported that Air Vice Marshal Sir Ralph Cochrane, Deputy Chief of the U.K. Air Staff, had had conversations recently with Canadian officials on the question of standby production of military aircraft in Canada. The U.S. had shown some interest in adopting the Canberra as a tactical bomber and were sending senior officers to the U.K. to look into the matter. Canada was sending Air Vice Marshal Miller for the same purpose. If the U.S. would adopt the Canberra as a tactical bomber the question of the creation of stand-by capacity in Canada would be much simpler. Before they would accept the Canberra, the U.S. would probably require productive capacity outside the U.K. in either Canada or the U.S., or both.

20. General Foulkes suggested that the U.S. were unlikely to adopt an aircraft manufactured to U.K. production standards. If they decided on the Canberra, they were more likely to redesign it to their own standards. It might be more valuable for Canada to consider increasing the production of fighter aircraft rather than go into another type.

21. Mr. Drury said that Canadair was capable of producing the F86 at a much faster rate than the present one and that such a step-up would result in a lower unit cost. However, any change in plans should recognize the desirability of keeping plants such as Canadair in continuous operation.

22. General Foulkes said that the Orenda engine would be suitable for the Canberra and consequently, if the U.S. decided to adopt it, Canada might develop a wider market for the Orenda.

23. The Chairman suggested that, if it were decided to put the Canberra in production, it might be desirable to complete the F86 contract as soon as possible. He thought that there were a number of questions, such as the possibility of accelerating F86 production, the effect of this on unit cost, the possibility of gearing such an acceleration into a shift from F86 to the Canberra, the possibility of increased production of the CF-100, which might be studied for ultimate consideration by Cabinet Defence Committee.

24. The Panel, after further discussion, noted the report of the Chairman on recent developments in U.K. proposals for standby arrangements for production of military aircraft in Canada, and requested the ad hoc working group on mutual aid problems to consider the question of how Canada, as a member of N.A.T.O., could make the most effective use of her resources for the manufacture of military aircraft.

IV. PROPOSAL FOR THE FORMATION OF A MUTUAL AID WORKING GROUP

25. The Chairman drew attention to the proposal of the Department of External Affairs (circulated as Panel Document ED-16†) that an ad hoc working group should be established to study the alternative ways in which the Canadian Government might usefully make a contribution of mutual aid to our European partners of the North Atlantic Treaty, while at the same time bearing in mind what form or forms would best serve our own interests from the point of view of our own national economy and defence.

26. Mr. Drury said that he thought it would be desirable to have a working group set up, but that its terms of reference should not at first be too broad. Mr. Deutsch agreed, saying that he thought the working group should examine what forms of mutual aid seemed to make sense intrinsically in meeting the real needs of our partners, and the problem should not be approached from the point of view of what sort of contribution would look best.

27. Mr. Coyne pointed out that there were practical difficulties in the way of making a comprehensive study. He cited as an example the lack of information in Canada on wheat storage capacity in the U.K., which was relevant to any consideration of making a contribution in the form of strategic stockpiling.

28. Mr. Chappell agreed that a working group was probably needed, although he thought that his department would find it difficult, especially during the next month, to make available the personnel who could make the best contribution to the subject. He also suggested that Mr. Pierce would be in a good position, on his return from the Copenhagen meeting of the M.P.S.B., to say what field of study would be most appropriate and useful.

29. The Chairman said that he thought the working group should be established without delay as it might be helpful to have prepared before the August 8th meeting of the Joint Canada-U.S. Industrial Mobilization Planning Committee a factual study on the basis of which Mr. Pierce might be able to raise with Mr. Howard some of the proposals that have been tentatively discussed at this meeting of the Panel. He thought that in any case it was desirable to place the problem of continental industrial mobilization in its North Atlantic setting.

30. Mr. Chappell said that it was not anticipated that the question of North Atlantic requirements would be raised at the J.I.M.P.C. meeting in August; what the U.S. side wanted first was a joint study of North American requirements and it seemed likely that there would be more than enough purely continental problems to keep the Committee busy.

31. General Foulkes pointed out that, as we made 70% of our last war production for our allies, we could not afford to ignore Western European requirements, and the sooner we reached agreement with the U.S. on getting on to U.S.-type equipment, the better.

32. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that an ad hoc Mutual Aid Working Group should be set up to report back to the Panel on ways and means by which Canada could most effectively participate as a partner in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

(b) that the Working Group should examine first the specific proposals raised at this meeting of the Panel during the discussion of Items 1 and 3 of the Panel's agenda; and,

(c) that priority should be given to the Working Group's study in view of the international situation.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 10, 1950

Dear Sir Alexander [Clutterbuck],

You will recall that in March of this year Canada invited its European partners in the North Atlantic Treaty to train a number of their officers here. It was hoped that arrangements of this sort might alleviate to some extent the shortage of well-trained personnel among European countries, and at the same time might foster co-operation and integration of effort among the North Atlantic nations. The response has already exceeded our expectations, and it is hoped to start the training early in the autumn.

As a corollary to this training in Canada, the Canadian authorities have been considering the possibility of rotating fighter squadrons in the United Kingdom, beginning next spring, to obtain training in more advanced operational techniques in close co-operation with similar R.A.F. units under operating conditions. Both Mr. Claxton and the Chief of the Air Staff have informally discussed this possibility with members of your Government and with the R.A.F., on a number of occasions. I understand that the proposal, in principle, was considered very desirable. It is believed that the experience gained from such an undertaking would be to our mutual advantage in an emergency.

The Canadian authorities have been thinking in terms of an R.C.A.F. fighter squadron operating as a lodger unit on an R.A.F. fighter base. This squadron would comprise only the requisite number of fully qualified air crew and ground crew necessary to service the aircraft, in all about 150 men. The squadron would remain in the United Kingdom for one year or less, when another squadron would replace it. It would be hoped during the first year that R.A.F. Vampires might be used until Canadian aircraft are available.

Agreement would have to be reached on compensation for facilities and services which the R.A.F. would provide. When making proposals to NATO governments for officer training in Canada, it was pointed out that arrangements requiring transfers of funds might add to the difficulties of achieving practical co-operation. If the United Kingdom authorities are interested in training air navigators in Canada mutually satisfactory financial arrangements which would avoid transfers of funds in either direction might be possible.

This proposal has already been discussed without commitments at the Service level where it is believed that satisfactory arrangements could be made. We should welcome the views of your Government in order that, if the proposal is approved in principle, the necessary plans may be developed.

Air Vice Marshal Miller, Air Member for Operations and Training for the R.C.A.F. is at present in the United Kingdom on other matters, and he will be there until the end of this week. He is familiar with this proposal and can be made available for discussion with the United Kingdom authorities. If your Government agrees to discussion, I hope that it will be possible to make arrangements for talks with Air Vice Marshall Miller within the next few days.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, July 12, 1950

Dear George [Ignatieff]:

I am sending you separately, under form despatch, the Minutes of the last meeting of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions held on July 7th. With this letter, I am also sending you the supporting papers prepared for the Under-Secretary.

You will already have received copies of our telegrams No. 46† and No. 47† to Copenhagen for Syd Pierce. From our telegram No. 47, repeated to you as EX-1094 of July 10th, you will have seen that we are trying to develop a more specific proposal to put to the U.S. authorities as you suggested in your letter to me of July 4th† — which, incidentally, I took the liberty of circulating to members of the Panel.

I am also sending you copies of the draft terms of reference for the Mutual Aid Working Group which the Panel has set up. The terms of reference were prepared chiefly in order to focus our own thinking on what we wanted the Working Group to do and we did not, therefore, press them on the Panel, although copies were circulated at the meeting. The Panel seemed to prefer to develop studies on specific proposals rather than to debate terms of reference that were intended to cover the waterfront. However, I do not think there will be any opposition to tackling any specific proposals we wish to develop within the framework of these draft terms of reference.

Incidentally, I might say that before we proposed to set up the Working Group, we consulted Mr. Pearson, who thought it would be useful.

As regards the Panel meeting itself, I think you will find the development of General Foulkes' attitude most encouraging. A few weeks ago he was unable to find any equipment that he thought could be made available to Western Europe. Now, although he is not proposing any very large contribution of military equipment, he has come forward specifically with two proposals, one to table with the MPSB or the Standing Group $1 million worth of miscellaneous U.S. ammunition, and the second to give the Dutch 200 British-type guns if we are able to negotiate with the United States for some assistance in replacement with U.S.-type artillery. On being pressed, he said the Dutch guns proposal might be applicable to other items.

We have just heard from The Hague that Colonel Doucet[42] is going to be away until the 23rd of July and this may delay our analysis of items of equipment that could be made available to meet Dutch deficiencies. However, I hope we can proceed, in the meantime, on the basis of the MPSB deficiency lists.

Until we have a specific proposal, we shall not ask you to discuss this matter further with the U.S. authorities. When we do know more exactly what we could do for the Dutch, the amount of our possible contribution will be of considerable importance as, from the U.S. point of view, it might not be worthwhile prolonging the supply difficulties of keeping the Dutch forces on U.K.-type equipment unless Canada could go quite a long way towards meeting their immediate deficiencies, at least in training equipment, if not in operational equipment such as anti-aircraft guns and tanks, in which we are short ourselves. If we can make enough U.K.-type equipment available to the Dutch to make it worthwhile keeping them on U.K.-type equipment, it, of course, avoids the disruption of having to retrain their Army to use U.S.-type equipment. In fact, I understand that much of the Army equipment they are now using was sold or given to them by the Canadian Army at the end of the war.

I should like to draw your attention especially to the extract from Mr. Woodward's memorandum of June 29th, which we circulated with Panel Document ED. 16.† Reading between the lines, it looks as if Mr. Woodward was trying to tell us not only that U.S. commitments in the Far East would slow down their M.D.A.A. deliveries to Europe, but that, as a result, they were anxious to have Canada make a mutual aid contribution of military equipment to Europe and might be able to make off-shore purchases in Canada under the amended M.D.A.A. We should be grateful for anything you may pick up which might throw light on this possibility.

We are looking forward to seeing Rod Macdonald at the Working Group's first meeting this afternoon. The Panel fully appreciated his point about not confusing the $15 million to $25 million reciprocal purchases account with any extraneous deals such as that of exchanging 25-pdrs. for 105mms.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Evan Gill with a further explanatory note† of which I am sending a copy to you.

I am also sending you a copy of Evan Gill's personal letter to me of July 8th.†

Following from Pierce, Begins: North Atlantic Military Production and Supply Board meeting. Reference to telegram No. 1299 from High Commission for Canada in the United Kingdom and your telegram of July 8th in reply.†

2. The Canadian proposal as outlined in our telegram No. 1299 of July 3rd from London was unanimously adopted yesterday for redirection of activities of MPSB to give first priority to function of recommending ways and means of furnishing armed forces of signatory countries with weapons and supplies; and to regard other functions, though important, as subordinate to the main objective and to be pursued in the light of it.

3. The Board unanimously accepted specific Canadian proposals to establish successive end items of war material for main category in which there are deficiencies. The work is to begin at once on the basis of known deficiencies and be expanded as further deficiencies become known.

4. The work of the Board is now being reexamined in the light of these decisions. Some of the general studies will be suspended and strong emphasis placed throughout on empirical approach of alternative activities of the Board.

5. Before we presented the proposals to the Board we had discussed it with the United Kingdom and United States and obtained their support.

6. The full text of our presentation will be forwarded from London with a report of the meeting.† Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL London, July 18, 1950

Dear Bert [MacKay],

I was very interested to receive your personal letter of July 12th† which gave me a good idea of how the study of a possible mutual aid contribution is being undertaken at Ottawa. I was also interested to read in George Ignatieff's report that he had a reasonably good first reaction in his approach to the U.S. authorities for some assistance in our replacement programme.

In your letter you asked for my advice on two points — the first one being on the best way of offering a million dollars worth of U.S. ammunition. I do not think that this presents any great difficulty if we offer it as material which is surplus to our requirements. As you know, all countries are asked to offer surpluses as they become available, as a matter of routine, before disposing of them elsewhere. Since the inception of the MPSB some fifteen offers have been made. Some of these have been quite large, such as the Belgian offer of OMA stocks, and others have been small and unimportant, as for example the Danish offer of out-of-date small arms. These offers are not always made free of charge as a mutual aid contribution, and where there is a price tag attached, they have not usually been taken up. Discussion on this subject at the recent meeting of the MPSB has been reported in our telegram No. 1370 of July 17th.† From this you will see that the Board representatives were asked to make future offers of surpluses available on the best financial terms possible. Presumably we would be willing to offer the ammunition without charge in the same way that the Belgians did for OMA stocks. The fact that it is a small or partial offer need not embarrass us unduly.

In suggesting in one of my earlier memoranda† that we should make a substantial offer of up-to-date and serviceable equipment I had in mind the fulfilment of our obligation under Article 3 of the Treaty. I did not, therefore, intend those remarks to apply to offers of surpluses. If we treated the ammunition as an offer of surplus material, whether or not it falls within that category, the scale of the offer is less important.

If there is any uncertainty about our obligation to offer surpluses to North Atlantic countries before they are disposed of elsewhere, you might wish to consider whether the Services should be given explicit instructions on this point.

While on this subject of surpluses, I think we can now assume that no country is interested in the 160 Anson aircraft that we offered last March. You may wish to so advise the RCAF in order that they can dispose of them elsewhere.

The second point — that of earmarking the contribution which we make from reserve stocks for the Dutch — is a little more difficult. I think that it would be unwise to give this the complexion of a bilateral deal. Such an arrangement would, it seems to me, establish a precedent for specific requests from individual countries and I doubt whether we should encourage this. Not all the European signatory countries are interested in U.K. type equipment. The Netherlands, Belgium and Italy each have some, but I think that proportionately the Netherlands has more than the others. A composite offer of divisional equipment might well be allocated in toto to the Netherlands both on the basis of their need and on the basis of the equipment now in use. I think, therefore, that if an offer of this kind is made it should be made without any strings, and that you should perhaps leave it to me to bring what influence I can to bear on the Chairman and members of the PWS to allocate it to the Netherlands. I would expect that there would be a good prospect of them doing this.

In this connection, if our offer should fall short of a division's requirements I wonder if it would be worthwhile informing the U.K. in advance so that they could decide whether it would be possible for them to make up the difference. I only put this as a suggestion, but it might be something we should consider because I would see better prospects of a full divisional scale equipment being allocated to the Netherlands than a partial offer where there would be less incentive to keep it intact.

Yours sincerely,
EVAN [GILL]

Repeat Washington EX-1160.
Reference messages WA-1545† and WA-1546† of July 15, from Canadian Ambassador, Washington, repeated to you as telegrams No. 1018† and No. 1019† of July 18. First meeting of North Atlantic Deputies.

1. We shall be commenting separately on other items of the suggested agenda for the Deputies' meeting, and on the views you have expressed in your telegram No. 1392 of July 20,† but as regards Item 4, the Roundup on the World Situation, we have been considering whether or not it would be useful for the Deputies to discuss Korea. A discussion on Korea among the North Atlantic Deputies at this time would, it seems to us, be almost unavoidable if the North Atlantic countries are to take the meetings of the Deputies as seriously as the Council obviously intended they should when the matter was discussed in London. The meetings of Deputies were clearly intended to provide a means of consultation on all important aspects of the foreign policies of the North Atlantic countries and even if the Korean situation had no immediate bearing on the defence of Western Europe, it would, in our view, come within the terms of reference of the Deputies. Moreover, the Korean war appears likely, even if it does not spread to other areas of the Far East, to affect directly, at least in the short run, both the speed and quantity of U.S. military aid to Europe, as well as our own Canada/U.S. regional planning under the Treaty. While President Truman's message to Congress[43] shows that the United States intend to increase their military production as rapidly as possible, the situation in the Far East, in the short run, may diminish to some extent the ability of the U.S. to supply equipment to meet the immediate deficiencies of Western Europe and to supply the strategic reserve forces contemplated under present North Atlantic plans.

2. Indeed, the whole balance between the defence needs of the North Atlantic area and of the Pacific is at issue. This is, of course, as much a political as a strategic problem, especially for the countries of Western Union at a time when their Commander in Chief is most seriously disturbed at the shortcoming of their defences and the aid contemplated during the next year from the United States. While Medium Term Planning can, no doubt, continue, Short Term Planning and particularly immediate supply questions are bound to be directly affected by the situation in the Far East. It would, we are inclined to believe, be unreal for the Deputies to meet in this situation without facing this serious question and, if possible, arriving at some basis of agreement, as to the policies that it is desirable to pursue. However, there is no reason why we should take the lead in initiating such a discussion, and according to our information from the French Embassy here, it is likely that Alphand will do so, as M. Schuman is apparently anxious to have the Deputies discuss Korea.

3. We recognize, of course, the difficulties in the way of having any useful discussion on such related problems as the admission of Communist China to the United Nations and U.S. policy on Formosa. We would, however, be grateful for your comments as to whether, in your opinion, there will be raised at the first meeting of Deputies concrete questions of policy related both to the Korean war and the immediate problems of North Atlantic planning and supply.

Your telegram No. 1392 of July 20.† Draft agenda for first meeting of North Atlantic Deputies.

1. Secretariat. While agreeing that there should be close integration of Secretariats, we think that the machinery should be elaborated as little as possible. We understand that the proposed secretariat would in fact be Shuckburgh and the existing secretaries of the DFEC, the MPSB, and the Ocean Shipping Planning Board; hence no new officers would be added. If so, we should avoid the impression, by nomenclature, that the machinery is expanding and that yet another body is being added to the North Atlantic structure. To what other bodies did you refer when you added "etc." after three NATO organs now in London?

2. We agree with suggestion for additional agenda item headed "Organization of Work of Deputies and their relation with other NATO powers".

3. International staff. We agree that to avoid duplication a clear need for additional staff must be demonstrated after a trial period before we should agree to recruiting more assistants.

4. World Situation. Our telegram No. 1049 of July 22 refers.

5. Action by Governments. I do not think that we should initiate discussion, but if reports on action are given by the members you might base your remarks on the Prime Minister's statement of July [19].[44] You may indicate that the Canadian Government is now increasing its defence expenditures considerably over the defence budget for 1950-51, which was in itself a considerable increase over the previous year. For your own information, we anticipate pressure in Washington for further defence expenditure in Canada. Ignatieff is explaining to the State Department Monday the measures approved by Canada for the strengthening of the armed forces. We are repeating to you our telegram to Washington. We may send you a further telegram Monday suggesting a general line.

6. Consideration of political matters. We believe that the NAT countries should use the Deputies for raising any political matters of common interest and for discussing them frankly. We hope that the U.S. and U.K. will encourage the free exchange of views of the members of the Deputies. It would be useless to use the

We do not think that a U.S. official should be appointed, though we could not openly oppose a U.S. nomination on the grounds of nationality. One important function of an information officer would be enlightenment of the United States on the views of the European governments. We see no prospect of appointing a Canadian to the post.

Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: Your message WA-1565 of July 20† re State Department views on Canadian defence problems.

1. No doubt you and Ignatieff have already been taking stock of the ammunition you will want to use when Ignatieff sees Satterthwaite Monday. We might, however, contribute a few suggestions.

2. Should the US officials be disposed to criticise unfavourably Canadian defence policy, Ignatieff should make clear to them that while he has no objection personally to hearing their views, any such criticism put forward officially would be strongly resented in Ottawa, and that in the interest of co-operation in joint defence, such a course should be avoided. He might further point out that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was specially constituted to study problems on joint defence and that it would be the appropriate body to which new joint defence proposals should be submitted.

3. Ignatieff might also wish to refer to the stepping up of the defence programme approved on July 19.[45] The following are the details:

(a) Air Force. Increase production of Orenda jet engines from 20 to 50 a month. Increase production of F-86 from 5 to 7 monthly and of CF-100 aircraft from 3 to 5 monthly. Purchase from the United States 100 Mustangs and 3 year spare parts for operational training. 3 additional stations for radar net.

[45] Voir le document 48./See Document 48.

(b) Navy. Bring 2 destroyers and 2 Algerine minesweepers back into commission (from mothballs). Improve the preparedness of some seaway defences. Purchase (possibly from the United States instead of Sorel) naval guns for 9 Tribal destroyers.

(c) Army. Bring up our brigade group from its training establishment (as it is at present) to full war establishment (which means more than doubling its strength). Increase anti-aircraft batteries.

(d) Recruitment above Service ceilings of between 5 and 6 thousand men, mostly for the Air Force. (As the Services are at present below their ceilings, the total additional intake to our Armed Forces will be about 8,000 or roughly 17% of their present strength).

4. The total cost of this additional defence programme will be in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000 this year in addition to the $425,000,000 budgeted for defence. As you will recall from the figures tabled with the North Atlantic Defence Financial and Economic Committee in London (document NATO FEC(50)D-12,† Annex 3 of May 3, forwarded with NATFEC 17 of May 20, 1950†), we contend that if our defence budget was on a basis comparable with that of other North Atlantic countries, our figures for defence for the fiscal year beginning 1950 would be $545,000,000 Canadian including such items as:

Research and development in atomic energy and jet aircraft; various items for veterans' services;
housing for military personnel;
police and security services;
merchant marine and coast guard services;
topographical surveys, aids to navigation, and meteorological services;
civil airfields, ports, transportation and communications services.

These items are not included in our $425,000,000 figure. With the additional defence programme, we shall, therefore, be spending approximately $600,000,000 on defence this year, calculated on a basis comparable to that of other North Atlantic countries' budgets.

5. Should the question of Canadian contributions to Mutual Aid under the North Atlantic Treaty arise, it is suggested that you might point out some of our basic difficulties, among them that Canadian arms production is based primarily on U.K. types and standards, whereas we are endeavouring to shift over as far as possible to U.S. types and standards. It might also be pointed out that we have little information on the U.S. views as to what countries should be encouraged to remain on U.K. types and standards of arms. Until there is agreement on some of these fundamental questions we can do very little in providing effective Mutual Aid.

6. It seems to us that the "empirical approach" which Pierce successfully sponsored at the recent Copenhagen meeting of the MPSB is basic to our present thinking on North Atlantic and defence matters generally. You might point out to the State Department that we would not have pressed the empirical approach at Copenhagen without realizing that it implied that we were prepared to do something for the mutual aid of our partners once we could establish clearly a reliable estimate of their net deficiencies, production prospects and equipment standards. This does not mean that we propose to wait for all the answers to come in on a number of very far-reaching strategic and industrial questions before we do something, but we do feel that the present information available to us on North Atlantic deficiencies and U.S. policy is not an adequate basis for framing a Canadian mutual aid policy, especially as we depend to so much greater an extent than either the U.S. or the U.K. on the military production of other countries to supplement our own and we can, therefore, only make our most effective contribution towards meeting our own needs and those of others in co-operation with them.

6. The State Department proposal of a possible revival of the Hyde Park Agreement, mentioned in your message WA-1574 of July 20† would, of course, make our defence problem much easier in both its self-help and mutual aid aspects.[46] Ends.

Your Telegram No. 1392 of July 20th.† First meeting of North Atlantic Deputies.

1. In our Telegram No. 1050 of July 22nd, we promised to comment on your suggestions re Item 10 regarding Article 2. As regards the first aspect, the possibility of special machinery being proposed to implement Article 2 after E.C.A. comes to an end, I do not see how we could oppose such a proposal, although we see no necessity for your taking any initiative in proposing the setting of new machinery at this stage. It was at my suggestion that the question of implementing Article 2 was first raised in the Council and, again during the London session of the Council, I secured an amendment to the U.K. resolution in order to make it plain that we were not accepting a low priority for Article 2. In these circumstances, we think any opposition, or even lukewarmness on the part of the Canadian Deputy, to a proposal for studying this question could not easily be explained.

2. As regards the possibility of a discussion arising under Item 2 as to the relative priorities of defence and economic recovery, I fully agree with your paragraphs 12 and 13 that the experience of the London Council meeting is sufficient reason to make us wary of any such discussions in theoretical terms, and I think, as you suggest, that it would be useful to press for the early completion of the costing of the revised Medium Term Plan. In addition, we expect that the United States Deputy may, either formally or informally, try to encourage other North Atlantic countries to review their defence programmes and their financial position in order to determine whether they might not undertake a greater share of the burden, in the light of the international situation, especially as President Truman's message to Congress last week indicated the scale on which the United States believe defence production must be stepped up among all countries that could possibly afford to do so. This may be a prime motive for the State Department initiating conversations on defence with us today, as you will have seen from our Teletype No. EX-1161 of July 24th to Washington repeated to you as our Telegram No. 1052 of July 22nd. As requested in your Telegram No. 1415 of July 24th,† we are repeating in our immediately following message the text of Teletype WA-1565 of July 20th.†

We see no objection to your using in the Deputies meeting most of the points made in our Telegram No. 1052, but we do not think you should quote production figures which were taken from Cabinet conclusions and are highly secret. Following from Wilgress, Begins: From conversations with Achilles of the United States delegation, I understand that the United States Government is proposing to submit to Congress around August 5th their proposed legislation for increased military aid to other North Atlantic countries, and I have the impression that the United States delegation hopes to use this session of the Deputies to secure an indication of the intentions of other North Atlantic countries, in both self-help and mutual aid, which would be useful to the Administration. Achilles intimated that the State Department was instructing its missions in each of the North Atlantic countries last weekend to ask the particular Government what steps it was proposing to take to increase its defence effort. The replies would guide the Administration in determining the shape and size of any programme to be put to Congress. Achilles reported that the French had already given indications of an intention to increase their defence expenditures by as much as some 250,000 million francs.

[47] La version initiale du télégramme se terminait ainsi:/The initial draft of this telegram concluded with the following sentence:
Needless to say, it would not be appropriate to refer even obliquely to the feeling at the back of our minds that U.S. criticism of the Canadian contribution to Korea and the size of our defence establishment generally should be tempered by the realization that we have fought longer than they in two world wars.

2. In these circumstances, I feel strongly that now is the time for the Canadian Government to consider the possibility of taking an immediate decision on the question of contributing equipment on a divisional scale from existing stocks to the European countries in the North Atlantic Treaty. An announcement to this effect, coupled with a general statement of the increase in our own defence programme would, in my opinion, not only help the United States Administration, but would be evidence to other North Atlantic countries of our determination to play our part. Since we are unlikely to be able to justify at this time an increase in our own defence expenditure proportionate to the increase which the United States and the European countries may be making in theirs, some degree of mutual aid on our part might be necessary to produce a comparable increase in our overall effort.

3. I realize that you have been considering the steps which might be necessary to make it possible for you to release such equipment, including consultation with the United States regarding replacement. It seems to us here that, in the light of the new international situation and of the proposed defence and military assistance programmes in the United States, many of these arrangements might now be left, with some degree of confidence, to be worked out at a later stage. Is it going too far to assume that in the present circumstances the United States would respond to any positive offer of assistance which we might make by facilitating (through legislation and otherwise) replacement with United States types in reasonable time?

4. While I recognize that the present estimates of deficiencies are not at all precise, particularly as between United Kingdom and United States types of equipment, we are convinced, as we have indicated in our letter to Heeney of June 2nd† that any offer of serviceable equipment which we might be able to make would most certainly be taken up and put to good use. Ends.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Aide Mémoire by Embassy of United States

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 25, 1950

The President of the United States has proposed a substantial increase in the military effort of the United States. It is his belief that other free nations will likewise wish to increase their defenses and he has expressed his willingness to extend further assistance to help other nations to make their maximum contribution to the common cause. With respect to North Atlantic Treaty countries such a program would be developed in co-operation with them. The President will ask Congress for additional appropriations in order to attain and maintain our common strength at an adequate level.

The President has already proposed an additional expenditure of $10,000,000,000 to carry out the additional United States effort. He has also proposed the imposition of substantial new taxes and a system of domestic controls. It is the view of the United States Government that the world situation requires action by other North Atlantic Treaty countries reflecting a similar sense of urgency. It is felt that extra efforts will be required by all North Atlantic Treaty governments and of NATO in order to take advantage of the present momentum, and to inaugurate immediately a program whose execution will of necessity take considerable time.

The United States Government hopes to be able to provide estimates of amounts of major equipment items in the proposed U.S. program for planning purposes in London. The United States Government hopes to have by August 5, 1950, the firmest possible statement from European countries, especially the United Kingdom and France, of the nature and extent of this increased effort. The increased emphasis required for North Atlantic defense will be discussed at the meeting of the Council of Deputies starting in London today.

The military authorities of the United States believe that there is sufficient information in the hands of the NATO military planners to permit firm governmental steps to be taken now to increase military effectiveness during the next twelve months, all of which would be in line with the final requirements for 1954. The American Deputy is expected to have available for background use in the London discussions the latest thinking of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with respect to NAT force requirements. In view of the time required between the placing of contracts for equipment for the forces required in 1954 and the time of final delivery of such equipment, it is considered important to place contracts now to the maximum extent possible. It is the general opinion that each North Atlantic country should act in terms of effort over the next two years, to an extent limited only by the ability of each country to recruit, train and maintain manpower to meet requirements under NAT planning, and by the necessity for maintaining a tolerable level of consumption and rate of capital investment during the rearmament phase. It is recognized, however, that an excessive diversion of resources to war purposes could undermine the foundations of military strength. But it is believed that all countries should accept lower levels of consumption than would otherwise be achieved, and will be required to divert resources from peacetime production to other purposes.

It is also considered that each North Atlantic Treaty country should plan for maximum military production effort to meet its own requirements and for distribution to other countries in accordance with the program for concentrating production in the most efficient locations. Normal financial criteria may have to be disregarded but it is hoped that further U.S. assistance will enable the development of a satisfactory arrangement for inter-country transfers. It is felt that each country should make every effort to put into production the most modern weapons available with the broadest possible areas of standardization, but not to the extent that the initiation of quantity production will be delayed.

In order to support the additional forces to be organized and to pay for the military production needed to equip them it may be necessary to call upon the following sources of funds:

(1) Maximum additions by each country to its own military budget by increased taxes, transfer of funds to military from non-military purposes, and curtailing of investment programs of a peacetime nature.

(2) The United States might be prepared to consider a request to Congress for additional assistance to maximize the effort of European countries, particularly in the field of military production, by means beyond those now permitted under the Mutual Defense Aid Program.

(3) The United States will provide a substantial volume of the same type of end-item equipment as is currently being provided under the Mutual Defense Aid Program.

(4) North Atlantic Treaty countries in calculating their dollar resources should assume the availability of presently planned levels of ECA assistance through 1952 and should not exclude the possibility that assistance beyond 1952 might be available if their military effort makes it necessary in order to maintain their economy at adequate levels.

While the foregoing reflects the opinion of the Executive Branch of the United States Government and does not commit Congress, the feeling of urgency on the part of the American people is such that, given a vigorous effort on the part of other countries, the Executive Branch is confident that the requisite U.S. action will be forthcoming. The extreme importance of immediate action by each North Atlantic Treaty country cannot be overemphasized.

TELEGRAM 1433 London, July 26, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEPUTIES

1. The principal discussion at this afternoon's meeting related to "reports on action taken or planned by the Governments". Spofford made an impressive statement along somewhat the lines anticipated in our telegram No. 1420 of July 25th. No doubt you will have received the substance of his statement in the communication which I understand the United States Government transmitted to other North Atlantic Governments during last week-end. In any event, we hope to have shortly the full text of the statement for cabling to you. In the meantime the following is a brief summary.

2. Spofford referred to the substantial increase in United States defence expenditures (both absolutely and in relation to the United States national product and national income) which the President's message to Congress called for.

3. As indicated in the President's message, the United States administration also intends to seek funds for further military aid during the present fiscal year. It is hoped to increase both the volume and variety of United States military assistance to other North Atlantic Countries. The administration is prepared to recommend not only that increased amounts of the present forms of aid should be supplied, but also that new types of aid should be provided. Spofford remarked that these new types might include assistance to enable one North Atlantic country to produce supplies for another, contributions to any arrangements which might facilitate transfers of military supplies among North Atlantic countries, and compensation to various North Atlantic countries for losses in export earnings resulting from the diversion of resources to increased military production. Although the increased defence effort which the present situation required from all North Atlantic countries would doubtless involve the slowing up of the rate of economic recovery and possibly certain reductions in standards of living, the United States administration was anxious to do its part in sharing the additional burdens. The extent to which the administration will be able to seek or secure Congressional approval for such a further programme of military assistance will depend upon information provided by all other North Atlantic countries concerning:

(a) The increase which they themselves are prepared to make in their defence efforts, in terms of additional forces and expanded military production and mutual aid;

(b) The size and nature of the needs of such countries for United States assistance.

4. Spofford confirmed that communications had been addressed to the various Governments through the heads of the United States missions. Presumably each country would transmit its reply through the United States Embassy in its capital. It was suggested that each Deputy might request his Government to provide him with the contents of any reply for the information of the Deputies as a group. In Spofford's view the function of the Deputies in connection with these various exchanges should not be to complicate any bilateral discussions which might be proceeding but should rather be to accelerate the replies and possibly to co-ordinate the results, particularly if the replies raise questions of priorities among defence requirements on which the Deputies as a whole might usefully comment. I should be grateful if you could let me have, as soon as possible, reports on any exchanges which you may have had with the United States Embassy in Ottawa on this subject.

5. Spofford also confirmed that the United States administration hoped to receive the requested information and suggestions from other North Atlantic Governments by August 5th.

In conclusion, Spofford emphasized that:

(a) While the United States Government is preparing to help rebuild the military strength of Western Europe, it is not in a position to carry the increased burden without evidence of similar substantial increases in the efforts of other participating countries;

(b) While the urgency of the present situation had made it necessary to resort to bilateral discussions in order to get the views of other North Atlantic countries on this occasion, the United States administration felt strongly that military assistance by individual countries should be part of North Atlantic planning and it was the intention of the United States that the North Atlantic agencies should be responsible for much of the implementation of any military assistance programme that might result from the present exchange of views.

7. In the discussion which followed Spofford's statement, several representatives made some preliminary observations and indicated that they might have further views to express tomorrow. I made a brief preliminary statement along the lines of your telegram No. 1052 of July 22nd. Unfortunately the United Kingdom representative was not in a position to give the Deputies the substance of the new measures which were being announced at about that time in the House of Commons. He intimated, however, that those measures would involve a substantial increase in United Kingdom defence expenditures.

My telegram No. 1433 of 26th July.

The second meeting of the Deputies was held at Lancaster House this afternoon. Before the Deputies proceeded to consider Item 4, Spofford announced that the Secretary of State had suggested the dates of September 15th and 16th for the meeting of the Council in New York, and asked for approval of suggested date by Foreign Ministers.

2. Hoyer Millar suggested to the Chairman that it might be appropriate to extend an invitation at once to the Standing Group, asking them to send a representative to London to establish liaison with the Deputies. M. Alphand made the further suggestion that in addition to receiving a representative of the Standing Group in London, it might be worth while to appoint an official representing the Deputies to maintain liaison with the Standing Group in Washington. It was finally agreed that the Standing Group should be invited to send a representative to London at once to be present for the discussion of the report of the Standing Group, and to act as a liaison officer on any other matters which might arise involving the arrangements for the co-ordination of work between the Standing Group and the Deputies. It was agreed that this would be particularly useful in connection with the report on the action of the Standing Group, copies of which were available here only a few minutes before the beginning of the meeting. In order to give the Deputies time to study the Standing Group's report† (copies of which I assume are available to you through Washington), the Chairman proposed that we should proceed with Items 5(B) and (C).

3. In connection with the report of the MPSB, I took the opportunity of making a brief statement drawing attention to the practical steps taken by the Board at Copenhagen, and suggesting that the Deputies endorse the practical measures taken and commend their action to our Governments and other NATO agencies concerned.

4. Both the United Kingdom and the French Deputies, as well as the Permanent Chairman, immediately endorsed this suggestion, which was then approved by the Deputies. Spofford made the point in supporting our view that the end item task force project was not an alternative for the more long-term process of planning in the field of military supply, but would give such planning a greater urgency.

5. The reports on the actions of the DFEC and the report of the Ocean Shipping Planning Board were deferred pending further study, and prior consideration of the report of the Standing Group.

6. The Deputies then proceeded to deal with Item 4 calling for a round-up on the world situation. The Permanent Chairman spoke very briefly, and his brevity and informality set the tone for other speakers. He made the point that the President had recently made the United States position abundantly clear. He noted particularly that the United States had been fully supported in Korea by the North Atlantic Treaty countries, and in the United Nations. Although it was difficult to predict what the final outcome of the present crisis would be, the United States was convinced that the action which had been taken reduced the element of risk. The possibility, however, of further steps of aggression elsewhere could not be overlooked. Spofford emphasized that as the President's message to Congress had indicated, the measures recently taken to increase the resistance to aggression in Korea would also provide for increased military strength in the North Atlantic area. The strengthening of the North Atlantic community was still in the forefront of United States policy. By taking steps to increase its own military preparedness, it was hoped that the United States action would provide part of an overall increase in the defensive strength of the North Atlantic Treaty Powers.

7. M. Alphand spoke next, and made perhaps the best contribution to the discussion. He sketched the developments in the world situation since the Council last met in May, and urged the need for drawing practical conclusions. After praising the courage and swiftness of the United States action in the face of aggression in Korea, he emphasized that had this action not been taken with such promptness the menace of further aggression would be much greater than it is to-day. It was necessary for the Deputies, in the face of the present situation, to accelerate their work and to abandon theoretical exercises in favour of concrete and constructive effort. The period of perfectionism was over and the emphasis should be placed on immediate aims. The obligations in Asia had to be met, but they should not blind us to the continued central importance of Continental Europe. He again repeated the French thesis of the importance of the initial battle and of having adequate troops and armaments on the spot in Western Europe. At the same time, he pointed out the strength of Communist propaganda in Continental Europe and urged that the aim of social and economic stability in the countries of Western Europe should at no time be overlooked. Nor should the impression be given, through the defensive measures now being contemplated, that these measures had an aggressive purpose.

8. Hoyer Millar spoke very briefly, paying tribute to the leadership shown by the United States. The United Kingdom interpretation of the events in Korea was that the Soviet Union was aiming to eliminate Western European influence in the Far East. It was now necessary to be on guard over a wide area. He made the comment that there had been a tendency on the part of some of the military people to plan either against the last war or for the next war but one. The essential thing was to apply ourselves to the present situation and to meet immediate requirements. Hoyer Millar was clearly inhibited in his remarks by the fact that an announcement was being made at the same time in the House of Commons concerning the United Kingdom contribution of ground forces in Korea and the new measures of increased defence expenditure. It was, however, I think unfortunate that advance arrangements had not been made to make at least the substance of these major decisions available to the Deputies as soon as the House announcement had been made. In the absence of such arrangements Hoyer Millar was only able to give a very sketchy indication of the fact that decisions of importance were being announced today.

9. The Belgian representative quoted from a report of the Belgian Chiefs of Staff, which exposed the glaring disparity between the available Soviet forces, for which he gave figures, and the forces available to the North Atlantic Powers, on which he was more discreet. He said that the Belgian delegation would circulate a working paper to the Deputies outlining what they considered to be practical steps which might be taken to improve the overall defence position.

10. In my remarks I stressed the deterioration of the situation since the meeting of the Council, and referred to the Korean episode as an illustration of the fact that the forces of aggression had moved from the technique of internal disruption to open warfare. The present indications were that the Soviet Union was not itself prepared to embark on war, but had found other means of creating aggression without direct Soviet participation. Korea had created a situation of urgency calling for greater preparedness. I recalled that the immediate background to the negotiations leading up to the North Atlantic Treaty was the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia. The need now was to proceed more quickly and more practically than we had done in the past, and in emphasizing the need for a practical approach, I referred to the lead given in the MPSB by the adoption of the resolution on task forces. I concluded by saying that the Korean situation had increased the necessity for making more rapid progress on defence arrangements in the vital North Atlantic area.

11. The other Deputies all made brief comments along similar lines to earlier speakers.

12. Winding up the discussion, Spofford said that the prompt association of the members of the United Nations with the United States over the Korean crisis had been a great source of encouragement both to the administration and to the American people, and he also expressed gratitude for the tangible evidences of support which had been forthcoming.

1. This is purely private and preliminary enquiry to you personally with the object of making up my mind whether it is the least use our making a formal approach and whether such an approach would embarrass you and the RCAF which is the last thing I want to do.

2. You will be aware from reports of yesterday's defence debate in the House that we are taking some pretty active steps in the field of production and works to improve our war preparedness. These steps which include the production of substantial reserves of fighters next year will be largely unprofitable unless we can produce the men to use the material both in the air and on the ground.

3. This presents very serious difficulties for us in present circumstances and I am particularly worried about the provision of an adequate reserve of young repeat young pilots fit to take their place as replacements for wastage in fighter command early in war. We have a lot of flying reserves but they are most of them getting a bit old to be fighter boys in war.

4. What I want to be able to do is to train at least another 300 national service entrants as pilots in peace beginning January next year and on present form see no prospect of being able to do so in this country. Do you think there is the least chance of Canada being able to take on all or any of this job.

5. I know you will give me your frank opinion. If you say it is no good pursuing it I shall drop it. If you say you think it might be worth suggesting formally I shall not mention this exchange of signals unless you authorize me to do so.

6. I expect you will have heard from Pirie[48] that I have very regretfully had to cancel my visit to Canada and the States this fall. Am hoping to see you here for the SBAC[49] show and shall hope to get to Canada perhaps next spring if the smoke clears a bit.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEPUTIES

1. The sub-committee concerned with arrangements relating to the Secretariat, staff, and the exchange of information within the NATO met this morning and is to meet again tomorrow morning.

2. At the meeting of the Deputies this afternoon, Spofford began by enquiring whether any representatives were in a position to comment further on the statement which he had made the day before (see our telegram No. 1442 of today†). In the absence of any substantial observations, the Deputies proceeded to discuss item 7 on the agenda relating to "further action required on matters referred to in the immediately preceding items".

3. Alphand suggested that consideration should be given to the establishment of a common North Atlantic budget consisting of some portion of the funds in the defence budgets of member countries (or of the expected increases therein) which might be used to overcome some of the problems involved in the production and transfer of military supplies within the North Atlantic area. He thought that some provisional financial arrangements might be required for dealing with the immediate difficulties (which relate not only to transfers among countries but also to internal budgetary problems).

4. Spofford then presented a United States proposal, the text of which is reproduced in my immediately following telegram.† The effect of his proposal is to suggest a definite programme of work and timetable for the Standing Group, the MPSB/PWS and the DFEC/PWS to make recommendations to the Deputies for the best and most rapid use of any additional funds which member countries might make available as a result of recent developments. On the proposed timetable, recommendations would be made to the Deputies by August 25th. Spofford emphasized that this proposal was not intended to conflict with the "end-item task forces" being established by the MPSB. The objects of the proposal are to provide a basis on which effective action can be taken if additional funds (including those anticipated from the United States) become available, and to serve as a means of bringing before the Deputies in specific terms the most troublesome policy questions. If it was felt that the proposal might be interpreted as duplicating the activities of the "task forces" the Deputies might wish to emphasize that this work is intended to fit in with, and to reinforce, the efforts of the "task forces". If the Deputies were to accept his proposal, they might at the same time urge Governments to expedite the work of the "task forces".

5. Alphand suggested that in the first sentence of paragraph 3 in the United States proposal the words "in Europe" should be replaced by "in the NAT countries" (and presumably also "European" in the first sentence of paragraph 1 should be replaced by "North Atlantic"), since the problem should be considered on a broad North Atlantic, and nor merely European basis. He also suggested that there should be some recognition in paragraph 4 of the fact that the DFEC/PWS is unlikely to produce a concrete recommendation and that the solution will have to be found in discussions among the Deputies, assisted by the DFEC/PWS. Finally, he proposed that the Deputies should request the Standing Group to take account not only of equipment requirements for the armed forces, but also of requirements for the "infrastructure" (i.e. the common supporting facilities and services, such as airfields, communications etc).

6. In commenting on Alphand's first suggestion Spofford remarked that the survey of production capacity was intended to relate to surplus capacity already in existence. He doubted that, particularly in the light of President Truman's recommendations, it could be said that there was idle capacity in the United States for producing munitions. In fact, it was proving necessary to use not only existing facilities but to convert plants from the production of civilian goods.

7. Spofford was inclined to agree with Alphand's second suggestion, since he recognized that the DFEC/PWS would probably not be able to do more than put forward various alternative proposals, leaving differences of view to be resolved by the Deputies. In his opinion, the DFEC/PWS might suggest provisional or ad hoc arrangements for specific cases or it might suggest general arrangements suitable for the longer term.

8. Concerning Alphand's suggestion regarding the inclusion of the "infrastructure", Spofford felt that this suggestion raised complicated questions and he was not sure that the Standing Group would be able, at this time, to provide much guidance. He undertook, however, to consult with his military advisers on the possibility.

9. Several representatives indicated that they would like to have the general financial problem discussed by the Deputies, rather than by the DFEC/PWS, at this stage. The Belgian Deputy, in particular, felt that it was a matter which the Deputies could now usefully consider. He suggested that consideration might be given to the establishment of a clearing or compensation arrangement under which those countries supplying equipment to others would receive a credit in the clearing account and those receiving equipment would be debited. Any country which was an over-all creditor in respect of such transactions in military supplies at the end of each period would be paid the balance in a suitable currency which would have been contributed to the pool (including, presumably, United States dollars). Spofford felt that this might be one of the suggestions which the DFEC/PWS would put forward. He thought there might also be other suggestions which the DFEC/PWS would be prepared to submit for discussion by the Deputies.

10. The work programme and timetable proposed by Spofford will be considered further by the Deputies tomorrow afternoon. Since the principal effect of the proposal is merely to accelerate work which the NAT bodies have already been authorized to undertake, it was not felt that the formal approval of Governments need be sought.

11. After tomorrow afternoon's meeting the Deputies plan to adjourn until Tuesday, when it is hoped that they will be in a position to give some indication of the replies which their Governments are making to the United States enquiry of last week-end. It is also expected that a representative of the Standing Group will be available to meet with the Deputies early next week.

12. I should be grateful for any further information which you may be able to give me regarding your reaction to Spofford's statement reported in my telegram No. 1442, and to the related discussions which our Embassy in Washington has been having with the State Department. It would also be helpful to receive any further views which you may have on the manner in which the question of Article 2 should be dealt with at this meeting of the Deputies. In this connection, as you will have seen from our message No. 1421 of July 25th,† reporting on a conversation with Achilles, there is some expectation that we might take the lead in the discussion on this subject.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEPUTIES

Following from Reid, Begins: Referring to Tuesday's meeting of Deputies, it is regretted that we have no further information to give you for use in your comments on the Chairman's statement. This does not (not) mean that the present international situation is not (not) being taken seriously here but simply that no (no) concrete steps beyond those reported in our telegram No. 1052 of July 24th have yet been taken. While developments are probable over the next few days we cannot at present anticipate them.

As you know conversations have been going on in Washington about defence production preparatory to the meeting of the Joint Industrial Mobilization Planning Committee but we do not feel it would be appropriate to mention them at the meeting of Deputies.

If you feel it essential to comment on the Chairman's opening statement as given in your 1442 of July 27th† it is suggested that you express appreciation of the lead taken by the United States and indicate that Canada will carry its appropriate share of responsibilities. You might cite the increased defence programme as set forth in our 1052 of July 24th as an earnest of the Government's intentions indicating that this programme is an interim one and that further substantial increases in defence expenditures are anticipated. In this connection it would be appropriate to quote from the Prime Minister's statement of July 19th especially the second last paragraph.

With regard to the proposed fund discussion in your 1459 of July 31st,† I hope to send you comments tomorrow. Ends.

Projet d'une communication du ministère des Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire du Royaume-Uni[50]

Draft Communication from Department of External Affairs to High Commissioner of United Kingdom[50]

[Ottawa, August 8, 1950]

As you are now aware the Canadian Government is taking immediate steps to expand the armed forces and increase production and production facilities of aircraft and other military stores. Realizing that the recently announced expansion of defence programmes in the United Kingdom will undoubtedly overtax training facilities in the United Kingdom for RAF aircrew the revised RCAF plans can make provision for the training of a substantial number of RAF pilots if so desired.

I would be grateful if you would advise your government that the Canadian government desires to offer assistance in the training of pilots for the RAF, over and above the offer made by the Minister of National Defence in his letter of March 17, 1950, to your Minister of Defence, all the vacancies in which have been taken up by other countries. This will probably require the opening of a new flying training school.

In my letter to you of July 10, 1950, I advised you of the wish of the Canadian government to send RCAF fighter elements to the United Kingdom to obtain experience in more advanced operational techniques in co-operation with the RAF. My letter mentioned also the desirability of reaching a mutual financial arrangement to avoid the transfer of funds. It seems to us that the very heavy expenditures involved in the present proposal should be considered with regard to our own proposal for gaining experience in the United Kingdom and other similar proposals, for example the possible purchase of Sea Furies which we have under discussion, so that as far as possible cooperation for defence between the two countries is carried out on a mutual aid basis, minimizing the necessity for transfer of funds.

When a decision has been reached on this offer detailed arrangements along these lines could then be made between the departments of government concerned.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL; REPORT OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE

1. The High Commissioner to the United Kingdom gave an outline of the proceedings at the first session of the North Atlantic Council Deputies which had just concluded in London. The main theme had been the urgency of the present international situation and the necessity of building up, as rapidly as possible, the defences of the North Atlantic Treaty countries.

The Chairman of the Council Deputies, Mr. Spofford, had taken a number of initiatives towards this end. The first was clearly to define the important political decisions that would have to be taken before further progress could be made. While it was realized that political decisions could not be made by the Deputies, the necessity of bringing the problems out in sharp focus for consideration of the North Atlantic Council was stressed. A major political question was the French desire to have as many British and American divisions as possible available for the immediate defence of Europe. While this presented many difficulties, Mr. Spofford had recognized the need of reinforcing French morale, if France was to play her full part in the collective security of the North Atlantic countries.

In an effort to encourage accelerated defence programmes in the European countries, notes had been sent to these governments urging that, in view of the menacing international situation, every effort be made to increase their defence efforts so that the state of military preparedness that had been contemplated by 1954 might be reached inside of a two-year period. Stress was laid on the necessity for achieving maximum military training and maximum production for military purposes before 1952. Governments were urged to increase domestic budgets and endeavour to meet increased expenditures by raising taxation levels. The U.S. Government had indicated that it was prepared to consider increased assistance along a number of lines.

A slightly different approach had been made to the Canadian Government, based on recognition of the fact that Canada would be a net supplier of arms. Mr. Spofford had explained that in order to get the whole hearted approval of Congress and the American people for the large increases in the defence appropriation, particularly the $4 billion for mutual aid, it would be necessary for other countries also to indicate their willingness to make increased sacrifices for their defence.

The second approach made by Mr. Spofford had been addressed to the urgent need for military equipment. Thus far little progress had been made in resolving the problems of standardization, production and financing. A provisional programme had been agreed which required the Standing Group to compile a list of the highest priority equipment, broken down in types, by August 15th. By August 23rd, the Permanent Working Staff of the Military Production and Supply Board had been requested to provide a list of production facilities available in Europe to meet these deficiencies. By August 25th, the Permanent Working Staff of the Defence Financial and Economic Committee was to recommend provisional mechanisms for the utilization of funds made available by all North Atlantic Treaty countries for military production in Europe in order to permit the most effective and efficient production. Emphasis had been placed on utilizing the surplus productive capacity available at present in Europe but which up to now had not been utilized because of transfer difficulties.

Arrangements had been made for the Standing Group to visit London during the meetings so that the Deputies could have the benefit of their advice. The Group had confirmed the urgency of the present international situation and had laid great emphasis on the inadequacy of the current production of military equipment. In addition, the need for much larger forces in being to deal with the international situation had been stressed. In this connection, it was learned that the Group had prepared a report on collective balanced forces which was likely to be made available in the very near future. Apparently this report would indicate the primary role of each region and each nation. However, there was some possibility that it might be of too general a nature to be of assistance in resolving the political problems with which the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was faced.

In an effort to solve the problem of transfer of military equipment, a number of proposals had been advanced including a clearing agreement and a common fund. The difficulties in the first proposal made its realization unlikely. There had been some indication, however, that the Americans would support the idea of a common fund, made up of contributions from member countries, and used to finance transfers of equipment. This idea was being actively sponsored by the French and other countries on the continent of Europe. The United Kingdom were opposed to the concept of such a fund on the grounds that it was cumbersome and unnecessary and also that it presupposed some sort of super-national authority which would be necessary to determine the allocation of the fund. They had suggested instead a free exchange of military equipment between the European countries underwritten by Mutual Defence Assistance Programme. Where one country sustained an unfair burden because of such an exchange, they would obtain compensation from M.D.A.P.

While the reports of the Military Committee, the Military Production and Supply Board and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee would deal with methods of stimulating production in Europe, Canada would be expected to give some indication of its readiness and ability to meet the deficiencies of the highest priority equipment when the question was discussed at the next meeting of the Deputies to be held later in the month. It was suggested that the deficiencies were so great that production might be usefully started immediately and that further refinement of requirements would be done by the end-item task forces established by the Military Production and Supply Board at their last meeting.

With respect to the inadequacy of forces in being, each Deputy was requested to report by August 28th to the North Atlantic Council Deputies, the steps presently planned to be taken to increase his country's total effective combat forces over and above those now planned for July 1st, 1951; the report to include an estimate of the effective increase of military formations to be achieved by these measures.

2. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee suggested that any return made in this respect should be on the lines of the United States return. Last year the United States and Canada had not tabled such information, pointing out that all requirements for the defence of the North American region would be met from within that region itself. Appendices had been tabled showing what forces could be made available at certain periods after the outbreak of hostilities.

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that there would be pressure on Canada from France to supply occupation troops in Europe. It could be pointed out in reply that Canada would not be able to carry out effectively a role of producing equipment for Treaty partners if a substantial part of the Canadian manpower force were diverted to the Armed Forces. However, this obviously would not be an effective answer unless Canada was prepared to produce substantial amounts of equipment for other countries.

4. General Foulkes pointed out that a primary role of the North American region was the provision of strategic reserves. Canada might be called upon to assume additional responsibility towards this end in view of the heavy United States commitments abroad.

In considering the kind of equipment that might be produced in Canada our own military requirements must be kept in mind. There were a number of weapons, such as rocket launchers, which could be produced in Canada and for which there was a Canadian as well as a European requirement.

It might be that the most useful contribution would be in weapons of U.K. design which could be made available immediately to European countries and subsequently replaced here by weapons of U.S. design to be produced either in Canada, the United States or both countries. For instance, the Canadian Army held most of the mobilization stores for two divisions. This was all U.K.-pattern equipment. At present Belgium was equipping two of her divisions with U.K.-type weapons and the third with U.S.-type weapons. It would be sensible to work out some arrangement whereby the third division was equipped with U.K.-type weapons from Canadian sources which would be replaced here with U.S.-type weapons. Another possible contribution would be to send the present Vampire aircraft to European countries and replace them with F-86's from home production, as these became available. Again, there were a number of anti-aircraft guns and mobilization stores which were urgently required and could be put to immediate use in Europe. These could be replaced by weapons of new design from North American sources of production.

5. The Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that little progress had been made with previous proposals to make U.K.-type weapons available to European countries and replace them with U.S.-type weapons produced in Canada and the United States, because any such proposal involved the expenditure of a considerable amount of money which it had not been certain would be available for this purpose. If general provision were made by the Canadian Government for the production of equipment, then some suitable scheme could probably be worked out.

With regard to the question of production, it was pointed out that there was very little surplus capacity in Canada at present and this appeared to be chiefly in lines for which there was no urgent European requirement. Production of high priority equipment could not be entered into until there was more specific information on requirements. There was already expanded surplus capacity in the case of the F-86 and Canuck aircraft. However, neither of these types was at present required by European countries.

6. The Minister of National Defence suggested that we would be unable to find the necessary manpower for substantially increased military production without curtailing civilian production.

If quantities of U.K.-type equipment held in Canada were made available to European countries who needed it urgently to equip forces already in being, then arrangements should be started immediately to replace this equipment with new types, probably of U.S. design, and it should be pointed out that such a step would affect Canada's present ability to mobilize forces in accordance with commitments made.

7. Mr. Wilgress said that he thought it would be satisfactory if, at the Deputies meeting on August 28th, it could be indicated that Canada was taking steps to speed up productive facilities. He suggested that the first step should be the provision of funds and pointed out the tendency, which was increasing, to compare defence expenditures of various countries as percentages of national income. While it was admitted that this was not a valid basis of comparison, if the figures for a country were substantially lower than for most others this would suggest its defence expenditures might be increased. There appeared to be some advantage in contributing to a global source for equipment to be used in North Atlantic Treaty Organization defence. Not only would it have a good psychological effect, but it would probably prove cheaper to provide a lump sum than to meet requests for individual contributions of various types of equipment as the end-item task forces of the M.P.S.B. made known the requirements.

8. The Minister of Finance agreed that the initial expression of Canadian willingness to contribute to the common security should be in terms of an appropriation.

While it was not desirable at this stage to separate what was being done strictly on behalf of Canadian defence from any contribution that might be made to other countries in the way of equipment, it would be necessary to reach some sort of total in order to determine what plans, if any, should be made for general control of the economy.

9. The Cabinet, after further discussion,

(a) noted the report of the Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom on the recent meeting of the North Atlantic Council Deputies;

(b) agreed that the Minister of National Defence prepare a draft statement for presentation to the Council Deputies when they next met, indicating the steps being taken or presently planned to be taken to increase Canada's total effective combat forces over and above those planned for July 1, 1951;

(c) agreed that the Secretary to the Cabinet, in consultation with the members of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions and the Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom, prepare a draft statement for presentation to the Council Deputies when they next met, indicating what steps Canada was prepared to consider to assist in meeting the high priority deficiencies of European countries in military equipment.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, August 11, 1950

Dear Mr. Reid,

Mr. Heeney wrote to me on 10th July proposing that R.C.A.F. fighter squadrons should, in rotation, beginning next Spring, acquire additional training experience at a R.A.F. fighter station in the United Kingdom. In this connection, he also suggested that the United Kingdom authorities might be interested in having some air navigators trained in Canada. He proposed that the whole idea might be discussed in London with Air Vice-Marshal Miller while he was there.

I have now been asked to inform you that the United Kingdom Government cordially welcome the proposal that a R.C.A.F. fighter squadron should be stationed in the United Kingdom from the Spring of 1951 to undertake operational training with the R.A.F., and they agree that questions of ways and means and other detailed arrangements should be pursued in discussions at the staff level. The Air Ministry were very glad to have the initial discussions with Air Vice-Marshal Miller while he was in London.

The United Kingdom Government are extremely interested in the possibility of air navigators for the R.A.F. being trained in Canada and feel that this is one of the points that could usefully be included in the discussions at staff level.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

SECRET Ottawa, August 12, 1950

My dear Colleague,

I refer to the attached draft telegram[51] to the United Kingdom on air training which was sent to me by your secretary on August 8.

I am rather intrigued by the idea of an enlarged air training scheme. I should think it would be a form of mutual aid which would be popular in the country and, as I understand the situation, there is a very great shortage among North Atlantic Treaty countries of air training facilities.

I wonder, however, whether, in view of the increasing urgency of the international situation, the scheme might not be considered on a somewhat different, and perhaps broader, basis than is proposed in your draft telegram; whether, for example, we might not enlarge the offer of training facilities previously made to all North Atlantic countries, suggesting that, where feasible, reciprocal training arrangements would be welcomed as a form of mutual aid. For our part, expenditures on training facilities for other NATO countries might be met out of any mutual aid appropriation which may be approved by Parliament. I suggest that something of this sort might be worth examining.

Time would, of course, be required to work out a scheme of this sort, and I would not wish to delay completion of any arrangements you may wish to make with United Kingdom authorities for the provision of facilities there for R.C.A.F. training. I am, therefore, prepared to forward the telegram as drafted, if you wish me to do so.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 199-50 Ottawa, August 17, 1950

APPROVED STATEMENT TO BE DELIVERED BY THE CANADIAN DEPUTY AT A FUTURE MEETING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL DEPUTIES ON THE SUBJECT OF THE PRODUCTION IN CANADA OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

1. The Canadian Government has already acted to step up the production of military equipment in Canada. It is greatly increasing its defence production programme, particularly in aircraft, naval vessels, armament, and ammunition. Thus, the planned production rates of the CF-100, the all-weather jet fighter developed in Canada; of the F-86 fighter interceptor; of the Orenda jet engine, have been markedly increased. Canadian anti-aircraft equipment is being modified to modern design, and ammunition production in Canadian arsenals is being increased. The planned programme for production of escort vessels and minesweepers is being accelerated and Canada is bringing into commission naval vessels held in reserve. The decisions already taken by the Government to step up the defence effort will result, in the coming year, in an increase of about 40% in Canadian defence expenditure over that reported to the Defence Financial and Economic Committee as having been originally estimated for the current year.[52]

2. The Canadian Government believes that it has taken useful action, in keeping with the needs of the moment. The presently-planned production represents a very considerable increase over the pre-Korean programme, but it is recognized that more is required to be done to meet the heavy needs of North Atlantic defence. In the second World War Canada was a vital and important source of munitions and war supplies for its allies, providing them with 70% of what it produced. Canada is capable of producing even greater quantities in another war, as its industry has been steadily expanding in the last ten years. In normal times, however, Canada is not an important producer of munitions and military equipment, mainly because the requirements of the Canadian Services are not great in relation to what the Canadian industry is capable of producing.

3. In addition to the existing production lines, there are some standby arsenal facilities. There is also some, but not much, unused capacity in commercial industry. Canadian industry generally is working at peak output. Details have been reported to the Military Production and Supply Board.

4. There is a practical barrier to the immediate use of these last two categories — standby facilities and unused commercial capacity. It is that before starting new production lines it is necessary to know what specific types, not merely what broad categories, are most needed. Some contracts can be let to cover Canada's own requirements and this is being done. But effective utilization of Canadian productive capacity for North Atlantic purposes, depends upon determining the precise types that are most wanted and which Canada is capable of producing efficiently. Then a year or more might be required for the new production of major type equipment, particularly if it calls for new tooling.

5. The Canadian Government is aware that an important role to be played by Canada in collective North Atlantic defence is the supply of military equipment. It accepts these responsibilities and proposes to take the essential first steps to realize this objective. Therefore, the Canadian Government proposes to recommend to Parliament when it reassembles this autumn the passing of an appropriation of $300,000,000 for the specific purpose of financing the provision of additional military equipment, for the needs both of the Canadian armed forces and for those of other North Atlantic countries. This appropriation might cover other aspects of mutual aid such as the provision of training facilities for other North Atlantic countries.

6. Part of this appropriation will be used for further expansion of existing production lines in Canada of certain types of high priority equipment which the Standing Group has indicated are in such great deficiency that any new production can make a most valuable contribution to North Atlantic defence.

7. In view of the seriousness of the international situation, and in view of the time required to get new production going, the Canadian Government proposes to recommend to Parliament that part of the appropriation be used to make available a large part of those stocks of new Army equipment which have been held in reserve for mobilization purposes. The Canadian Government has in mind offering immediately armament and ancillary equipment, including ammunition, of the order of that required for one infantry division. This equipment could be made available immediately and free of charge at Canadian seaboard to any North Atlantic country or countries after consultation with the appropriate North Atlantic agency. This offer is made on the assumption that arrangements can be made for early replacement and in the procurement of some items we shall need the cooperation of the United States. Moreover, if satisfactory arrangements for replacement can be made, similar equipment for a second division and for corps troops could progressively be made available.

8. Further steps to be taken to initiate the production in Canada of high priority military equipment, including the diversion of civilian industrial capacity to military purposes, will probably have to await the results of the investigations of the end-item task forces which are being set up by the Military Production and Supply Board. It is essential that we should know what types of military equipment Canada can most effectively produce for the defence of the whole North Atlantic Community. The passing of the appropriation to which I have referred will enable the Canadian authorities to deal promptly with the recommendations of the task forces without the delay involved in waiting for the necessary financial authorization.

9. While various articles of equipment are in process of production, the Canadian Government would be ready to consult with appropriate North Atlantic agencies in order to assist it in determining what share of the resulting end-products should be allocated to the Canadian armed forces and what share should be allocated to other North Atlantic countries. Within the limits of the appropriations approved by Parliament, the Canadian Government would transfer to a European member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that share of the Canadian production allocated to that country on the basis that the Canadian Government would bear the cost of the Canadian content entering into the end-product and the other North Atlantic Governments would bear the cost of the content contributed by their countries to the production of the end-product. The Canadian Government would be responsible for the costs of delivering the equipment to the Canadian seaboard. The Canadian Government might wish to request reciprocal arrangements for obtaining defence equipment and facilities from countries to which it would be providing equipment and facilities on the above basis.[53]

TELEGRAM 1588 London, August 21, 1950

Your telegram No. 1175 of 17th August,† Canadian representation on end item task forces.

1. It is not possible to say at this time whether the time table for setting up task forces will be adhered to. In Gill's opinion the schedule is far too tight and it is quite impracticable to contemplate one task force commencing their operations on August 25th and four others on August 30th. However, the Chairman of the PWS who is under pressure from his authorities to get the task forces going, is reluctant to agree to any postponement. All sorts of complications are arising. Representatives of certain European countries are pressing for membership on task forces and claiming that in so doing they are carrying out the instructions of their Governments. Security problems are arising which if not solved will tend to handicap the task forces in their work or at least delay their starting time. It is difficult to foresee that these difficulties will be overcome in the course of a few days particularly when the PWS is fully occupied on the Deputies project. However, as we have said, it is intended to adhere to the schedule agreed to last week.

[53] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 16 août 1950 étant entendu que les crédits de 300 millions de dollars s'étendraient sur 18 mois et que le coût du matériel supplémentaire transféré aux autres pays de l'OTAN serait déduit de cette somme.
Approved by Cabinet on August 16, 1950 with the understanding that the 300 million dollar appropriation was to cover a period of 18 months and that equipment transferred to other North Atlantic countries would be deducted from it.

2. In an effort to persuade European countries to be reasonable about their demands for membership the United States, United Kingdom and Canada did not press for membership. This had some effect but the composition of the task forces as now proposed is somewhat larger than we hoped for, and is a little heavy in European representation while the composition of task forces other than combat aircraft is not finally settled. It looks as though we will serve only on the ammunition and explosives task force, but there is a possibility that Brophy[54] will be elected to serve on the electronics task force. This would be acceptable to the United States who are not proposed for inclusion. The matter should be decided soon and we will advise you without delay. In the meantime we cannot recommend that Brophy should arrive here for August 30th. It would be our suggestion that he hold himself in readiness to arrive on a week's notice. It would also be our suggestion that you do not look for someone to serve on the transport vehicles task force. The United States will have a member on this and it would not appear necessary to have two members from North America.

3. Gill is genuinely concerned that the PWS will set up task forces with inadequate preparations. The blending of Canada-United States requirements and production figures with those of the European countries takes some time and no allowance has been made in the time schedule for this to be done. He will continue to press for a slower pace in setting them up and a faster pace in execution by having the task forces smaller in size.

Your telegram No. 1588 of August 21.

1. Canadian representation on MPSB task forces was discussed with Pierce, who, while appreciating Gill's motives in not pushing Canadian candidacy on task forces, feels strongly that we should insist on representation on all three task forces in fields in which Canada can make a substantial contribution; i.e., transport vehicles, ammunition and explosives, and electronics. To last two, we have already named our representatives both of whom are very well qualified.

Reginald McLaren Brophy, President and Managing Director, Rogers Majestic Ltd., DeForest Radio Ltd., and Rogers Electronic Tubes Ltd.

2. Brophy plans to leave August 23 for a few days in Holland on private business, and before coming to London will get in touch with Gill. General MacQueen's[55] present plans are to leave for London by air on August 27, arriving August 28. Please confirm as soon as you can that both will be required and that both task forces will commence within a few days of August 30, or not more than two or three days later.

3. Although we have not yet named a representative to transport vehicles task force, you might point to Canadian production record during the last war, when more than 1 million vehicles were produced, mostly for our allies, as reason why we should be included.

4. Considering our production capabilities, representation on three out of twelve task forces seems to us modest and fully justified.

Aide-mémoire du ministère des Affaires extérieures à l'ambassade des États-Unis

Aide Mémoire from Department of External Affairs to Embassy of United States

SECRET Ottawa, August 21, 1950

The Canadian Government has considered your Aide Mémoire of July 25, 1950, concerning increases in the defence programme of your Government, and shares with the United States Government the view that the present international situation requires urgent action by all North Atlantic Treaty countries to improve their individual and collective capacity to resist armed aggression. Accordingly, the Canadian Government during the past weeks has been actively re-examining its defence and defence production policies, and, since July 1, action has been taken to strengthen Canada's armed forces and general defence position.

The Active Forces (Navy, Army and Air Force) are being increased above the present strength of 48,000 and establishment of 50,000 by recruiting and training additional personnel to build up the effective forces in being as rapidly as possible.

For this purpose, establishments have already been increased by 40%.

As a consequence it is expected that Canadian Fighting Services will be increased by at least 40% by July 1, 1951. These increases will permit us to double the operational activities of the Navy, Army and Air Force.

In the Navy, more ships will be taken out of reserve, commissioned and brought up to war strength. Aircraft and ammunition for the Fleet will be brought up to war complement. The programme of modernization of destroyers and other ships is being accelerated.

In the Army, a Special Force, consisting of a brigade group, has been enrolled and is being trained to carry out Canada's international undertakings under the [55] Le major-général John Henry MacQueen, président de Canadian Arsenals Ltd.

Major-General John Henry MacQueen, President of Canadian Arsenals Ltd.

United Nations Charter or North Atlantic Treaty. The present airborne brigade group and the anti-tank regiment and other formations are being brought up to war establishments. Anti-aircraft guns are being modernized and the most modern anti-tank weapons manufactured or obtained.

In the Air Force, training facilities for air and ground crew are being increased and personnel and equipment for 28 squadrons at war strengths will be built up as rapidly as possible. Facilities for training air crew, including those of the United Kingdom and other North Atlantic Treaty nations are being further expanded.

The appropriation for the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, is $425,000,000. Other government expenditures directly contributing to defence, including building construction, atomic energy, aviation research, etc., total another $120,000,000, bringing the present authorized total expenditures for defence purposes to about $545,000,000. Acceleration of the programme approved since Korea will amount to more than $100,000,000 for the balance of the current fiscal year and more than $200,000,000 in a full year. Total expenditures for the fiscal year 1951-52 under programmes already authorized will thus be of the order of $750,000,000. We estimate that in the next three years total Canadian expenditures on defence will be about $3,000,000,000.

The Government has been urgently examining the problem of stepping up production of defence equipment both for Canadian needs and for supplying other North Atlantic Treaty countries and it is proposed to recommend to Parliament at the forthcoming session a special appropriation for these purposes.

The Government has also decided to re-equip Canadian Army units with United States type equipment, if this is feasible. At present the Canadian Army has on hand reserve stocks for mobilization purposes amounting to equipment required for two infantry divisions with supporting corps troops. It is proposed to make available immediately as mutual aid to North Atlantic countries armament and ancillary equipment, including ammunition, of the order of that required for one infantry division. This offer is being made on the assumption that arrangements can be made for early replacement, and in the procurement of some items we shall need the co-operation of the United States. Moreover, if satisfactory arrangements for replacement can be made, similar equipment for a second division and for corps troops could progressively be made available. The Canadian representative on the North Atlantic Council Deputies is being instructed to make this offer known to the Council Deputies. In the meantime, it is understood that informal discussions regarding the possibility of replacements are being held between Canadian and United States military authorities.

The expansion and acceleration of our defence programme will, of course, require the approval of Parliament. It has, accordingly, been decided that Parliament should be summoned as soon as feasible for consideration of the Government's revised defence and production programmes as described above. Meantime, the figures mentioned above are, of course, secret and should in no circumstances be made public.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: Yesterday afternoon I saw Harrington (in the absence of the U.S. Ambassador) and handed him two aides mémoire, the first in reply to the U.S. Embassy's aide mémoire of July 25th concerning acceleration of North Atlantic defence programmes and the other in reply to their aide mémoire of August 12th concerning the need of additional ground forces for Korea.[56]

2. The reply to the U.S. aide mémoire of July 25th was based upon decisions reached by the Cabinet in discussions which have taken place during the past two weeks of proposals for the expansion of the Canadian defence and defence production programmes. These discussions eventually focussed upon the statement to be made by Wilgress at the North Atlantic Deputies meeting on August 25th when, as you know, each Deputy will be expected to describe in specific terms the steps which his Government will take to strengthen North Atlantic defence. Wilgress was in attendance throughout these discussions.

3. The net result of the plans approved by Cabinet and embodied in the instructions Wilgress has now taken to London will mean an increase of some forty percent in the strength of our armed forces within the next year and increased expenditure on defence above current Budget figures of about the same percentage. These plans will be laid before Parliament when it meets in the very near future.

4. The reply to the U.S. aide mémoire of July 25th after describing the plans referred to in my previous paragraph goes on to say that Wilgress has been instructed to offer at the North Atlantic Deputies meeting on August 25th U.K. type equipment for one infantry division as Canadian Mutual Aid to North Atlantic countries; this on the assumption that arrangements can be made for early replacement by U.S. types which will require the co-operation of the United States. Similar equipment for a second division and corps troops could progressively be made available if satisfactory replacement arrangements could be made. I told Harrington that an appropriation of three hundred million dollars will be asked of Parliament to cover this part of the Canadian programme. As you will see, it is based on the Government's intention to re-equip the Canadian Army with U.S. types, if this proves feasible.

5. The reply to the U.S. aide mémoire of August 12th concerning ground forces for Korea describes the progress made in assembling the Canadian Army Special Force and indicates that the force is likely to be available at a relatively early date and that Canadian Military Authorities are now examining with the Unified Command the possibility of having the brigade's training completed outside of Canada, in close proximity to the actual area of conflict in Korea.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEPUTIES

Following for Heeney from Wilgress, Begins: At its meeting on 22nd August, the North Atlantic Council Deputies agreed to circulate and to discuss the replies which the United States Government had received to its communication of July 24th and 25th regarding increased defence efforts. Accordingly it will now be necessary to submit a different and more detailed statement before August 28th in response to the Deputies resolution of August 4th. This requirement is set out in paragraphs four and five of document No. 18 — revised D-D/18, dated 4th August.† If you agree, I should like to submit the following memorandum in reply to this resolution. It is possible that some of the data used in the preparation of this memorandum are incorrect. I should appreciate if you would check the figures, particularly those giving the number of aircraft, correct any figures that are wrong, and insert figures requested as follows:

(a) Paragraph 5—strength of brigade group including reinforcements

(b) Paragraph 5—present strength of reserve forces and estimated build-up of reserve forces.

2. Proposed text of memorandum to Mr. Spofford, Begins:

NATO—TOP SECRET—Dated 26 August, 1950

Dear Mr. Spofford,

In accordance with the Resolution of the North Atlantic Council of Deputies of August 4th, I consulted with my Government regarding the steps being taken and those planned to be taken to increase by 1st July 1951 Canada's total combat forces for the defence of the North Atlantic area.

3. In its aide mémoire of August 21st, the Canadian Government informed the Government of the United States of the steps it had taken and proposed to take to strengthen Canada's armed forces and general defence position. I forwarded a copy of the aide mémoire to you on August 23rd together with a statement informing you of the Canadian Government's plans for the production of military equipment. These two documents show the steps which have been taken and those planned to be taken to increase Canada's total combat forces and to provide the necessary backing of training and equipment. Although these plans are not related to the precise date of 1st July 1951, it is expected that the greater part of them will be implemented by that time.

4. In general, planned increases in manpower, equipment, training facilities and finance should permit us to double the operational activities of the three services by 1st July 1951. In so far as it is possible to do so, the following shows the extent to which present plans for the increase in forces will be implemented by 1st July 1951.

5. The active forces (Navy, Army and Air Force) are being increased above their present strengths of 48,000 to approximately 70,000 and an additional brigade group is being formed with a strength including reinforcements of about (figure to be inserted). An accelerated recruiting programme has been undertaken to increase the strength of the reserve forces from about (figure to be inserted) to approximately (figure to be inserted). This increase in personnel will be reflected in the Navy, Army and Air Force as follows.

6. Army:

(a) The active forces airborne brigade will be brought up to war strength.

(b) One additional brigade group, for operations under the United Nations Charter or North Atlantic Treaty, will be formed. Composition:

Brigade headquarters,
Three infantry battalions,
One field regiment of artillery,
Supporting arms and services.

(c) Build-up of reserve army formations and units.

7. Air Force:

(a) The number of operational aircraft in existing active and reserve force squadrons will be increased and new squadrons formed. This will give an increase of 118 operational aircraft by 1st July 1951.

(b) In addition, present plans provide for a further increase of 226 front-line aircraft as soon as possible after 1st July 1951, or a total increase of 344 front-line aircraft.

8. Navy:

One cruiser will be brought from training to operational state and on one aircraft carrier new type of aircraft is being provided and the front-line strength increased by forty aircraft. Two additional destroyers, two frigates and one minesweeper are being brought out of reserve, commissioned and brought up to war strength. The programme to re-equip the destroyers with the latest types of guns, anti-submarine equipment and radar is being accelerated and the naval construction programme has been increased from nine to twenty-five ships of which the majority will be minesweepers and escorts.

Proposed text of memorandum to Mr. Spofford ends.

9. If the memorandum which I propose to send to Mr. Spofford does not reflect accurately the plans for increasing Canada's defence preparations by 1st July 1951, I would appreciate if you would provide me, by August 26th, with a more accurate one, set out along the general lines of my memorandum. Ends.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 1607 of August 24, North Atlantic Deputies.

Your memorandum, with the revisions listed below, is an accurate reflection of plans for increasing defence preparations by July 1, 1951, subject, of course, to Parliamentary approval. It may therefore be submitted in response to the Deputies resolution of August 4.

Following are revisions made by Department of National Defence.

Paragraphs 1 and 2, no change.

Paragraph 3. Last sentence. Delete "the greater part of them will be implemented", and add in its place, "implementation will be well advanced".

Paragraph 4, no change.

Paragraph 5. First sentence will read " ... and an additional brigade group is being formed with a strength including reinforcements of about 10,000". Second sentence will read " ... the strength of the reserve forces from about 48,000 to approximately 68,500".

Paragraph 6(b). After the words "one additional brigade group", add "totalling approximately 10,000". The sentence will then continue "for operations under the United Nations, etc.".

Paragraph 7(b). Delete at words beginning "In addition" and ending "front-line aircraft". Replace with the following "In addition, present plans provide for a further increase of 227 front-line aircraft, and replacement of piston-engine fighters as soon as possible after July 1, 1951, or a total increase of 345 front-line jet aircraft".

Paragraph 8. Add the following sentence at the beginning of the paragraph, "No new type of aircraft is being provided for front-line strength. It is intended to maintain existing squadrons; namely, two anti-submarine squadrons, two fighter squadrons, and one training squadron. However, the reserve of aircraft will be increased by twelve Sea Furies." Delete sentence beginning "One cruiser will be brought ... " down to " ... forty aircraft." Delete sentence beginning "two additional destroyers"

ADDITIONAL CANADIAN DEFENCE PROCUREMENT AND NORTH ATLANTIC MUTUAL AID

Yesterday afternoon, while Towe was talking to a junior officer at the Canadian Desk in State Department, it was suggested to Towe that there would be serious difficulties in carrying out the Canadian program as outlined in the two aide mémoires dated August 21st, as there might be some doubt about the availability of United States equipment either for the Special Force or to replace the equipment to be made available as mutual aid to North Atlantic countries.

Today Matthews and Towe discussed this matter with Benninghoff and Vass. Vass stated that there should be no difficulty concerning the equipment for the Special Force since the highest priority would be given to the requirements of any ground troops for Korea. He said that he believed this priority would be given even if the official request to State Department was qualified by saying that it was the intention of the Government to use the force in Korea subject to approval by Parliament.

In so far as the replacement of armament and equipment transferred as mutual aid was concerned, Vass said that availability would be a problem. He obviously is impressed with the desirability of making it possible for the proposal to be carried out. He believes that since it achieves two purposes (a) Standardization between Canadian and American Forces, and (b) The provision of additional equipment for Europe, the possibility of obtaining a reasonably high priority is good. On the basis of the aide mémoire he is going to discuss the problem at a meeting of the Foreign Aid Co-ordinating Committee early next week.

REFERENCE ADDITIONAL CANADIAN DEFENCE PROCUREMENT AND NORTH ATLANTIC MUTUAL AID

1. In our WA-1913 of August 25th, we gave a brief report of an informal discussion with Vass and officers of the Canadian Desk of the State Department, on the subject of Canadian mutual aid. The talk at this stage was purely informal and tentative and related mainly to the question of according Canada a high priority in obtaining United States type replacements for the military equipment of United Kingdom type which it is proposed to make available to the appropriate North Atlantic Treaty body. From earlier conversations we had learned that, as at least some of the United States type equipment which we might obtain would be placed in our reserve stocks, shipments to Canada might be given a relatively low priority — the equipment needs of European Treaty countries for their existing forces might be met before those of Canada. As reported, Vass undertook to bring the question to the attention of the Foreign Military Assistance Co-ordinating Committee (FMACC) at its next meeting.

2. Vass informed us this morning that the Canadian problem had been discussed in the FMACC meeting yesterday and that the reception given to our special position was highly favourable. It was the FMACC understanding, in accordance with the terms of the aide mémoire and with Mr. Wilgress' statement to the Council of Deputies, that Canada was prepared to purchase United States equipment, presumably under the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, for the purpose of replacement. On the basis of these assumptions, the FMACC directed General Lemnitzer to report to the Committee on the priority which could be given to shipments of United States military equipment to Canada. As we understand it, he was specifically asked to report when United States type equipment could be shipped to Canada to replace United Kingdom type equipment which we would offer to our North Atlantic Treaty partners, on the assumption that we were transferring the United Kingdom type of equipment free of charge and would be willing to pay for the equipment obtained from the United States.

3. Vass, however, also mentioned that Lemnitzer had informed the FMACC that he, (Lemnitzer), had received a letter from "a Canadian General", (unspecified), to the effect that Canada was thinking in terms of providing our European Treaty partners with equipment for two divisions if the United States would let us have, free of charge, equipment for, say, one division. Such an arrangement, Vass said, would not appear to be in accord with the aide mémoire or with Mr. Wilgress' statement which made no mention of such conditions. It was explained to Vass that we have had no instructions to raise these problems with United States authorities; nor have we received any information additional to that contained in the aide mémoire handed to Mr. Harrington and in the statement made to the Council of Deputies by Mr. Wilgress.

4. As the United States authorities may be expected to seek further information on the suggestions raised by Lemnitzer in the FMACC, further guidance from you would be useful as to the line we should take. A barter arrangement, such as the one alleged to have been suggested to Lemnitzer, would appear to raise certain legal complications as Canada has not requested grant assistance under the MDAA and therefore, under the terms of the Act, unless a request is made, cannot receive such assistance. Nor is there any obvious indication in the aide mémoire that we might be expecting the United States to purchase our United Kingdom type equipment for shipment to Europe. It is probable that some financial arrangements will have to be made with the United States to overcome the drain on our United States dollar reserves, resulting from increased defence purchases in the United States for replacing the United Kingdom type equipment and for equipping additional Canadian forces. It occurs to me that we might make better progress by exploring with the United States authorities the possibilities of increased United States defence purchases in Canada, both for United States defence establishment and for MDAP account, as means of alleviating the foreign exchange problem which may be created by any further extensive Canadian purchases of equipment in the United States.

END ITEM TASK FORCES

1. Reference my telegram No. 1623 of August 25th,† the PWS/MPSB at yesterday's meeting reviewed the question of task force organization in the light of the following consideration:

(a) That there is extreme urgency in setting up end item task forces and that no appreciable delay can be accepted.

(b) That they need basic data which is not now available to us in order to accomplish their mission.

2. After consultation with the military side of NATO in London the PWS have confirmed that more detailed information on deficiencies cannot be expected for a matter of some weeks. It has, therefore, been decided to set up the task forces, giving them Standing Group estimate of deficiencies broken down in as much detail as possible by narrow categories, (further details have now been received through United States channels from Standing Group), and ask them to proceed with their work in stages.

3. In stage I they would be asked to survey production capacities in European countries and recommend any adjustments they think should be made in the recommendations that the PWS made to the Deputies for stepping up production quickly. There is plenty of scope for adjustment for reasons we explained in telegram No. 1628 of August 26th.† In the course of this work they would be expected to make whatever additional recommendations they can, within the limitations imposed upon them by lack of data as to types, etc., for further increasing production. They would, in addition, familiarize themselves with NATO production problems and generally lay the groundwork for the second stage of their operations.

4. In stage II they would recommend ways and means of increasing production to meet deficiencies, as originally contemplated. Whether stage II will follow immediately after stage I or whether there will be a recess is left open for the moment. It will depend on how long they take to survey capacities and when more detailed information about deficiencies will become available to the PWS.

5. The PWS also agreed on the convening dates and the composition of the remaining eight task forces. Details are as follows:

Category	Member Provided By	Convening Date
B. Artillery	France United States United Kingdom	September 6th
C. Ammunition-Explosives	Belgium United States France Italy	September 13th
D. Electronic	Netherlands Norway Canada United Kingdom	September 6th
E. Combat Vehicles	France United Kingdom United States	September 11th
F. Small Arms	Belgium United States Italy	September 13th
G. Engineering Equipment	Belgium United Kingdom United States	September 18th
H. Transport Vehicles	Italy Canada United States	September 11th
I. Shipbuilding	France Italy Netherlands United Kingdom	September 18th

6. We realize that this is not strictly in line with your instructions and that it is a reversal of the position previously reported. One reason for the change is that the United States decided that since the recommendations of task forces were likely to form a basis for aid, they should be represented on them all (except shipbuilding). They were willing however to accept Brophy in lieu of a United States representative on electronics, and in return for this we withdrew from ammunition and explosives in their favour. As the present allotment might raise complications since the Canadian representative has already been selected for ammunition and explosives and not for transport vehicles, Gill stated in PWS meeting that Canada might have difficulty in changing from the one to the other and might have to ask to be reinstated on the ammunition task force. We hope, however, that the present arrangement will be satisfactory and would appreciate your comments on this point as soon as possible.

7. The United States representative on the transport vehicles task force is from Ford International, and if we are going to industry for our man he should possibly be selected from another company.

8. Brophy has been working at Canada House for the past two days familiarizing himself with the general position in the electronics field. He is formulating some ideas as to how the problem should be tackled with the rather sketchy information they will have to work on and he will probably be in a position to make a very useful contribution when the task force convenes.

1. We have no objection to present U.S. representation on task forces, but we question the need for Italy to be represented on four task forces while we are on only two.

2. In spite of your difficulties, which are fully appreciated here, it will be necessary for Gill to insist, on Mr. Howe's instructions, for Canadian representation on the ammunition explosive task force on the understanding that we are withdrawing our request for membership on the transport vehicles task force. The membership of Brophy on the electronics force should not be affected. It might be worthwhile mentioning, in support of MacQueen's candidature, that he is not a private industrialist but the head of the Government-owned Canadian Arsenals Limited.

3. It is important that we receive early advice confirming acceptance of our nominee for the ammunition explosives task force to facilitate his making travel arrangements.

4. With regard to information of possible use to Brophy, we have just learned that the data enclosed with our despatch No. 2295 of August 19† is not as complete or accurate as it should be. A further compilation is being made for transmission to London as soon as it is ready, which is likely to be about September 8. NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL DEPUTIES

1. Clark and I dined with Spofford on September 1st in his suite at Claridges. Achilles of the State Department and Lincoln Gordon, formerly of ECA, were also there. I believe that, apart from hospitality, one of the reasons for the invitation was to have the opportunity of questioning us about our increased defence efforts. We were able to supply useful background information, and in particular, Clark gave Spofford details about the organization of our defence forces.

2. Later in the evening Spofford asked Achilles to read from a telegram which had been received from Washington. This telegram gave a critical analysis of Canadian defence expenditures. Spofford warned that this was merely an exercise undertaken by certain of their economists and he did not want us to take the statements too seriously, but he would like to know what we had to say in rebuttal.

3. I was able to take some rough notes of the telegram which Achilles read out, and these notes show that the arguments of the economists ran somewhat along the following lines:

4. The Canadian defence expenditures could be expanded by as much as a further 50 per cent and, at the same time, allow for:

(1) 6 per cent increase per capital consumption by 1953 as compared with 1949;

(2) Maintenance of civilian investment at approximately the present percentage of gross national product (21 per cent); and

(3) An absolute rise of about 9 per cent in non-military Government expenditure, which would be somewhat less than the estimated rise of gross national product.

The $3 billion to be spent on defence during the next three years worked out at 5 per cent of gross national product or 6 per cent of national income for the same period. Translated into U.S. dollars, this total amount is equivalent to $2,730 million (U.S.), which contrasts with the estimate of the State Department of $4,212 million (U.S.) for Canada's domestic military potential, which would represent 8 per cent of the estimated gross national product, or 9.5 per cent of the national income.

5. In replying, I pointed out that the percentage of gross national product or national income of the estimated defence expenditure was 1 per cent less than we had been working on, but this is probably due to the United States economists having made their estimates on the basis of forecasts over the three year period. I then went on to repeat what I had heard the Prime Minister say in Council — that if Canada raised over 20 per cent of the national income in federal taxation and devoted one third of the revenue so collected to defence, we were doing about as much as the people of Canada could be reasonably expected to bear in peacetime. I then explained that it was wrong to compare the percentage of gross national product or national income devoted for defence purposes in the case of a country like Canada with that of a well-developed, thickly settled and compact country like the United States. I mentioned the heavy overhead which we have to carry by reason of our geographical situation and climate.

6. Spofford and his two colleagues expressed agreement in principle with much of what I had to say, and said that they were impressed with the steps we had taken to increase our defence effort and thought we were correct in concentrating on the production of military equipment.

7. The working party of five countries set up by the Deputies to consider the replies to the United States diplomatic approaches of July 24th/25th have been dealing with the question of comparisons of defence expenditure in relation to gross national product or national income. Canada is not a member of the working group, but Norway's representative has been taking a line very similar to our own. We had the opportunity of expounding our thesis to one of the Norwegians and he immediately saw its applicability to Norway. This is in contrast to the previous attitude of the Norwegian representative on the DFEC, who had argued that percentage on national income was the only feasible basis of comparison. The working group have reported and have not attempted to make any comparisons on the basis of national income or gross national product but have concentrated on the inadequacy of the total collective effort in relation to estimated needs.

8. While I think you should not take the analysis of the Washington economists too seriously, I am sure you will find it of interest as indicating the methods the United States is applying for judging the defence efforts of the various North Atlantic countries. I understand from Achilles that those who drew up this estimate are a group of State Department and ECA economists. No doubt Embassy in Washington would be able to identify the individuals who have been concerned with this exercise.[57]

Reference your EX-1503 repeating Wilgress' report of his talk with Spofford on September 1st about our increased defence efforts.

2. Benninghoff raised the question informally with Ignatieff in the course of a conversation on other matters, mentioning figures similar to those quoted by Wilgress as having resulted from an analysis in Washington of the comparative statistics of the increased defence expenditures authorized or projected by the respective North Atlantic Governments.

3. Ignatieff took the line that there was little profit in pursuing such a discussion of comparative NAT defence statistics at this time since the matter was under consideration by the Deputies in London and that Mr. Wilgress had already given the official views of the Canadian Government to Spofford and his other colleagues. However, he took the occasion to enquire about the purpose and nature of the statistical analysis which had been made in Washington.

4. Benninghoff recalled that it had been the understanding of the United States Administration, in requesting the Congress for a supplemental appropriation of four billion dollars to provide further foreign military assistance, that recipients of this aid would also make further efforts of self-help. Thus, the President, in his statement of August 1st,[58] had said: "I wish to make it very plain that this equipment will go forward to other countries only to supplement, and not to take the place of, their own strong efforts." Secretary Johnson had been even more explicit in his testimony before Congress when he said: "Our increased military assistance in the form of finished equipment, whether procured in the United States or elsewhere, will be geared directly to the rate at which the recipient nations raise, organize and train the expanded forces to employ this equipment."

5. The statistical analysis, therefore, has been primarily justified in order to provide Congress with information to support the request made by the Administration for increasing grant aid to NAT countries. As Canada is not a recipient of grant aid under MDAP, Benninghoff thought that the comparative statistics on the increased Canadian defence effort would be considered in relation to the requirements of North Atlantic defence planning, rather than for purposes of satisfying Congress on Canada's measures of increased self-help in connection with MDAP appropriations.

[58] Voir/See Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman 1950, Document 204, pp. 564-566.

6. I am therefore inclined to agree with Wilgress that we need not take the statistical analysis of the Washington economists too seriously as long as Canada continues not to receive grant aid from the United States under the MDAP.

7. As regards the origin of the statistics, Benninghoff indicated that while the figures for the European NAT nations had been drawn up after detailed consultation between the State Department and E.C.A., his understanding was that the Canadian statistics had been produced on a more tentative basis in the State Department itself. In fact, the figures probably originated from a study made on a low level in the Commonwealth and Northern European Division of the State Department.

My immediately preceding messages.

1. I had some discussion with Mr. Acheson last night on the Canadian defence program and the proceedings at the next meeting of the North Atlantic Council.

2. In reply to an enquiry, I outlined the decisions taken by the Government for an expansion of the Canadian armed forces and for mutual aid to other N.A.T. countries, saying that it was expected that over the next three years Canadian defence expenditure would average about $1 billion a year. I told him that the Government was being criticized from both sides, for doing too much and for doing too little, but that it seemed to me that the program now before Parliament had wide public support.

3. Mr. Acheson was inclined to query whether we could not do more than this. He enquired about the present estimates of Canadian national income, indicating that the percentage to be devoted to defence was lower than he had hoped. I made four points in answering: first, that statistical comparisons were misleading and of not substantial value; secondly, that Canada as a large, sparsely settled country had to carry heavier overhead charges than other parties to the Treaty; thirdly, that in any event it would not be possible to spend usefully larger funds in the present fiscal year; and finally, that if statistics were wanted, Canadian defence expenditure was being increased since the year 1948-49 at a sharper rate even than that of the United States. These arguments, except for the third point, did not seem to carry much conviction to his mind. I alluded in addition to our difficulties in deciding what military equipment could most usefully be manufactured in Canada.

4. Later he enquired about the possibility of Canadian forces being stationed on the continent of Europe. I said that I could only give him my personal view, but I considered that it would be unwise and unprofitable to suggest that Canadian ground forces should be so employed. The problems of maintaining a force of the size which might conceivably be furnished by Canada would be too great to make the operation worthwhile. It might be easier at some future date for a Canadian air component to be established overseas, although this was certainly not contemplated at the present time.

5. With regard to the Council meeting, we had no detailed discussion. I told Mr. Acheson that I was sure that you would like an opportunity for a brief talk with him on September 14th before the Council assembled. He said that he had a very heavy program for that day, but would try to arrange it.

6. He mentioned that yesterday afternoon the French Ambassador had come to him with an urgent message from Mr. Schuman seeking information on the dollar amount of mutual aid that would be given to France under the mutual assistance program. Mr. Schuman had telegraphed saying that it was impossible to settle the French defence program before the Council's meeting without receiving this information. Mr. Bonnet had also put forward again the idea of a common financial pool. Mr. Acheson had told him that the idea of a common pool was quite unacceptable and that it was impossible to give the French Government any figures on their share of the military assistance funds as this would have to be worked out on the basis of military needs, availabilities, and performance.

7. We then had some discussion on the Turkish application for membership in the North Atlantic Treaty. He and Mr. Perkins both expressed what was to me a surprising confidence in the military strength of Turkey, saying that the Turkish army was stronger and more efficient than any of the West European armies. He does not want Turkey to be admitted, and he hopes that by frank talk with the Turkish Government it will be possible to satisfy them that admission to N.A.T. would not in actual fact increase their security. I suggested that the adoption by the Assembly of the plan for united action to stop aggression might go some way to meet the Turkish desire for contractual defence obligations. Mr. Acheson thought that there was little substance in the proposals for an Eastern Mediterranean treaty. He observed that while the Turco-British Treaty was still in effect, the Franco-Turkish Treaty was no longer operative since it had hinged on the presence in Syria of French forces. He seemed to me not to be strongly opposed to Turkish admission to N.A.T., but to be dubious about its repercussion in other countries. He remarked that if Turkey were to join, Greece and perhaps Spain would have to come in, adding that from the point of view of effective management there were already quite enough parties to the Treaty.

8. We did not discuss two other major questions which are likely to be debated in the Atlantic Council, the establishment of West German defence forces and the setting up of an N.A.T. command organization. These matters will certainly figure in the talks with Messrs. Bevin and Schuman before the Council meeting.

Following from Wilgress, Begins: The North Atlantic Deputies met yesterday afternoon, principally to consider their report to the Council. The report was a factual survey of what had been done during the summer and was approved with minor changes.

2. Spofford then asked Deputies to give any information they could as to the progress in their countries of the high priority production programme. When my turn came, I observed that as Canada was not one of the countries being asked to undertake projects in connection with the high priority production programme, I would make no statement, but wished to make an observation after the other Deputies had reported.

3. Nearly all Deputies had some concrete Government decisions to report as to the types of orders placed under the high priority production programme, but most European Deputies referred to the financial problems which would be raised for their countries by the programme unless some measure of United States assistance were forthcoming, either directly or indirectly in the form of off-shore purchases. There was a general desire, on the part of the European Deputies, that more specific financial proposals should be formulated with the agreement of the United States. Only the United Kingdom Deputy was able to state that the high priority production projects to be undertaken by his Government would be covered by appropriations totalling 200 million pounds over the next three years.

4. I then referred to the Canadian offer of mutual aid for our North Atlantic partners and reported that, as an immediate contribution, it was the intention of the Canadian Government to transfer free of charge equipment and ammunition from our mobilization reserves of the order required for one, and ultimately 2, infantry divisions. We had, however, to have some definite understanding with the United States as to when we might expect to receive equipment replacing that which we would send to our European partners. We do not need to have replacements in our hands, but would like to be sure that from four to six months after we had transferred our present stocks, we would receive our replacement equipment. I said that at least one North Atlantic country was interested in our offer and a choice might have to be made as to how the equipment should be allocated. Stressing the value of our suggestion as a precedent, I proposed that the chairman of the Deputies should ask the military side of the organization for the Standing Group to make a recommendation as to how our mutual aid equipment should be allocated. The recommendation would come back to the Deputies for consideration before being passed to the Canadian Government. I added that we would expect the Standing Group to consult the accredited representatives of countries not represented on the Standing Group before deciding their recommendations.

5. Other Deputies agreed with our proposal. Spofford, who is not given to making remarks for the sake of politeness, called our offer a "very generous gesture" and agreed that the equipment should be allocated on the basis of need, which could only be judged from a military standpoint.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEPUTIES

Following from Wilgress, Begins: In my immediately preceding telegram reporting on yesterday's meeting of the Deputies, I mentioned the high priority production programme, which will be considered by the Council when dealing with the report from the Deputies. Although Canada is not required to report to the MPSB in connection with paragraph 9 of PWS(50)115,† nor have we been asked to participate in the projects allotted to various European countries in accordance with document D-D/35,† I think it might be useful to have prepared in Ottawa a statement that I could use in the Deputies before September 30th showing Canadian production capacity in excess of Canadian requirements by items listed in part 2 of annex B of D-D/35. I understand from General Foulkes that we are, in effect, planning production in several categories of high priority equipment for the needs of our own forces, and I should like, if it seemed appropriate at the time, to be able to volunteer this information to the Deputies when other European countries are making their reports at the end of this month. If I were to make use of this information in the Deputies, I should add, of course, that Canadian military production for the requirements of other than our own forces could only be determined after the various MPSB task forces have visited Canada this fall and made their recommendations as to what items we could produce most efficiently, and in what quantities, for our North Atlantic partners.

2. A more detailed breakdown of the list of high priority equipment given in D-D/35 is to be found in the appendices to Standing Group document SGM-243-50 of August 14th,† a copy of which was forwarded to the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee by Canadian Joint Staff, Washington with their letter CJS.119/5-1 of August 22nd.† We have External's copy with us here. Ends.

END ITEM TASK FORCES

1. It is still somewhat early to say when the Task Forces will be visiting Canada and what they will wish to see and do. However, I think it might be useful to put some thoughts down on paper even if they are only of a preliminary nature.

2. All nine Task Forces are now functioning. Their methods of approaching their work differ to some extent but fundamentally it is the same — to survey capacities in European countries and develop proposals for expanding production there — then to proceed to North America and develop proposals for overcoming remaining deficiencies.

3. In some cases, the Combat Aircraft Task Force for example, they are making a thorough examination of production facilities — almost an industrial engineering job — to ascertain bottle necks etc. which might be overcome through outside help. In others, such as the Ammunition and Explosives Task Force, the job of estimating capacities has been left to national authorities — the basis for such estimates being laid down by the Task Force.

4. The lack of more specific information about deficiencies will be felt to an increasing extent when they come to draw up their proposals. The Task Forces are counting on having more particulars about deficiencies early next month, but I am very doubtful whether this hope will be realized. We have been in touch with European Regional Planning Groups and they have indicated that there is very little prospect of having revised estimates of requirements under the Medium Term Defence Plan broken down on a national basis and giving an indication of timing and types until after the current operations of Task Forces are completed. In these circumstances, we are exhorting the Task Forces to recommend the production of specific types subject to military decision as to their acceptability. While this procedure is less satisfactory than the reverse, it seems to be the only one to follow.

5. Task Forces will likely be working in Europe until the latter part of October and present indications are that they will be visiting Canada during the period October 20th - November 15th.

6. I suggest that they should start off in Ottawa with a meeting with Mr. Allen[59] and some of his associates. In one or two cases where we have a special interest, a brief meeting with Mr. Howe would, I think, get things away to a good start if he could spare the time. For some categories there might be something to be said for representatives of industry, i.e., the members of the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association being asked to attend meetings with the Task Force in Ottawa and thus obviate the necessity for visits to widely separated units of industry. Even if this is thought to be desirable and arrangements are made, I suspect that the Task Forces will wish to visit some representative plants. If this turns out to be the case, the provision of air transportation might be considered. If we are able to offer such facilities I know it would be appreciated. France has made such an arrangement.

7. The important thing at this time is, I think, to designate someone in Ottawa to be responsible for all arrangements in connection with Task Force visits. I will notify you of their itineraries as they become firm and I should think you can count on a fortnight's notice. I will try to exercise some control at this end so they don't all descend on Ottawa at once, and this should be possible by asking some to visit Canada before the U.S., and vice versa.

8. As regards the Combat Aircraft Task Force, I pass on the impression I have gained from the U.S. Member, Mr. Peter Jensen, that they will explore the possibilities of expanding production in Canada of the F86 Fighter, the Chipmunk Trainer and possibly the Canberra. He tells me that the U.S. are now testing the Canberra and they should soon be in a position to reach a decision as to its "military adaptability". I mentioned that we would also want them to look into the CF-100 All Weather Fighter.

9. You may expect to hear from me again regarding the proposed visits of individual Task Forces with whatever information I can give you about their plans and aspirations for developing Canadian production. I shall then be more specific about the administrative arrangements that should be made.

SECRET. PERSONAL. London, September 30, 1950

Dear Bert [MacKay],

Preoccupation with End Item Task Forces has interfered with my personal correspondence.

In general, you will have gathered from my reports that Task Forces are operating reasonably well. They are working on very inadequate information on the deficiency side and the lack of agreement on the "military acceptability of types" is a very real handicap. Moreover, I am not too hopeful that early decisions will be forthcoming on this latter question. I wonder if our Chiefs of Staff have any suggestions to make to widen the area of agreement as to type acceptability. One thought that has occurred to me was that the recommendations of Task Forces for increasing production should be referred to the full Military Committee or a subcommittee especially constituted for the purpose, to enable them to decide which types proposed for production were acceptable to the individual countries.

The main purpose of this letter is to raise with you the question of getting more information than I am now getting about military supply matters which are of interest to NATO. On Syd Pierce's suggestion I have not communicated directly with Mr. Allen as he thought it would be better to standardize on the External Affairs channel. However, there are a number of questions which arise from time to time which are mainly of direct concern to Mr. Allen and perhaps it would be helpful to write him on these, but until you suggest otherwise, I shall continue to route my correspondence through External Affairs.

I should like to give you some examples of cases where I think I might have received some reports and where I would like to receive some information in future:

(a) Canadian military production programmes. I know from unofficial sources that some arrangements have been made to commence production on picrite and to make Naval guns in Sorel for the U.S., but I have no particulars. It occurs to me that when production is started up of items of military equipment which are of interest NATO-wise, I should be informed so that I may be on the look-out for opportunities to supply such equipment or material to other Pact countries.

(b) Industrial Mobilization Planning. I think it would have been useful to have had a brief report on the Washington and Ottawa meetings of the NATO I.M.P. group. There was a Planning Group report considered by the PWS at their last meeting and in the absence of any observations from Ottawa, I had to use my own judgment, which is a very bad state of affairs.

(c) Canadian offer of mutual aid. We receive a number of informal enquiries for details of our offer, which we are unable to answer. I think we should be given sufficient information so that we can answer these enquiries independently, rather than merely refer them to the Standing Group. I have today sent a telegram on this subject. I am a little worried about our apparent lack of realization that there is a good deal of administrative work in connection with a transfer of this kind — particularly if it is to be handled without causing dissatisfaction among interested countries. Surely we don't expect the Standing Group to do all the work.

(d) U.K. reaction to Canadian announcement to transfer to U.S. equipment. I learned today, by reading a letter to Syd, that Alex Clutterbuck had expressed some concern on the implications to the U.K. of our decision to transfer to U.S. type equipment, and had asked for further information on our intentions. I have arranged a meeting today between Syd Pierce and Sir Harold Parker and they will apparently discuss this matter further at that time. I am planning to attend the meeting and will probably improve my knowledge of the subject then, but I suggest that this is a matter on which this office might have been informed.

My understanding is that Syd Pierce will continue to be Canadian member on the Supply Board for the time being. I shall, therefore, arrange to send him periodic reports on PWS activities so that he will be au fait with developments here.

Anything that you can do to increase the flow of information which might be helpful to me in my work would be appreciated.

Kind regards,

Yours sincerely,
EVAN [GILL]

II. MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME; ARRANGEMENTS FOR RELEASE OF CANADIAN EQUIPMENT TO NATO AND REPLACEMENT BY U.S. TYPES

16. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, reported that the North Atlantic Council of Deputies had requested the Standing Group to recommend which countries should receive Canadian equipment to be released for use by European members of NATO. If confirmed by the Deputies, the recommendations of the Standing Group would be passed to the Canadian Government and arrangements concerning delivery would be made directly with the countries concerned.

Preliminary discussions with the U.S. military authorities had indicated that the latter considered the Canadian proposals would assist considerably in filling the serious equipment deficiencies in Western Europe. In addition, they considered the move to standardize equipment between the Canadian and U.S. forces to be most desirable and were prepared to give high priority to providing the Canadian Army with replacements of U.S. design. It was proposed that upon receipt of the recommendations of the North Atlantic Council of Deputies, and of confirmation by the government, release should be made in three phases and under the following conditions:

(a) One division's worth of armament and ancillary equipment be made available at seaboard to the countries concerned immediately.

(b) A second division's worth of armament etc. be made available at seaboard upon satisfactory arrangements being made for replacement of the first division's worth of equipment. The replacement equipment need not however be in this country.

(c) Our remaining holdings of armament, etc. be released when the first division's worth of replacement equipment is received.

Before each of these phases was undertaken the funds required for the replacement of the equipment involved, either by manufacture in Canada or by purchase from the USA, should be set aside as provided in the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950.[60]

17. The Panel, after further discussion, noted with approval the report of the Chief of the General Staff on the proposed arrangements for release of Canadian equipment to NATO and for its replacement by equipment of U.S. design.

[60] Les deux premières phases de ce programme ont été approuvées le 5 octobre 1950 par le Comité du Cabinet sur la défense.
The first two phases of this program were approved on October 5, 1950 by the Cabinet Defence Committee.

III. PRODUCTION PLANNING

18. The Chairman said that consideration should be given to the organization of responsibility for defence production planning in Canada. He suggested that a starting point might be the method of presenting claims against the $300 million voted by Parliament under the Defence Appropriation Act. Such claims could be considered initially by the Panel and referred to the Cabinet Defence Committee for final decision. However, initiative should be taken by some officer or agency at an earlier stage so that positive recommendations could be made which would expand Canadian industrial capacity in the most useful way to meet the needs of our own services, together with those of our Allies.

19. Mr. Mackenzie suggested that claims against the vote should be considered as they occurred. They would originate either as a result of Canadian demands, or demands of other NAT nations. We had already extended a general invitation to the latter to submit requirements which Canada might assist in meeting. It was impractical to initiate planning without knowledge of specific requirements for production.

20. Mr. Drury said that in certain cases, such as the release of Canadian equipment to other NATO countries and the provision of funds for training aircrew of other countries, requirements were clearly indicated. However, beyond these, it was not at all apparent how the money provided by the Defence Appropriation Act might usefully be spent in strengthening our defences and those of Western Europe. At some stage, ideas towards this end should be generated, and consideration given to the allocation of priorities against potential claims.

21. Dr. Solandt suggested that it was essential that the Canadian Government take the initiative in determining the kind of things that we would be prepared to produce for other countries. These of course would be based on our own demands, considered together with what we already know of the high priority requirements of other countries. However, consideration of Canadian service needs could not be the sole basis for determining a production programme in this country. Our present needs were not at all indicative of what might be required in the future and a programme based on them would not exploit the productive capacity of this country in the most useful way. If we took no initiative and waited for other countries to formulate specific requirements, we should probably collect a conglomeration of tag ends, resulting in a wide variety of small production items of an uneconomic nature. We should decide for ourselves in what way Canada could best increase her production.

22. Mr. Mackenzie said that, lacking knowledge of the requirements of other countries, the only basis on which we could plan at present was the needs of the Canadian Armed Forces, insofar as they were known. Further, this was a good basis on which to build as, generally speaking, we should try and increase production in those lines for which Canada would have a requirement. Until there was a clear idea of total requirements, the best we could do was to keep alive essential industries and skills so that these could be rapidly built on when the specific needs became apparent. At the present time, there was a Textile Committee, composed of representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Commercial Corporation and, occasionally, the industry, which had done useful work in planning production for National Defence in this field. Other committees to cover major fields, such as aircraft, shipbuilding, automotive vehicles, fuels and lubricants, etc. might usefully be established as soon as the Canadian service requirements were known. It was difficult to start from any other basis than that of requirements of our own force. If these were insufficient to justify production in any one field, then we could consider the possible requirements of others when these became known.

23. Mr. Plumptre suggested that the basis should be the potential of Canadian industry irrespective of the requirements of our own armed forces. If it were desirable to exploit or foster a certain type of industrial production, then service requirements might be fitted to such a programme.

24. Mr. Robertson thought that, having accomplished the objective of keeping such basic industries as aircraft and shipbuilding alive, it was now necessary that we decide how these should be built on for the combined advantage of ourselves and our allies. The effective and rapid strengthening of the defence forces of Western Europe was a matter of real concern to Canada. Any initiative we could take towards this end would, in serving the general interest, at the same time serve the Canadian interest. Publicly, and in North Atlantic Council discussions, we had stressed our historic industrial role. If a substantial part of our contribution was to be in the form of production of armaments rather than manpower, then we should take the initiative in planning increased production and it should be not too closely geared to our own requirements. Steps towards this end could be taken before specific requirements became known so that we would be in a position for instance to meet the end-item task force with a preliminary indication of the sort of production it was considered Canada could most suitably do.

25. Mr. Drury pointed out that the decision which had already been taken that tanks should not be produced in Canada had been taken quite independently of the requirements of our own defence forces. Some set of criteria should be formulated that could be applied to Canadian requirements so that the latter would not be the only basis for production planning.

26. General Foulkes said that within the high priority items as set forth by the Military Production and Supply Board, certain specific types had already been settled on. It was suggested that we pick from these five or six items which we were anxious to have produced in Canada and which it seemed sensible to make here, and ascertain whether these would be acceptable to other countries. In this way a production programme could be initiated which would strengthen ourselves and ultimately our allies.

27. Mr. Coyne raised the question of valuing equipment contributed to other NAT countries. He suggested that the cost of replacement was a completely extraneous basis for valuation.

28. Mr. Mackenzie said that a basic purpose of the legislation was the re-equipment of our own armed forces and consequently the Act required that the present estimated value of equipment contributed to other countries would go into a special account for the use of the Canadian services.

29. Mr. Robertson suggested that the appropriation was primarily intended to assist in the re-armament of Western Europe. There appeared to be endless technical difficulties in establishing any other valuation than the cost of replacement and the object of the Act would not be served by inflating the value placed on the equipment beyond what it cost to replace it.

30. Mr. Drury said that where replacements were acquired from surplus U.S. stocks, the cost would be much less than where they were acquired from current American or Canadian production. This would lead to considerable difficulties consequent upon having two sets of values.

31. General Foulkes suggested that it would be unwise to value equipment contributed to NATO and replaced from American supplies at any other figure than the actual replacement cost. To do otherwise might lead to charges that we were taking credit for a contribution larger than we had actually made.

32. Dr. Solandt suggested that valuation based on replacement costs would have the added advantage of eliminating any possibility that we were accepting gratuitous aid under the M.D.A.A.

33. Mr. Heeney said that the objective of the Defence Appropriation Act was to stimulate Canadian production so that the most effective contribution might be made with available funds to strengthening our own defences, together with those of Western Europe, and the intention was that the funds should be used for the purpose of joint defence and not exclusively for re-equipping the Canadian forces. Any method of valuation which tended to lessen the effective assistance we might make available would defeat the fundamental purpose of the Act.

34. Dr. Solandt said that as all the equipment which would be given away was equipment which would not be manufactured in Canada again it might be valued either at its original cost price to the Canadian Government or its replacement price, whichever was less.

35. Mr. Drury said that valuation on the basis suggested by Dr. Solandt would necessitate a substantial increase in the main estimates of the Department of National Defence. In a number of cases the cost price would be less than the replacement price and, as the Department of National Defence would be required to finance its requirements from new production, more money would be necessary in those cases where valuation was made on the basis of a cost price than on a replacement price.

36. The Panel, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that demands on the special fund provided under the terms of the Defence Appropriation Act for mutual aid be submitted first to the Panel and then to the Cabinet Defence Committee for approval;

(b) that defence panels should be established composed of representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce, National Defence and the Canadian Commercial Corporation to consider Canadian production policy in the following fields: aircraft, shipbuilding, vehicles, weapons, ammunition, electronics and communications, clothing and equipage, and fuels and lubricants;

(c) that, following such consideration, a number of items that were already in production in Canada or that might usefully be produced here, and that were included in the categories established by the high priority list for Western Europe, be submitted to NATO, through the Deputies, as items which Canada was prepared to consider contributing as mutual assistance;

(d) that decision regarding the valuation of Canadian equipment released to NATO be deferred pending further information regarding its probable replacement cost.

TELEGRAM 1498 Ottawa, October 4, 1950

CANADIAN DEFENCE PRODUCTION PROGRAMME

Repeat Washington EX-1848.

1. At the Economic Defence Panel meeting of October 3rd, we had a very interesting discussion of our defence production problems and we arrived at certain recommendations which will be considered by Cabinet Defence Committee shortly.

2. From the discussion, three different approaches were developed which may be summarized, rather crudely, as follows:

(a) Some members were reluctant to depart from an ad hoc approach to the problem and doubted whether a programme should be framed until specific requirements by items of our own Forces and those of our North Atlantic partners were known. They thought that the broad categories of high priority production suggested by the Standing Group were not sufficiently clear and that we should wait for more precise recommendations from the end item task forces, as well as from our own forces whose requirements are not yet firm as they do not yet know how much replacement equipment they will be able to get from the United States.

(b) Other members felt that there was a great deal that could be started now on the basis of broad categories of requirements already known; that military requirements were not the only factor to be considered but should be weighed against what, from the point of view of developing defence industries in Canada, we want to make ourselves.

(c) Some members were worried by the inflationary pressures that the defence production programme will increase.

3. The Conclusions of the Panel were:

(a) That we could not, unfortunately, expect firm recommendations from the task forces for some months.

(b) That the international situation, and in particular the requirements of the integrated force to be established in Western Europe, made it necessary that we get some production programme under way as soon as possible, without waiting for more specific recommendations from NATO.

(c) The programme should be based both on the capacity of Canadian industry and the direction in which, (from the point of view of defence) we wish to develop it, and on the requirements of our own forces and those of our partners.

(d) Working Groups of representatives of Trade and Commerce, Canadian Commercial Corporation, and Defence should be set up in seven or eight categories, roughly corresponding to the task forces in which we are interested, to prepare our own thinking before the task forces arrive and also to frame a production programme in these fields. The Working Groups will probably cover aircraft, shipbuilding, vehicles, weapons, ammunition, electronics and communications, clothing and equipage, and construction.

(e) Subject to Cabinet approval we should begin stockpiling processed materials such as picrite and RDX which will be required by ourselves and our North Atlantic partners.

4. Underlying the panel discussion was our fear, shared by both Defence and Finance, that the Government would be embarrassed, both domestically and internationally, if the present lack of a more positive defence production programme were to result in the expenditure in this fiscal year of only a small portion of the 300 millions appropriated last month for North Atlantic aid and Canadian production, especially when we have made such a big play about our defence production role in NATO.

My dear Colleague;

You will recall that in July of this year we proposed, through the United Kingdom High Commissioner, that the R.C.A.F. rotate certain fighter squadrons in the United Kingdom commencing next spring for the purpose of obtaining advanced operational training with the R.A.F. In reply, the United Kingdom Government welcomed the proposal and agreed that detailed arrangements should be pursued in discussions at the staff level.

You will recall also that on August 18, Cabinet approved of three fighter squadrons being located in the United Kingdom, instead of one as we had planned previously. Our intention is to have all three squadrons stationed in the United Kingdom by the end of 1951, with the first arriving there during the latter part of next January. R.A.F. authorities are in agreement with this plan, and are prepared to provide facilities suitable for our needs.[61]

I would be grateful if you could forward official notice of this change in plan to the United Kingdom Government at your earliest convenience, and at the same time suggest to them that the details be worked out by the services.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET & PERSONAL Ottawa, October 12, 1950

Dear Evan [Gill],

I was very glad to receive your letter of September 30 in which you raised the question of getting more information about military supply matters.

One suggestion which you made was that it might be more convenient to communicate directly with Stan Allen in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Naturally we have no objection if you and Stan wish to write to each other on any matter. There is however a factor of administrative convenience in addressing such letters to the Department of External Affairs. The letters which you and Stan might write to each other on NATO matters would no doubt on most occasions be of considerable interest to us, and possibly to Finance and National Defence. If you send a letter directly to Stan, or if he sends one directly to you, we must ask the permission of the originator or addressee in order to make any use of the copies. We have discussed this point with Stan, who says that he would much prefer that External Affairs should continue to act as central post office for all NATO correspondence. He does not wish himself to be responsible for making references of correspondence, and he considers that it would be rather a nuisance to be consulted on references.

The most convenient form of correspondence would seem to be to address it to the Department of External Affairs, and in your first paragraph, if you wish, you might indicate that the letter is intended especially for Allen. We can assure you that Allen receives copies of your communications within twenty-four hours of the time they reach the East Block, and earlier when necessary.

I am glad that you have pointed out to us specifically what matters you wish to be informed on more fully. Stan Allen will be looking into the question of giving you further information on Canadian military production programmes. I think that your second point, industrial mobilization planning, will be met by the brief which has been prepared for the meetings of the NATO I.M.P. group in Paris later this month: we have not yet seen it, but shall get a copy to you as soon as we can.

The Canadian offer of mutual aid is a more difficult question. The list of mutual aid which we are offering has been sent by the Department of National Defence to the Standing Group. For your own information only, the C.G.S. has been very reluctant to let us have a copy, or even to let us see a copy; therefore we are almost as much in the dark as you are. A few days ago Mr. Heeney asked in writing if a copy of the list might be sent to Finn Clark for the information of himself, Mr. Wilgress, and you. We have heard by the grapevine that we are not going to get it until the Standing Group make their recommendation, possibly tomorrow. We have been doing everything possible to give you all available information on mutual aid questions, and we don't really understand the C.G.S.'s determination to have this business handled exclusively through military channels in Washington.

Finally you asked about the U.K. reaction to our transfer to U.S. equipment. This is, of course, a decision that was really made several years ago, but we have not had the means before to implement it. Strategically, and because of our industrial pattern, it makes sense. Shannon came to see me on September 30, and I handed him a memorandum to answer a number of questions which Clutterbuck had raised earlier with the Under-Secretary. A copy of this memorandum was telegraphed to Syd Pierce, in London, together with the text of a letter from Trade and Commerce (telegram No. 1459†) and Pierce was requested to give Canada House copies. I used the Trade and Commerce letter to answer orally the oral enquiry from Clutterbuck as to how the decision to go over to U.S. type equipment will affect production for U.K. use. Our information, via the grapevine, is that the authorities in the U.K. were less concerned over the decision than was Earnscliffe. You will see that the view of Trade and Commerce, as expressed in their letter, was that our volume of production for U.K. use depends partly on how soon the U.K. authorities will give us firm statements of their requirements.

We shall certainly try to increase the flow of information to you, as you suggest. Any time that we are being delinquent, I hope that you will not hesitate to let me know.

With kind regards,
R.A. MacKay

Re: Telegram No. 3 of September 14 from the Canadian Delegate to the North Atlantic Council.

STATEMENT ON CANADIAN PRODUCTION EXCESS CAPACITY

1. I regret that you have not yet received the information which you requested for September 30 in order that you might make a statement to the Deputies on Canadian production excess capacity. The collection of the material for this statement has been in the hands of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I understand that the officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce went as far as they could in preparing this statement but have been delayed by the lack of a statement on the domestic requirements from the Armed Forces. I am enclosing a copy of a letter dated October 16† from the Department of Trade and Commerce which is self-explanatory.

2. The Department of National Defence has been under some pressure, particularly from Mr. Robertson in his capacity as Chairman of the Economic Defence Panel, to finish this report and other reports for NATO agencies which are now overdue. The delay appears to have been caused by a lack of agreed assumptions on Canadian commitments; until these assumptions were settled at ministerial level the Department of National Defence had been unable to progress with the statement which you required or with the information which Mr. Gill asked to receive for the MPSB on September 30.

3. We much regret these delays but wish to assure you that they are not caused by oversight.

4. I am not giving any circulation to this letter.

USE OF CANADIAN VESSELS TO TRANSPORT WAR SUPPLIES TO NORTH ATLANTIC COUNTRIES

This matter has been called to our attention by the Canadian Maritime Commission. It was discussed last Friday in the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy.

2. The Maritime Commission was proposing that the Canadian Government should provide Canadian dollars as a means of ensuring that a fair share of Canadian war supplies provided under mutual aid should be transported in Canadian ships.

3. The Interdepartmental Committee did not approve of this suggestion. It was felt that the amount of freight would not be large and the European countries were not so short of dollars that they could not readily accept these expenditures.

4. However, the Committee was most sympathetic to the principle that Canadian vessels should get their fair share of the traffic. Indeed it is clear that Canadian shipowners would have a very reasonable complaint against the Canadian Government if this did not take place.

5. The Committee proposed that whenever arrangements were made for shipments the recipient countries should be asked to ensure that Canadian vessels got a fair share. According to the Maritime Commission this would not be difficult for them. Freight such as this would move in liners, not tramps. The movements of liners are subject to the various Shipping Conferences. The European Governments have close connections with these Conferences and Canada's share of the tonnage in each Conference is well known.

6. There are three Conferences and Canada's share in shipments moving from Canada is as follows:

1. The North Continental Conference (Including the Netherlands, France and Belgium) - 20%
2. The Mediterranean Conference (Including Italy) - 50%
3. The United Kingdom Conference - 10%.

7. The first shipment (equipment for one division) is expected to start to the Netherlands in a few days. Approval of the North Atlantic Deputies is expected today. It will move in two parts. The first, 4000 tons, may move next week; the second, 1000 tons, will move a little later. You will notice that, by good luck, the second shipment is just 20% of the total. It is desirable, therefore, to take steps to ensure that the second shipment moves on a Canadian vessel. For this purpose an approach to the Netherlands authorities is required.

8. All other arrangements covering this shipment are being worked out with the Netherlands in Ottawa. It would seem appropriate, therefore, to contact the Netherlands authorities here in regard to the particular matter of shipping on Canadian vessels. Mr. MacKay and I suggest that you might ask the Netherlands Ambassador to call on you for the purpose of explaining the situation to him and urging him to use his best efforts to make sure that the second shipment (1000 tons) moves on a Canadian vessel.[63]

9. In view of the fact that the arms are being supplied free of cost at seaboard to the Netherlands Government by the Canadian Government, the request would seem to be a most reasonable one. As you know the United States is requiring that 50% of arms supplied under M.D.A.P. must move in American vessels. We would like to avoid a hard and fast legalistic restriction of this sort, but it can only be done if the recipient countries are willing to cooperate.

10. The approach to the Netherlands Ambassador should take place immediately. The Netherlands has been officially notified that the arms from Canada are available. This is likely to take place immediately after today's meeting of the North Atlantic Deputies.[64]

11. I am asking Mr. MacKay to initial this memorandum.[65]

[63] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
When Mr. Reid and I saw Mr. [A.H.J.] Lovink [Ambassador of the Netherlands to Canada] today we mentioned that the Cabinet hoped the Netherlands Gov[ernmen]t would give consideration to using Canadian ships. He said he thought his gov[ernmen]t would be quite prepared to do so in the case of the 1000 tons going from Halifax in Dec. I gather arrangements are pretty well in hand for the initial shipment of 3000 tons. We told him we would ask Dupuy to put forward our request orally to the Netherlands' Gov[ernmen]t. Lovink agreed and said he would support it. R.A. M[acKay] 27/10/50.

[64] M. MacKay a modifié à la main le paragraphe final de cette note:/By hand, MacKay amended the final paragraph of this memorandum to read:
The approach to the Netherlands Ambassador might take place at the same time as they are officially notified by us that the armament is available. R.A. M[acKay].

Mr. Heeney, I have amended Mr. Plumptre's memo — he appears to have been misinformed about the procedure whereby the Netherlands would be notified by us. R.A. M[acKay].

TELEGRAM 2030 London, October 24, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Your telegram No. 1627 of October 23rd† re North Atlantic mutual aid.

1. I am reporting separately on Deputies' discussion at meeting today concerning consideration of draft resolution on suggested method for arriving at an equitable distribution of economic burdens (document D-D/162 of October 21st†).

2. When we had come to the end of our agenda I took the opportunity of informing the Deputies that we had received information indicating that the Standing Group had recommended that the armament for one division being contributed by the Canadian Government under mutual aid should go to the Netherlands. I explained that the Canadian Government was anxious to get this equipment moving from Montreal before the close of navigation, and in view of the fact that no further meeting of the Deputies was planned until November 7th requested the approval of the Deputies to the Standing Group's recommendation. Our difficulties in the matter were clearly recognized and the Deputies approved the recommendation subject to receipt by the Vice-Chairman of confirmation by the Standing Group. It was agreed that a telegram should be sent to the Standing Group to this effect. As soon, therefore, as the Vice-Chairman has received confirmation from the Standing Group I shall advise you so that the necessary arrangements can be made for a public announcement.

3. At the conclusion of the meeting the Netherlands Acting Deputy expressed his warm appreciation of the Canadian Government's action.

4. It was also agreed at the meeting to defer consideration of the question of security of Berlin (see paragraph 13 of my telegram No. 2009 of October 21st†) until our next meeting.[66]

5. With reference to paragraph 7 of my telegram No. 2009 concerning the task force recommendation for the production of gun laying radar sets for NAT countries (document D-D/160 of October 19th†) I am sending, in my immediately following telegram,† the text of a letter which has been sent by Spofford to the Chairman of the Defence Committee on October 21st. You will note that while no specific reference is made to the question of allocation, this aspect is covered in the document D-D/160 which was enclosed with Spofford's communication.

SECRET [Ottawa], November 6, 1950

MEETINGS OF NATO GROUP OF EXPERTS ON PRODUCTION IN LONDON — OCTOBER/NOVEMBER

1. The NATO Deputies have chosen from their numbers a group of seven who act as their deputies. This group of seven has established two sub-committees of experts, one on Economics and Finance and one on Production.

2. The group on Economics and Finance was to consider in general terms how NATO economic and financial problems could be dealt with by the aid of OEEC. The NATO countries in OEEC have set up a Working Group to look first at the OEEC questionnaire and then — although this is not firm — to consider the problem of raw materials within the defence programme.

3. To the meetings of the group on production most countries sent their representative on the P.W.S. of the M.P.S.B. The group examined the present production agencies of NATO, which in effect meant an examination of the M.P.S.B. and its P.W.S. The report of this group goes before the production experts tomorrow for final vetting and then to the Deputies.

4. It was agreed by the members of the group of experts that the main shortcoming of the M.P.S.B. and its P.W.S. was that all members were committed to a national point of view although they were doing an international task.

5. Before setting down its recommendations, the group made the following basic assumption:

Before any forces could be raised and equipped, NATO must be active in the following ways:

(a) Their military advisers would have to determine the strength and type of forces needed;

(b) Their production experts would have to decide how all this could best be done; and

(c) The financial and economic experts would have to decide who was to pay for what and to determine what the impact of the whole programme would be on the various national economies.

When these steps had been taken, the military experts would have to make the necessary allocations.

6. Assuming the foregoing, the group of experts on production recommended that in lieu of M.P.S.B. there should be set up a Defense Production Board sitting permanently in London. This Board would concern itself with such matters as progress reporting and the eligibility of production programmes for mutual aid. It should have under it an integrated international organization working full-time under a Director.

Member governments of NATO would nominate members-elect to the D.P.B. (The word "elect" was used because the M.P.S.B. is still in existence). Member-governments would nominate candidates for the post of Director, who would be selected by the Board. Once appointed, the Director, who would have to be a man of executive ability and experience in production problems, would then be expected to outline his proposed organization. His organizational chart would name senior posts to which member governments would nominate candidates. The Director would then make his selections and the Board would confirm them. The less senior members of the staff would be appointed by the Director.

Once the D.P.B. had been set up, the M.P.S.B. would, it was hoped, go out of existence.

The D.P.B. would make recommendations to Council Deputies. These recommendations might come either from member governments or from the D.P.B. itself.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au commissaire de la Commission maritime canadienne

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Commissioner, Canadian Maritime Commission

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 9, 1950

Dear Mr. [L.C.] Audette:

MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN MUTUAL AID SUPPLIES TO NATO COUNTRIES IN CANADIAN SHIPS

This is to confirm several conversations between officials of your Commission and this Department during the past few days. It appears that we had not fully understood your intentions.

2. We had understood that your desire was merely to ensure that Canadian ships got a reasonable share of the traffic. The test of reasonableness was the share of Canadian ships in the North Atlantic Liner Conference involved in the shipment. This was the proposition that we put up to the Netherlands authorities. It is our understanding that they are intending to carry an appropriate share of the current large shipment on Canadian ships.

3. You have rightly pointed out that this approach, while ensuring a certain percentage of cargoes to Canada, suffers from the fact that it is or may be considered a "tied shipping clause" of the very sort that we have protested against in other countries, particularly the United States. Further, you point out that if our discussions with (say) the Netherlands are to be on a bilateral basis, if their ships are to carry all the cargo not carried in Canadian ships, and if the ships of all other members of the Conference are to be excluded, then Canada and the Netherlands should share in the traffic on a fifty-fifty basis. Our proposal to the Netherlands that we should merely carry 20 per cent of the traffic, based on our participation in the North Atlantic Conference, was far too modest. (In reply to the latter point it may of course be argued that, over a period of months or years, Canadian supplies are likely to go to most, if not all, of our North Atlantic Allies and thus our overall position would be protected as long as we got our 20 per cent of each shipment.

4. Your original proposal was, as we now understand it, that the Canadian Government should make use of the North Atlantic Shipping Conferences to distribute the shipments evenly amongst all the Lines concerned. We have pointed out that the Canadian Government is not in a position to do this. According to its policy Canadian arms are made available to other governments at Canadian seaboard. It is the other governments, and not the Canadian Government, that are responsible for shipping arrangements. We are, of course, in a strong position to exercise some influence over those governments. However, in the last analysis, the movement of Canadian military supplies will be determined by general military and economic considerations. The question whether or not the recipient government follows a particular shipping policy will not be a dominant consideration.

5. After discussion I understand that we are agreed on the following points:

(a) Arrangements for the current shipment to the Netherlands will not be disturbed.

(b) In relation to all future arrangements to provide mutual aid, the recipient government will be urged to hand over to the appropriate shipping conference the distribution of shipping freights.

(c) The Canadian Maritime Commission will inform the shipping conferences concerned that this policy is being followed in the future. The Commission will warn that it is not in a position to guarantee that recipient governments will act upon the Canadian Government's request.

6. I understand from you that the United Kingdom is now using the shipping conference to distribute the freights on their government-purchased imports from Canada. Canadian shipping gains from this pooling principle. Hence it is in the interests of the Canadian ship-owners to see this principle extended as widely as possible. Two other advantages also appear to flow from the policy we have agreed upon. First, it avoids any suggestion of a "tied shipping clause" and establishes a multilateral basis for deciding on the distribution of freights. Second, the distribution of freights is decided entirely amongst the companies concerned without involving governmental decisions or intergovernmental negotiations. As far as this Department is concerned the proposed arrangements are thoroughly satisfactory.

7. The only possible question in our minds regarding the new arrangement concerns your own Commission and your own Minister, who would presumably be called upon to answer questions regarding it. I assume that, before putting it into effect, your Minister would be satisfied to defend it either against disgruntled Canadian shipowners, who felt that they were not getting their fair share, or against members of the public including Labour Unions who might think that Canadian interests were not adequately protected.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

III. REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL NATO AIRCREW TRAINING FACILITIES IN CANADA

13. The Chairman referred to a letter of November 28th† in which the United Kingdom High Commissioner had enquired on behalf of his Government as to the part Canada might be willing to play in providing training facilities for an additional 1,100 pilots and 800 navigators a year for the R.A.F., starting August 1st, 1951. The R.A.F. recognized that any such allocation of Canadian facilities would be dependent, in part, on a recommendation from the Standing Group based on studies to be carried out by its committee on air training in North America.

This proposal had been given preliminary consideration on December 8th by Cabinet, which had felt that it could not accept the project as it involved opening new schools. This was, however, an important matter, to which further consideration would doubtless have to be given.

14. The Acting Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that, as a result of reports to the Standing Group by European NATO countries, it was known that they would require, over and above their existing training capacity, training facilities for some 4,000 aircrew a year. Realizing that it might be some time before the Standing Group could recommend Canadian provision of the facilities proposed by the U.K. High Commissioner, Air Marshal Sir John Slessor, C.A.S., R.A.F., had asked the R.C.A.F. to explore the possibility of opening a Flying Training School, an Advanced Flying School and an Air Navigation School, by August 1st, 1951, such allocation of Canadian facilities to the R.A.F. to be recommended in due course by the Standing Group.

These schools, besides facilitating training in peace time, would provide a nucleus for any training scheme required in Canada in wartime, when air training in Western Europe would interfere with the operation of the radar screen and would have to be carried out mainly in North America. Wartime conditions in Europe would also necessitate dependence on North American training aircraft, although some U.K. equipment would be available in peace time. Canada had the equipment to manufacture basic trainers and could start producing them fairly quickly in an emergency.

Under the Slessor scheme, the two Flying Training Schools would have an annual intake of 520 and a total output of 350. The figures for the Air Navigation School would be 900 (intake) and 768 (output). Operation of the three schools would require a total of 921 officers, 1,905 airmen, 695 civilians, 178 basic training aircraft, 79 advanced trainers, 88 navigation trainers, and the initial and annual recurring costs of the project would be about $67 million and $43 million respectively.

The Chiefs of Staff Committee had considered this scheme and was of the opinion that, if it were recommended by the Standing Group, Canada should meet the R.A.F.'s requirements as far as possible from available facilities.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Chief of the Air Staff, December 14, 1950 — Panel Doc. Ed-24)†

Existing R.C.A.F. facilities were in full use. He was therefore planning to ask the C.A.S., R.A.F. whether, for the scheme the latter had suggested, he would be able to furnish about 50% of the ground crew, instructors and training aircraft and whether it would be acceptable to train a larger proportion of the airmen as navigators, which would be cheaper. With such modifications, the initial cost of the project would be reduced to about $32 million and the recurring cost to about $37 million. It would be helpful to have the Panel's views as to the merits of pursuing the matter with the R.A.F. on this basis.

15. Mr. Robertson thought it would be useful if papers going before the Government on matters of this kind gave explanations of the magnitude of numbers involved. For instance, any paper on the air training proposal might contain comparative figures on the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan.

16. Air Marshal Curtis said he believed that the peak output of the B.C.A.T.P. had been in the neighborhood of 40,000 aircrew a year. (He subsequently indicated that, when the B.C.A.T.P. was at its peak in 1943, it comprised 97 flying training schools, 184 other ancillary units, a training staff of 104,113 (service and civilian) and 39,354 aircrew had been trained in that year.)

17. The Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that an attempt be made to estimate the total air training facilities that would be required in Canada in wartime.

18. Air Marshal Curtis indicated that figures on the wartime requirements of NATO countries were not available for the present.

19. Mr. Robertson said that it would help to some extent to keep down costs if NATO air trainees learned as much English as possible before coming to Canada.

20. Mr. MacKay suggested that it would be desirable for future NATO trainees — even if they spoke English — to attend an indoctrination course similar to that conducted by the R.C.A.F. for present NATO trainees.

External Affairs was under pressure for a reply to the U.K. High Commissioner's letter of November 28th.

21. The Panel, after further discussion agreed that:

(a) it would be useful if Air Marshal Curtis sounded out the C.A.S., R.A.F., on his suggestions for a modified version of the training scheme proposed by the R.A.F., preparatory to this modified project being taken up with the Minister of National Defence;

(b) if External Affairs found it necessary to reply to the U.K. High Commissioner before Mr. Claxton returned from Brussels, the High Commissioner might be told that, while it was improbable that Canada would be able at present to undertake a scheme of the scope outlined in his letter of November 28th, consideration was being given to alternative schemes;

(c) in the interests of economy, the R.C.A.F. should examine the possibility of future NATO air trainees acquiring a working knowledge of English before proceeding to Canada, but that it would be useful for such trainees to attend on arrival an indoctrination course similar to that presently conducted for them by the R.C.A.F.

IV. EXPANSION OF CANADIAN F86 PRODUCTION FOR NATO

22. The Acting Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that, as the F86 was the only available aircraft that could deal with such Soviet types as the MIG-15, Sir Harold Parker had taken up with the Canadian High Commissioner in London the possibility of Canada supplying some F86's for European NATO countries under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950. The United Kingdom had tried to obtain F86's from the United States but had been informed that the latter expected the United Kingdom to provide interceptor aircraft for European NATO countries.

The R.A.F. had indicated that it required 392 F86E's; 84 in 1951-52 and the remainder in the following year. As the Canadian airframe, including 25% spares, would cost some $207 thousand, the stated U.K. requirements would cost Canada about $81 million. U.S. approval was required for provision of F86E aircraft to the United Kingdom; arrangements would have to be made for United States provision of the necessary government-furnished property, including engines, without cost to Canada; and NATO would have to recommend production by Canada for the United Kingdom. Canadian production of U.K. requirements would make possible an increase in Canadian aircraft production in 1951.

On December 13th, the Chiefs of Staff Committee had agreed to the desirability of Canada undertaking this production, provided the United Kingdom arranged for NATO to recommend it and for the United States to provide the necessary GFP. On December 8th, Cabinet had indicated that it would be prepared to consider the U.K. request if these two points were settled satisfactorily.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Chief of the Air Staff, December 14, 1950 — Panel Document ED-26)†

By letter of December 11th, he had asked the Chief of Staff, U.S.A.F., whether the United States would be agreeable to Canadian provision of F86 aircraft to the United Kingdom, and whether it could provide the necessary GFP under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme. In a telegram of December 14th, General Vandenberg had replied that aid to the United Kingdom under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme was not a matter for decision by the U.S.A.F.; that, as all M.D.A.P. funds for 1951 had been allocated, the United Kingdom would have to ask for provision of the GFP from 1952 funds; but that he considered that, by discussion between materiel officers of the R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F., a solution to the problem could be found and that he would do everything possible to assist Canada in meeting the U.K. request.

23. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the production of F86 aircraft had a high priority. If there were any difficulty in disposing of them, Canada could use them to advantage. The Orenda engine project was progressing and it was hoped that the engine would be in production in about a year.

24. Air Marshal Curtis suggested that he advise the C.A.S., R.A.F., to look into the questions of the United States providing the GFP and NATO recommending Canadian production for the United Kingdom.

25. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that:

(a) Sir Harold Parker be informed of the correspondence between Air Marshal Curtis and General Vandenberg, and that Air Marshal Curtis was advising the C.A.S., R.A.F., to look into the questions of U.S. provision of GFP and NATO clearance for Canadian production of 392 F86E's for the United Kingdom;

(b) if these two matters were settled satisfactorily, the proposal for Canadian production of 392 aircraft should go forward to the Government.

V. CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION OF A/A #4 MK. VI RADAR SETS TO NATO

26. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that the NATO Electronics Task Force had recommended to the Permanent Working Staff of the Military Production and Supply Board the production in Canada of 100 #4 MK. VI radar sets for NATO. The Council Deputies had endorsed this recommendation and the Standing Group had stated that the set was militarily acceptable, although the United States would not be using it as it hoped to have a new set, the T33, which would include gun-laying apparatus, in production in a year or so. The MK. VI set was the only one of its kind likely to be available in quantity for NATO countries during the next several years, and European capacity to produce it was inadequate.

The Electronic Defence Supply Panel had recommended that authority be obtained for 100 MK. VI's to be made in Canada for NATO and that enquiries be made as to additional NATO requirements. The Chiefs of Staff Committee had asked the Chief of the General Staff, who was in London, to discuss U.K. requirements.

Assuming the early placing of an order, 100 sets could be produced by Canadian Arsenals Ltd. by June, 1953, for about $12.5 million. Under pressure these might be produced by December, 1952. It seemed sensible to recommend to the Government authorization of production for NATO of 100 sets to be charged to the $300 million provided under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950. It would then remain to determine which countries wanted these and for NATO to allocate them.

Only 100 sets could be produced with present facilities. To facilitate consideration of the question of meeting additional European requirements, an estimate had been prepared, merely as an example, of the cost of producing a total of 300 sets. An order for 300 would result in delivery of the proposed 100 sets by the summer of 1952 and unit costs would be lowered by 10 - 20%. An order for 100 should, however, not be delayed pending determination of additional NATO requirements.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

27. The Acting Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the Chief of the General Staff had just reported that the U.K. military authorities were very anxious to obtain 500 MK. VI's and that they expected to confirm this requirement immediately.

28. Mr. Allen stated that continued production of this set would not result in postponing use of the T33 set, required by the Canadian Army, as this U.S. set was still at the development stage.

29. The Chairman, Defence Research Board said that the United Kingdom had made a decision to obtain MK. VI's just before the last war ended. This set was the last of the last war, rather than the first of the next. If, as it appeared, the United Kingdom had the matching gun-laying equipment, it would nevertheless be sensible to try to meet its requirements for MK. VI's.

30. Mr. Allen indicated that, in recommending production of 100 of these sets, the Task Force had merely intended this figure as a starting point for production for NATO countries (37 sets were already on order for the Canadian Army and for other Commonwealth countries). In 1949 Western Union requirements had been estimated as 1,000 sets and it was certain that they were high.

31. Mr. Mackenzie thought that no time should be lost in seeking authority to place an order for 100 MK. VI's. Consideration could be given subsequently to the production and financial aspects of additional European requirements such as those of the United Kingdom.

32. Mr. Robertson assumed that, if it were decided to make additional sets for the United Kingdom, other NATO countries with holdings of matching gun-laying equipment would probably want Canada to produce MK. VI's for them.

33. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada expressed concern at the prospect of Western Europe being unable to pay for much, if any, of its equipment requirements from Canada.

34. Mr. Mackenzie suggested that, as NATO had recommended the production of 100 sets, it should be consulted on the desirability of additional production for the United Kingdom and other NATO countries before production of more than 100 sets was recommended to the Government. There was also the consideration that most of the $300 million vote was already tentatively earmarked and that a decision to ask Parliament for further funds for mutual aid had not yet made.

35. The Deputy Minister of National Defence thought that it would be reasonable to strike a compromise. It could be suggested to the Government that, as NATO had indicated the military acceptability of the MK. VI set and it was known that the United Kingdom required 500, it would be sensible to order 300 and ask NATO to allocate them. It could be pointed out that this would result in more rapid delivery of the first 100 sets and the reduction of unit costs.

36. Mr. Robertson said that a satisfactory solution might be to undertake to transfer a given number of sets to Europe as mutual aid on the understanding that additional European requirements could only be met at a price.

37. Mr. Drury doubted that there would be dollars available in Europe for such purchases.

38. Mr. MacKay pointed out that the United States might be willing to finance, under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme, a portion of Europe's MK. VI requirements from Canadian production.

39. The Panel, after considerable further discussion, agreed:

(a) that, in view of the U.K. requirement for 500 sets, the Department of Trade and Commerce should recommend to the government an immediate order of 300 #4 MK. VI radar sets, for provision to NATO countries as mutual aid, with an indication that adherence to the original plan of producing 100 sets would result in too few deliveries too late;

(b) that it would be up to the United Kingdom to take steps through NATO to obtain a share of the sets, which would be allocated by that organization;

(c) that additional European requirements could be considered when up-to-date information on these requirements was received.

VI. NATO PROCEDURES FOR PRODUCTION AND ALLOCATION QUESTIONS

40. The Acting Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee referred to the fact that the Minister of National Defence had raised the question of finding effective machinery for obtaining the views of appropriate NATO bodies on possible Canadian production of items and for allocating Canadian production to other NATO countries.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, Dec. 13, 1950 — Panel Document ED-27)†

In a message of December 6th,† Mr. L.D. Wilgress, the High Commissioner in London, had reported that the Standing Group might find it difficult to allocate small quantities of individual items on the basis of strategic need, and was considering some general principles within which the Military Production and Supply Board could recommend allocations. Mr. Wilgress had suggested that Canada might, in the circumstances, wish to adopt the "shopping list" procedure in order to obtain information as to the military acceptability and possible allocations of items as a basis for decisions as to whether given items should be produced for European NATO countries.

Under this procedure the Canadian authorities would, on the strength of Task Force recommendations and national studies, make tentative offers of specific quantities of items to other countries, communicating these offers through the Permanent Working Staff of the MPSB with an indication of probable terms, delivery schedules, etc. The other countries would then be asked to indicate without delay how many units of each item they wished to obtain from Canada. The PWS would consolidate their replies and report them to Ottawa, recommending allocations within principles prescribed by the Standing Group when bids exceeded quantities offered. Firm proposals for the provision of these items as mutual aid would then go before the Canadian Government for decision and, if they were approved, the MPSB would be informed and subsequent negotiations would be between Canada and individual recipient countries. Mr. Wilgress had indicated that this procedure had become routine in connection with the high priority production programme and would be used in connection with Task Force recommendations.

On December 13th, the Chiefs of Staff Committee had agreed to support the "shopping list" procedure as a means of accelerating the provision of urgently-needed military equipment to other NATO countries under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950. It had also been agreed that, as a complementary measure:

(i) the Department of National Defence should select, on the basis of the list of high priority production items and the Task Force reports, items that it was desired to produce in Canada for the Canadian services;

(ii) the selected list would then be examined by the Defence Supply Panels, in relation to general Canadian production plans, to determine whether facilities would be available for production beyond national requirements, and, if so, what items might be included in a "shopping list" of items that Canada could offer to produce.

The Joint War Logistics and Production Staff had been instructed to take action along these lines.

41. Mr. MacKay referred to a message of December 15th† from Mr. Wilgress on the question of whether Canada should resort to the "shopping list" procedure or wait for requests from other NATO countries. In this, Mr. Wilgress had stated that, in accordance with what he understood was Canadian policy, he had always discouraged individual nations from requesting Canadian provision of specific items as aid, and had insisted that such proposals should be made in a NATO context, e.g., on the basis of Task Force reports on production capacities for high priority items. His message indicated that he hoped that these reports and related Canadian studies would lead to tentative offers being made under the "shopping list" procedure. Recent world developments and intergovernmental discussions were bound to create new pressures for larger military production programmes and, in his opinion, it would be preferable for Canada to make offers before, rather than after, that event. Mr. Wilgress had also pointed out that, as Canada had a fund available for the provision of mutual aid, it was in a position to make decisions more quickly than some other NATO countries, and its example could serve as a stimulus to the others.

42. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that there were difficulties to resorting to the "shopping list" procedure at a time when, under tentative plans, the $300 million fund appeared to be largely committed. Also, he was afraid that the procedure might encourage other NATO countries to make requests for more production than the Government would be prepared to undertake.

43. The Panel, after discussion, agreed that, while the "shopping list" procedure might not be satisfactory in all cases, it would be desirable to adopt it, as practicable, on an experimental basis.

TURKEY AND THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I. Turkish Approaches

The new Turkish Government first informed the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom, United States and France in Ankara at the beginning of August of Turkey's desire to adhere to the North Atlantic Treaty. An approach was made to yourself by the Turkish Ambassador on August 10, which was followed on August 25 by formal notification to the Under-Secretary of the Turkish Government's application for membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

2. Your reply to the Turkish Ambassador on the occasion of his first visit was that if the question was raised in the N.A.T.O. and if the United Kingdom, United States and France and other countries raised no objection to the admission of Turkey, Canada would not veto Turkish membership but would indeed give sympathetic consideration to it. In informing our Missions in London, Washington and Paris of this approach we stated that despite the objections we had seen to the inclusion of Turkey at the time when the treaty was negotiated, we might now re-examine the possibility of Turkey's admission in view of the intensification of the Communist threat, the broadening of the struggle to so many new sectors and the substantial military contribution which Turkey might make. Should Turkey adhere to the treaty, however, it would be difficult to refuse admission to others in the same part of the world, such as Greece or Iran, unless we established a firm criterion for admission in terms of a clearly worth-while contribution to the common security.

3. The Turkish Ambassador was reminded of this difficulty when he came again on August 25 to notify us formally of Turkey's application for admission. He was assured, however, that most careful and sympathetic consideration would be given the application by the Canadian Government.

4. On August 29 Mr. Spofford told the Deputies that the United States Government thought it would be undesirable for members of the Organization to give the Turks any indication of their policy pending an exchange of views among all North Atlantic countries. The United Kingdom Deputy thought it might be impossible for individual governments to avoid some discussion of the subject with Turkish representatives, but he suggested that they might refrain from reaching decisions or from intimating to the Turks what eventual decisions were likely to be. The Deputies agreed that pending the proposed exchange of views among North Atlantic countries the governments concerned should not give the Turks any definite reaction to their enquiries. In accordance with this agreement we instructed Canadian Missions to avoid discussing the matter with the Turks if possible, making it clear that Canada will not take any firm position until the attitude of powers more directly concerned is known.

II. Disadvantages of Acceding to Turkey's Request

5. There are several reasons why it has been necessary to examine the implications of Turkey's adherence to the North Atlantic Treaty with some care before replying to the Menderes[67] government's request.

(a) Turkey's admission to NATO would lead to similar requests from Greece and Iran, neither of which would have much to contribute beyond the use of their territory and transportation facilities in case of war, though in the case of Greece the unreserved loyalty of the great majority of the people would also be thrown into the balance on the side of the Western Allies. In other respects both Greece and Iran might prove to be something of a liability.

(b) Turkey's inclusion in NATO might impair the cohesiveness of the North Atlantic area, which is based on geographical propinquity, a network of economic and political relationships and a common cultural heritage in which Turkey has not shared.

(c) Despite Turkey's readiness to send troops outside its own territory, the direct contribution it could make to the defence of Western Europe would be limited by the urgency of its obligation to defend its own frontiers from possible aggression. In any case military planning for the defence of Western Europe without Turkish aid is already well advanced.

[67] Adnan Menderes, premier ministre de Turquie (mai 1950-)
Adnan Menderes, Prime Minister of Turkey (May 1950-).

(d) Turkey is already receiving from the United States as much in the way of military supplies as it could expect if it acceded to the treaty.

(e) Insofar as military aid in time of war is concerned, the United Kingdom and France are already bound by the Treaty of Mutual Assistance of October 1939 to do what they can if an act of aggression by a European power leads to a war in the Mediterranean area in which Turkey is involved. It is doubtful whether any other European member of NATO would be able to send armed forces to aid Turkey even if the latter did adhere to the North Atlantic Treaty. Thus it might be sufficient, as the President of Turkey himself indicated in conversation with the United Kingdom Ambassador in Ankara, if a unilateral guarantee of armed aid in case of attack were offered to Turkey by the United States.

(f) If the United States does not wish to offer such a guarantee, a regional pact, beginning with Turkey and Greece, might be underwritten by the United States, the United Kingdom and France, with the possibility of including Egypt and Iran and perhaps others later. In their tripartite declaration of May 25, 1950[68] the three Western powers have already undertaken to prevent violation of frontiers or armistice lines in the Middle East. All three have also made pledges of one kind or another to Turkey, and the United Kingdom and United States have aided the Greeks in their struggle against Communist-aided guerrillas. A regional pact for the Eastern Mediterranean might develop normally from these beginnings, though hardly overnight. These considerations suggest that Turkey's security requirements might be met without running the risk of over-extending NATO by forcing on it new preoccupations in the Eastern Mediterranean area.

III. Arguments in Favour of Turkey's Accession

6. Among the considerations which appear to support the admission of Turkey to NATO are the following:

(a) Turkey has 21 divisions — a larger army than all the present European members of NATO together. This army is well equipped, a great deal of money has been invested in it and its morale is excellent. Military observers believe it could hold out for several months against Soviet attack. This is more than can be said for any of the European members of NATO. Thus Turkey's inclusion in the organization would be an asset from a military point of view.

(b) Turkey is a natural bastion which if held could be a continuing threat close to the heart of Russia. It has a garrison already in position. It will fight without question if attacked and is steadily improving its military efficiency and equipment. On the periphery of the Soviet Union there is no country which could be more successfully held if the Western powers so determined, provided they put in the necessary supplementary force.

[68] Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume 22, No. 570, June 5, 1950, p. 886.

(c) Although Turkey will fight the Russians in case of direct attack, even without allies, its leaders are anxious for the full acceptance of the republic as a member of the community of democratic states and would like to have this acceptance made manifest to all by the inclusion of Turkey in arrangements for European security.

(d) The rejection of Turkey's request by NATO would be likely to affect the morale of the Turkish army and people adversely, unless some satisfactory alternative were offered at the time when the Council's decision was made known. In Moscow rejection of the application would be interpreted to mean that the Western powers were unlikely to send armed forces to aid Turkey if it were attacked, and this belief might increase the dangers to which Turkey is already exposed.

(e) The United States is anxious to have air bases in Turkey from which attack on the Soviet Union might be pressed in case of war. This would be possible if Turkey were admitted to NATO.

(f) If the Soviet Union, in view of Turkey's strength, decided to by-pass that country and attack in Iran, Greece and the Arab states instead, Turkey might conceivably remain neutral or non-belligerent as long as it could, as it did during the second world war, unless it is admitted to NATO. The question of whether Turkey's neutrality or non-belligerency would be to the advantage of North Atlantic Treaty powers should therefore be carefully considered before a decision on Turkey's application is reached.

(g) The admission of Turkey would not necessarily imply that Greece and Iran must also be accepted as members of NATO if it were clearly understood that Turkey's admission was agreed to because of the contribution it is able to make to general security.

IV. Conclusion

7. A clarification of United States policy toward Turkey is likely to result from the present NATO discussions. In recent weeks Turkish army officers have for the first time been accepting United States advice with regard to the local disposition of armed forces. This is interpreted by some as a step toward joint planning, which in turn might lead ultimately to joint defence. The United States, however, has given no indication yet that it intends to send armed forces to Turkey in case of direct attack. The U.S. decision to act quickly in Korea, where it had relatively few commitments, seems to point to the likelihood that it would also act vigorously if the Soviet Union launched an attack on Turkey, where it has already made a very substantial investment in the form of military equipment, improvement of roads, and the training of Turkish officers. Nevertheless the position is not clear, and the decision soon to be made by the NATO Council will depend to a considerable extent on what the United States is prepared to offer.

8. Although the Ambassadors in Ankara of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada all favour Turkey's admission to NATO, it might be useful, since Turkish leaders themselves are willing to accept other alternatives, to explore the various possibilities open to the Western powers. These would include:

(a) A unilateral guarantee of United States aid to Turkey;

(b) Negotiation of a bilateral treaty of mutual assistance between Turkey and the United States;

(c) The replacement of the tripartite mutual assistance treaty of October 1939 (see 5(e) above) by a quadripartite treaty, revised so as to meet present-day conditions and to include the United States as one of the signatories.;

(d) The development of an Eastern Mediterranean regional pact (see 5(f) above).

Attached is a copy of telegram No. 1735 of September 8† from Canada House outlining views of the Foreign Office, which appears to favour a direct United States guarantee to Turkey or the development of a regional pact in preference to Turkey's inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL; MEETING, SEPTEMBER 15TH

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the next meeting of the North Atlantic Council would begin on September 15th. The President of the United States had just announced[69] that this country would propose that forces in being in western Europe be increased to meet the initial shock of any attack. The United States would agree to increase their army in Europe by from five to ten divisions and to have an American appointed as Commander-in-Chief of the western European army immediately. Mr. Truman had said that this action would be contingent upon other members of the North Atlantic alliance making a similar effort. It would be extremely difficult for Canada to take any parallel action with respect to land forces. On the basis of recent plans for accelerated defence programmes and for assistance in the arming of other North Atlantic countries, a good account of the Canadian position could be given. It could be pointed out that Canada was a relatively small country, geographically removed from the European theatre. Attention could be directed to the decision to despatch troops to Korea and to the importance of maintaining Canadian production of supplies. Limited Canadian manpower could not be used for all purposes at once. It was for consideration whether reference should be made, in this context, to the despatch of a Canadian air squadron to Europe for training purposes.

[69] Voir/See Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman 1950, Document 242, p. 626.

10. The Prime Minister said that, in considering the U.S. proposal and possible requests for parallel action by other countries, it was of paramount importance to keep in mind the need of keeping public opinion behind any Canadian action. Thus far, there had been general support for all the steps taken but it was important that no division of opinion should be created by attempting to do too much too quickly. With regard to the squadron of aircraft to be despatched for training, it was not desirable that there should be any implication that was comparable, in any way, to the despatch of U.S. ground forces in Europe. The understanding was that the squadron was to be sent for training in the United Kingdom and not for duty. Despatch for duty would require a Government declaration and communication of the decision to the House of Commons within ten days.

11. Mr. Pearson said that the Council would probably give consideration to the arming of Western Germany. It appeared probable that there would be agreement on re-arming but only on the basis that German units should form a part of a western European army. Presumably Canada should support this policy. There might also be a proposal for re-organization of the North Atlantic Treaty military machinery along more effective lines. There might be a suggestion that Canada join the Standing Group but this might raise difficulties unless the group were increased from three to five or seven. The addition of Canada to the present group might raise assumptions as to possible Canadian action that would not be desirable. On the civil side of the North Atlantic Organization, it appeared that the French government might recommend the establishment of a North Atlantic "cabinet". There would undoubtedly be substantial opposition to such a proposal.

12. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning matters to be considered at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council and agreed that the position of the Canadian Government be expressed along the lines indicated in the discussion.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL MEETINGS, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER, 1950

1. As you know, the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization had a series of important sessions in New York on September 15, 16, 18 and 26th. The discussions were dominated by the problems of Germany and the creation of an integrated North Atlantic force. Since these discussions were of great importance, I think it might be useful for you to have a copy of the attached memorandum, prepared in this Department which gives a brief report on the work of the Council.

2. You will note that the memorandum is graded as "Top Secret". Although some of the discussions have been fairly accurately reported in the press, much was not, and therefore care should be exercised in the circulation of this paper.

MEETINGS OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL,
NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 15, 16, 18, AND 26TH

Now that the North Atlantic Treaty Council has completed what were undoubtedly its most important meetings since the Treaty was signed, it may be useful to review the decisions of the Council and the discussions which lead up to them.

I. DECISIONS

1. Integrated Force. The most important decision of the Council related to the establishment of a North Atlantic integrated force. All twelve governments have now agreed in principle to the establishment of such a force for the defence of Western Europe; although no territorial limits have been defined, it is generally understood that the territory of all European members of the Treaty and of Western Germany, is included in the defence area. Eventually there is to be one Supreme Commander, served by an international staff, on the model of General Eisenhower's headquarters during the last war. The Supreme Commander will not be appointed until the integrated force is organized and, in the meantime, the Chief of Staff is to be appointed forthwith and the Planning Organization established to prepare for the Supreme Commander's appointment. The staff will be drawn from the nationals of all countries contributing to the integrated force.

2. German Participation. No final decision was reached on the participation of German units in the integrated force or on the exploitation of Western Germany's industrial potential for the production of military equipment. It was decided to refer to the Defence Committee the problem of making the best use of German resources in the defence of Europe.

3. Re-organization of NATO. Certain changes in the structure of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will inevitably flow from the decision on the integrated force. When the Defence Committee meets in Washington on October 28, it will be expected to recommend the changes which will be needed in order to make it possible for the Council to give the military side of the Organization political guidance on the integration of the force. In particular, some change will be necessary in the relations between the Council and the Defence Committee on the one hand, and the Standing Group on the other. The Standing Group is expected to assume the nature of a combined Chiefs of Staff to which non-members will be brought into closer relationship than they now enjoy with the Standing Group.

4. Economic Aspects of Defence. The Council instructed the Deputies to consider requesting OEEC delegations in Paris of North Atlantic countries to "assist in the collection and analysis of appropriate economic and financial data from the National Governments and provide expert advice, as required, for the achievement of NATO aims".

The Council also accepted another Deputies' resolution expressing concern "at the possible effect on the rearmament programmes and economies of the member countries of shortages of supply and rising of prices of primary commodities"; the Council, therefore, asked the Deputies to advise "on the best means by which these problems can be dealt with, bearing in mind that the interest of both the producer and consumer countries are involved".

5. Admission of New Members. The Council decided that both Turkey and Greece would be allowed to "be associated with the appropriate phases of the work of the various North Atlantic Treaty Military Planning bodies engaged in the defence of the Mediterranean. The purpose of this arrangement would be to facilitate co-ordinated military planning without extending the membership of the Treaty."

II. DISCUSSIONS

1. Germany. Much of the discussion in the North Atlantic Council meetings was dominated by the problem of Germany. Although there were two opposing views on the advisability of German rearmament, it would not be true to say that the line between them was clearly defined. Mr. Acheson clearly accepted the views of the European members that Europe must be defended, not liberated; before this meeting of the Council the United States had never so fully committed itself. As Mr. Acheson, himself, said, a revolution has occurred in United States foreign policy. In order to achieve the morale and the will to fight which is necessary for success, Mr. Acheson said, our peoples must believe that they have a chance to resist successfully. Since this meant moving the defence line as far east as possible we had to consider the morale and the will of the German people as essential to our cause. We could not afford to let Germany go by default or by conquest to the other side. To meet this situation, the United States had already announced a policy of placing in Europe substantial bodies of troops at the earliest practical moment. The mere presence of United States troops, however, even in the numbers contemplated, would not solve the problem. What was required, he believed, was a completely integrated force made up of national components under one Commander. In this force, he urged that, at the appropriate time, German units (not larger than divisional strength) would be provided by the German Government and placed under the command of a West European Commander; these German units would be supplied from outside Germany and so equipped that apart from European forces they would be, to a large extent, useless. Mr. Acheson said that according to military advice it might take from one and half to two years to collect such a force. At the end of that period he expected a flood of equipment would be available for German forces and for all other NAT countries. If the German units were to be ready "at an important time in European history", and if we were to forestall the internal dry rot in Germany, a decision was required now.

It was evident that in taking a strong line, Mr. Acheson, whether deliberately or otherwise, was confronting France with a dilemma. The United States was offering unprecedented aid and undertaking unprecedented commitments in Europe. France would hesitate before blocking this urgently required assistance by holding up German rearmament.

Mr. Schuman made a well reasoned reply in which he outlined the practical and psychological difficulties in the way of reaching a decision, at the present time, to rearm Germany. He said that the United States was proposing to ask the Germans to do more than they have offered to do. Secondly, we could not accomplish German rearmament on any scale for some time; he therefore doubted the wisdom of taking a decision in principle and announcing it now. Third, the French doubted that Germany would agree to participate in a German force without being admitted to the Council directing such a force, in other words, to NATO. Fourth, Mr. Schuman argued that the rearmament of Western Germany or even the raising of the issue, would tend to solidify Soviet control of its Eastern European satellites. Mr. Schuman said that the Germans admire strength, and that if the West were strong they would turn to the West whether they were armed or not. Rather than German rearmament, he preferred more United Kingdom, United States and Canadian divisions in Europe. Nevertheless, he agreed that the Germans would have to participate in their own and western defence in some form. He, therefore, proposed that Germany could best contribute by: (a) providing a police force for internal security, (b) providing vital components of war equipment such as steel, chemicals and raw materials, (c) strengthening and disciplining labour units, (d) building with German manpower fortifications on our eastern line of defence.

Mr. Pearson emphasized that the representative of a country like Canada must approach such an important and difficult subject with special diffidence because we were geographically and psychologically further removed from Germany than were other members. It seemed impossible both politically and militarily to secure enough forces to meet the Soviet threat in Europe without including German units in Western European forces. Mr. Pearson recognized that there were risks in this course but Canada felt that this was the best choice of risks to make, especially as rearming had already taken place in Eastern Germany. This course did not mean that the Germans should be armed before their allies or that the rest of us would slacken our defence effort. Subsequent to Mr. Schuman's statement, Mr. Pearson said that the French argument had been impressive, and that he had every sympathy for the difficulties of France. Therefore, although he had hoped for an agreement in principle on some form of participation of German manpower, he completely agreed with the necessity for a short postponement of a decision.

Mr. Bevin argued for postponement of a public announcement, if not a decision, on German rearmament, on the grounds that the Governments of Western Europe would have to prepare public opinion before they could accept, with the necessary unity, a decision to rearm Germany. He accepted by implication the necessity to lay plans now as he admitted that we could not expect a breathing space. Mr. Bevin decried the reasoning that if we did not rearm Germany we could not defend ourselves; we did not and should not need to go begging to the Germans but should be prepared, when they are ready, to integrate German units in a West European force which would give precedence to our own forces.

The Netherlands Foreign Minister declared that it was "craven lunacy" not to defend Europe east of the Rhine-Ijssel line. To defend part of Western Germany would require either more United Kingdom, United States and Canadian divisions stationed in Europe, or use of German manpower. Count Sforza said that a powerful West had to include Germany in its defence zone. Norway, Denmark, Belgium and Luxembourg recognized the need for a West German police force but cautioned delay in reaching a decision on broader German rearmament. It was evident from later discussions, however, that those countries which might hesitate at the thought of a rearmed Germany participating in the defence of Western Europe were, nevertheless, prepared to accept United States policy in view of the large share which the United States was contributing to European defence.

The Council adjourned on September 18, at the call of the Chair, and met again a week later. It had been hoped that those few intervening days might be sufficient for some members, particularly France, to secure agreement from their Cabinet colleagues either to accepting the full American proposals or, at least, to meet them half-way. This did not prove possible. At the meetings attended by Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom and France, it was agreed that the strength of the German police should be increased and that Western Germany should be allowed to produce light military equipment and material such as steel and chemicals for heavy military equipment which would be finished outside Germany. The French were unable to go any further on the question of using German military units in European defence. The French Government is no doubt considering not only the state of their public opinion which is, of course, their main stumbling block but they are probably trying also to drive the best possible bargain for United States financial assistance to offset the economic burdens incurred through the greatly expanded French military production programme.

2. Economic Aspects of Defence. No final decisions were made on the sweeping French proposals for the re-organization of the economic and productive side of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. A Working Group of the Council Deputies, however, meeting concurrently with the Council decided to establish two groups of experts to examine the French proposals for the re-organization of the productive and financial work of NATO. It is expected that these two groups will begin their work during the second half of October, with priority being given to the production side.

3. Information. The day before the Council met the Deputies announced the appointment of Mr. T.F.M. Newton from the Canadian Consulate in Boston as Director of Information for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This was the first concrete step which the NAT Organization has taken in the information field. Information work was referred to only briefly in the Council meetings. There was some support for the view that the publicity organization working through national bodies rather than through a central production agency, should be small and on a trial basis.

III. CONCLUSION

1. In general, it may be said that for the first time the Council is functioning in the way it was intended, by Canada at least, when the North Atlantic Treaty was signed. There was useful and frank discussion and there were genuine exchanges of ideas. It would appear, therefore, that the Council has avoided the danger of becoming a merely formal body.

Some of the representatives of smaller countries on the Council, notably the Netherlands, have expressed genuine concern not only that the Council would become a rubber stamp, but that the smaller nations were tending to be subjected unduly to decisions of the "Big Three" in matters of foreign policy. Both the trend and the complaints are no doubt to some extent unavoidable but in the Council the role of the smaller nations was much more than that of the acquiescent minority. The differences among the "Big Three" on questions such as German rearmament provided continuing opportunities for the smaller countries to make their opinion felt.

In concrete decisions the accomplishments of the Council were considerable even though they were unable to agree on the role of Germany in European defence. In accepting the concept of an integrated force, member governments have taken the biggest step forward towards the defence of the West since the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty. The re-organization of the Treaty by consolidating the scattered strength of the West will in itself contribute to the security of the North Atlantic Treaty area. The decisions and discussions on the economic aspects of the Treaty, while not as far reaching as those on the military side, will, nevertheless, contribute substantially to the industrial power of the West which is now great in potential but woefully weak in reality.

I. DEFENCE PLANNING; CANADIAN REQUIREMENTS UNDER THE MEDIUM TERM DEFENCE PLAN OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

1. The Minister of National Defence said that the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would meet on October 28th, preceded by a meeting of the Military Committee on the 24th. In addition, at the initiative of the U.S. Secretary of Defense, a meeting of representatives of the Defence Ministers had been called for October 18th. It was proposed that Canada should be represented at the latter by the Deputy Minister of National Defence and an official from the Department of External Affairs.

There were a number of extremely important and difficult questions which would be under discussion and it would be useful if some general guidance as well as instructions on specific points could be given by the Committee on the attitude that should be taken by Canadian representatives on the various questions which would arise during the course of the meetings.

2. Mr. Claxton recalled that with the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization the nature of planning had changed. Previously, plans based on military requirements and agreed to by the planners of the countries concerned had not bound the Chiefs of Staff or the government. Cabinet had only to consider plans when it became necessary to take steps to implement them. Now, however, it was considered that when a country, planning with other countries, agreed on requirements, it was making at least a moral commitment to assume responsibility for its share of filling such requirements.

Last August, the Standing Group had circulated a questionnaire asking the N.A.T.O. countries to provide lists of requirements and deficiencies involved in making good the Medium Term Defence Plan shown by the years 1951, 52, 53 and 54, together with an indication of the cost involved.

The North Atlantic Council, last September, at its session in New York, had passed a resolution concerning the revision of the major force levels of the Medium Term Defence Plan in order to determine exactly what were the force levels required for the defence of the West, based on military considerations alone. The Council had recommended: "that member governments upon being advised by the Council of the provisions of the revised Medium Term Defence Plan and the respective contributions required thereby, consider as a matter of urgency the acceptance of the Plan and the taking of such measures as may be necessary as rapidly as possible to meet the contributions required of them, on the assumption that the necessary complementary action in the fields of production and finance will be taken to provide the equipment required." This resolution in effect placed integrated force requirements in the category of moral commitments. Accordingly, force requirements to all intents and purposes had become statements of approved Armed Forces development programmes.

This would be particularly true in the case of Canada, as our position was unique. Alone among N.A.T.O. countries, we would not be looking to the U.S. for assistance. Those N.A.T.O countries which would be receiving assistance from the United States were indeed, under the terms of the Council's resolution, required to put forward plans without any regard for their capacity to meet them financially. Fulfilment of these plans would be considered as dependent to a great extent on U.S. aid. However, as Canada was not accepting financial or other aid from the U.S., any planning requirements which are shown in the N.A.T.O. Medium Term Defence Plan as Canadian responsibilities would have to be discharged entirely from Canadian resources. If we put forward anything now, we must be prepared to carry it out.

Under the approved arrangements for N.A.T.O. defence planning, Canada, as a member of two regional groups, had participated in the preparation of short-term and medium-term plans for the North Atlantic Ocean Regional Planning Group and the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group. In conformity with approved N.A.T.O. policy, Canadian participation in the former involved the provision of forces to control the sea and air lines of communication in the Atlantic and northern North Sea. Plans had been produced under which Canada would assume 10% of the responsibility for defensive operations in terms of manpower and ships; the U.S. 50% and the U.K. 40%. The U.K. and the U.S. would of course be responsible for offensive Naval operations both in the North Atlantic and elsewhere. In actual fact, under present plans Canada would only be able to assume 4% of the responsibility in the North Atlantic at the outbreak of hostilities.

In order for Canada to assume the 10% agreed on, an effort would be involved which, if looked at as an isolated contribution, appeared reasonable and appropriate both from a strategic point of view and in terms of the financial and manpower contribution that would be necessary. However, when this effort was taken in conjunction with all other defence requirements the total involved something much larger than had been contemplated up to the present as a fitting one.

With respect to the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group, Canadian participation involved:

(a) the defence of home territory against air or airborne attacks and the defence of coastal waters; and

(b) the expeditious provision of land and air reinforcements for other regional groups.

The United States and Canada had produced intelligence appreciations indicating the forms and scales of attack contemplated on the region for the short-term plan and the medium-term plan. Based on those intelligence appreciations, approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries, Canadian planners in cooperation with U.S. planners, developed plans indicating the forms and scales of attack. Word had been received today that, for reasons as yet unknown, the U.S. Chiefs of Staff had not approved the plan. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had had it under consideration and were anxious for instructions and guidance from the Committee on the attitude they should take.

An explanatory memorandum has been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 12, 1950 — Cabinet Document D-263)†

3. Mr. Claxton said that the requirements for the three forces under the Medium Term Defence Plan, taken together, would require large additional sums of money to implement them. Further, while in preparing plans an endeavour had been made to restrict manpower requirements to the numbers that we were likely to be able to secure from voluntary recruiting, at the present rate it was unlikely that in the case of officers the required number could be raised to suitable standards.

While it had not yet been possible to work out the cost for 1951-52 of the programme already approved, it appeared that this might amount to considerably more than originally anticipated requiring additional expenditures without the assumption of any further commitments under the Medium Term Defence Plan.

In the circumstances, if we were not prepared to assume substantially greater obligations it might be necessary to level off the recruiting programme and, at the forthcoming meetings in Washington, indicate quite clearly that Canada was not prepared to go beyond the defence programmes for 1951-52-53 that had already been approved by the government. It might, however, be further indicated that, if in 1953 the international situation warranted it, the defence programmes might be greatly accelerated by calling out reserves so as to meet the figures shown in the Medium Term Defence Plan for July 1, 1954, by that date.

4. The Prime Minister said that it was difficult to approve second steps when it was not yet known what was involved in the taking of the first step. At present, the question of what Canada would be required to provide towards the proposed integrated force in Europe was still unanswered. Before we were in a position to determine what should be done in 1952 or 1953, it was necessary to know what our immediate contribution to the integrated force should be. Canada would have to do her part in making the Europeans realize that the plan was a genuine one intended to prevent their countries from being over-run. If we could do this, then they would be encouraged to do as much as possible for themselves.

5. The Minister of Finance suggested that it was putting the cart before the horse to indicate a further Canadian contribution before we were aware of the requirements. He suggested that we should say at the present time that we were committed to programmes which had already been approved by the government and that at the moment there was no intention to go beyond these. It was difficult to evaluate the potential contribution that might be made by this country, as this depended directly on the state of mind of the people which changed according to the international climate.

6. Mr. St-Laurent said that as we were not a recipient of American military assistance but rather a contributor in our own right, we must be given some clear indication of the way in which we could best contribute to joint strength. Then it would be the responsibility of the government to say what could best be done from the remaining available resources and manpower. Before additional commitments could be made, a more concrete approach to the way in which the joint strength was going to be built up was necessary.

7. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that there was a distinction between the stage in reality that had been reached in planning for the integrated force and in the general Medium Term Defence Plan. It appeared that a more precise policy with regard to a Canadian contribution to the integrated force was necessary at present than was the case with the Medium Term Defence Plan generally.

8. The Chief of the General Staff observed that plans for an integrated force were part of the Medium Term Defence Plan. Formerly there had been no planning requirements for Canadian or American forces stationed in Europe until after D-Day. Now it was considered that if the force was to be an adequate deterrent, North America must contribute towards its strength.

In this plan, General Foulkes said, we were bound to some extent to be influenced by the opinions of all our North Atlantic partners. With regard to planning for the defence of Canada and the U.S., this was solely the joint responsibility of the two countries and we were bound only by our own views. It was suggested that it was not necessary to have 100% of the requirements indicated for 1954 unless the international situation changed in the meantime. The date was arbitrary — not based solely on considerations of intelligence. It might be possible to assume rather greater risks than contemplated in the plan. The situation could be reviewed again in 1953 and, if the government felt that it was warranted, by using a nucleus of regular troops filled out with well-trained reservists, within a few months we could have the force required for 1954 under the Medium Term Defence Plan.

9. Mr. St-Laurent thought that if we were going to put a much greater effort into a deterrent force in Europe this should be because we expect that force to be effective, thus reducing the strength to some extent of the defensive force required in Canada.

With respect to the Canadian contribution to the integrated force, at present it appeared that there were no requirements for it other than in Korea or Europe and we might indicate our intention to make it available for one or the other, subject of course to the approval of Parliament in the case of Europe.

10. Mr. Claxton suggested that at the forthcoming meetings of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Washington, Canada should support the inclusion of West German forces in the integrated force as essential to its success. A practical beginning was the raising of para-military formations at first from volunteers, gradually worked up into formations below divisional levels. It had been reported that there was a chance of the French Government accepting a scheme along these lines.

11. Mr. St-Laurent said that it would be unrealistic to plan to defend Western Europe against Western Germany. If there were to be a war, the West Germans could not remain neutral and it was essential that they should be on our side. Participation of German units in an integrated European force was a difficult principle for some of the continental European countries to accept. Canada should support the attainment of this objective in as rapid and effective a manner as was consistent with the unanimity of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

12. Mr. Claxton said that Canada might find herself the only country not answering the questionnaire of the Standing Group with regard to requirements and costs for the Medium Term Defence Plan. It was suggested that the Chief of the General Staff might discuss the question with senior American officers in Washington in order to determine what they proposed to do and to put forward our view that we could not undertake future commitments until we knew what was required for the present. If an answer was still required, then it might be made in terms of plans already approved for 1951, 52 and 53, but for 1954 it could be indicated that by a big acceleration of the defence programme and by calling out part of our reserves, we could if necessary meet the 1954 requirements. While the approach made by the Standing Group was unrealistic, it would be undesirable to put Canada in the position of not responding to the questionnaire, even though, because of our position, it would have a greater significance than in the case of the other countries.

13. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that in the forthcoming meetings in Washington of representatives of the Defence Ministers, the Military Committee and the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canadian representatives should indicate that no further defence commitments could now be made for 1951, 1952 or 1953 beyond those already approved by the government, subject of course to revision in the light of changing circumstances;

(b) that for 1954 it be indicated that, should international conditions in 1953 warrant it, the Canadian government would consider, by accelerating the defence effort and calling out reservists, meeting the Canadian contribution indicated for the Medium Term Defence Plan;

(c) that it be indicated that the Canadian Special Force had been raised to meet Canadian obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or the United Nations and that as it appeared that the only requirements existing for it in the present circumstances were either as part of the U.N. force in Korea or the planned integrated force for Western Europe, the government would be prepared to make it available, should the circumstances remain the same, for whichever purpose seemed most desirable, subject to the approval of Parliament in the case of the integrated force;

(d) that Canada should support the inclusion of West German units in an integrated force for Europe in as rapid and effective a manner as was consistent with unanimity among the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization;

(e) that it also be indicated that Canada was planning to send a squadron of fighter aircraft to the United Kingdom for operational training in 1951, to be followed possibly by two more in the same year — these to be relieved by others on a rotational basis;

(f) that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, meet at an early date with the American Chiefs of Staff in Washington, in order to point out to the latter the difficulties involved in Canada answering the Standing Group questionnaire concerning requirements and costs to meet the Medium Term Defence Plan;

(g) that if, nevertheless, it still appeared desirable to make an answer, this should be done in terms of the programmes already approved by the government for 1951, extended into 1952 and 1953, while for 1954 it be indicated that the figures might be met by calling up reserves, etc., if, later, this appeared desirable.

II. SIMPLIFICATION OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

14. The Minister of National Defence made certain specific proposals regarding instructions to the Canadian representatives to the forthcoming meetings of representatives of the Defence Ministers, the Military Committee and the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Washington.

15. The Committee, after discussion, agreed: (a) that Canadian representatives to the forthcoming meetings in Washington of representatives of the Defence Ministers, the Military Committee and the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization should support the following changes in the organization:

(i) One Council of Ministers should take the place of the three already in existence, where ministers might represent their countries either singly or collectively, as appropriate.

(ii) As a result of such a move, the Deputies, as the Continuing Executive for the new Council, would have increased status and responsibilities, and would assume responsibility for the Working Staffs dealing with financial supply and economic matters;

(iii) The Standing Group should assume the functions of a Combined Chiefs of Staff with however, the accredited representation having real access to information and plans and opportunities for consultation and discussion;

(iv) A Supreme Commander, responsible to the Standing Group, should be ultimately appointed for the integrated forces in Western Europe;

(v) The status of the Military Committee would be changed in conformity with the new arrangements; and

(b) that the Deputy Minister of National Defence and an official from External Affairs represent Canada at the meeting of the representatives of Defence Ministers to be held on October 18.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following is repetition of message sent from Canadian Joint Staff, Washington to Chiefs of Staff Committee. Text begins:
Following from Drury, Begins:

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE COMMITTEE PREPARATORY MEETINGS

1. The Preparatory Group got under way yesterday afternoon in the Pentagon under Lovett's Chairmanship. He explained that Mr. Marshall's idea in calling the meeting was to "clear away some of the underbrush" from the Defence Committee's agenda, especially on the subjects that were primarily political rather than technical. He therefore proposed that we should go through the Defence Committee's agenda and see what we could usefully tackle.

2. We therefore turned to the fourth draft of the Defence Committee's agenda† which you have. Lovett explained that under Item 2, defence planning, progress reports would be noted by the Defence Committee on:

(a) Military production and supply

(b) The Standing Group's progress in military planning generally and

(c) The status of short term plans.

3. No action would have to be taken by the Defence Committee from these reports which, especially in the case of the short term plan, would simply serve to underline the inadequacy of the present state of our defences.

4. Under Item 3 there would be an examination of medium term defence plans, as requested by the Council in its resolution (C5 D5). This would lead to a review of the adequacy of the force levels for 1951 under the plan. Lovett did not say much about this item but we gather informally that a final revision of the inflated medium term plan approved at The Hague meeting of the Defence Committee will not be ready in time for consideration by the Military and Defence Committees next week although there may be more precise information on 1951 force levels than on 1954 targets.

5. Item 4, on German participation in an integrated force, will of course be the most difficult item on the Defence Committee's agenda. Lovett explained that the United States delegation would have a paper for distribution to the Preparatory Group at the next meeting which is this afternoon. (I shall be bringing copies of this paper when I return to Ottawa this evening). The United States paper will deal only with the technical aspects of German participation and not with the principles which would of course have to be discussed by the Ministers. Indeed, Lovett said, the whole subject was so much a political one that it was being reserved for the Defence Committee and would not go through the Military Committee. It was in order to give the Defence Ministers an opportunity to study the United States paper in advance and, through their personal representatives in Washington to ask questions or make comments on it, that the United States delegation was proposing to circulate their paper. Any delegation that did not wish to make comments he added, need not of course feel bound to do so before the meeting of the Defence Committee.

6. The French Ambassador, [Henri] Bonnet, objected quite strongly to the proposal that there should be any discussion of a United States paper on German participation before the questions came before the Ministers as he believed that a discussion of the technical aspects before the principles were agreed would be both premature and prejudicial to final agreement. His fears were not allayed by Lovett's explanations and he implied that the procedure proposed by the Chairman was a violation of the assurances given by Mr. Marshall to Mr. Moch that the whole subject would be reserved for Ministers. Lovett held firm, basing his case on the Council request (Resolution C5 D11) for technical recommendations from the Defence Committee on German participation, and the need to prepare the ground (with whatever delegations wished to do so) so that Ministers would not be faced, as they had been in New York, with a United States paper which they had never seen before. He agreed with Bonnet that there could be no question of pre-judging agreement on principles before the Ministers met but he hoped that the clarification of some of the technical aspects, including a more detailed examination of possible safe-guards than had been presented in New York, would facilitate a discussion of principles by Ministers and give them an opportunity, before they met, to consult with their Governments.

7. On Item 5, there was no discussion of the integrated force proposals which are to come before the Military Committee.

8. As regards Item 6, Lovett announced that the United States paper on the reorganization of the Military Production and supply Board would not be put forward, as the subject was already being considered by the Deputies and the experts of their Working Group, but if other delegations wished to make proposals they were of course free to do so. No one indicated that they would have proposals to put forward under this item which I think more properly belongs to the Deputies at this stage.

9. Finally, Lovett indicated that Mr. Marshall would like the Preparatory Group to meet again on Monday for a discussion of the paper on German participation that is to be circulated at today's meeting and again whenever possible between the meetings of the Military and Defence Committees. There would be political aspects of the Military Committee's work on which the group could do useful preparation for the Ministers and they might also give consideration to the terms of a press communiqué for the Defence Committee as well as the questions as to the date and place, and Chairmanship of the next meeting of the Defence Committee.

10. From this rather unproductive meeting, we at least have a clearer conception of what the United States delegation has in mind as the role of the Preparatory Group. What is less clear is whether the French will agree even to be present for a discussion of the United States paper on German participation, which is the major item on the Preparatory Group's agenda. The United States delegation recognizes this danger but proposes to go ahead anyway. If the discussion at this afternoon's meeting makes a walkout appear possible, I may propose that the Preparatory Group should not meet again until October 25th when we should have more chance of knowing the preliminary views of our Governments on the United States paper and when we should also have other items from the Military Committee for discussion.

11. In a separate message, the Embassy is reporting to External Affairs on State Department views on the French position on German rearmament.

12. I am repeating this message on the Embassy circuit to External Affairs. Text ends. Message ends.

DEFENCE COMMITTEE PREPARATORY MEETINGS

Reference Drury's message repeated in my teletype WA-2590 regarding the Defence Committee preparatory meetings, this is a supplemental message dealing with the French reaction to United States proposals on German rearmament.

2. I reported in my message WA-2495 of October 12th† some State Department views on the French reactions to the question of German rearmament based upon talks between Ignatieff and MacArthur. MacArthur had a further talk with Messrs. Drury, Ignatieff and George yesterday. MacArthur said that Bonnet's reaction at the meeting of the Defence Ministers' Deputies yesterday came as a surprise to Mr. Lovett and the other United States officials concerned. Bonnet professed that it was his understanding that there would be no preparatory work done on the German rearmament question until the Defence Ministers themselves meet on the 28th. He did not object to the idea of having a United States working paper circulated, but thought that it should not be discussed until the Defence Ministers make a decision on the main principle of whether Germany should be rearmed and German forces amalgamated with the projected European integrated force. He said that there had apparently been some misunderstanding between the French and the United States representatives on this point, evidently alluding to the talks between M. Moch and General Marshall which took place earlier this week.

3. Lovett was quite firm in his response to Bonnet, saying that, as far as he knew, there had been no misunderstanding. He said that it was quite evident that the Defence Ministers' Deputies could, and should, discuss this question since the Defence Committee's agenda included the item "contribution of Germany to the defence of western Europe". He recalled, moreover, that the Council had asked the Defence Ministers to recommend the terms under which German forces might be utilized for the defence of Europe, including the kind of safeguards that should be applied and that the United States paper had been drafted on that understanding.

4. MacArthur recognizes that the raising of the problem of German rearmament poses a critical political problem for the French Government. The French representatives have argued that the acceptance by the French Government of a proposal to rearm Germany before France herself is rearmed under the new defence effort would almost certainly lead to the defeat of the Government in the Assembly. Jules Moch, the Defence Minister, is personally almost fanatically opposed to German rearmament. Of Jewish origin, Moch suffered from German persecution and his son died a cruel death at the hands of the Gestapo. The French, moreover, argue that they are anxious to institute a new electoral law which would deprive the Communists of some of the advantages they now have under proportional representation in the Assembly, before the next general elections are held. If general elections are precipitated by the pressing of the German rearmament question, the Communists would probably be returned in roughly the same strength in the Assembly and would continue to hamper the defence effort from the opposition benches. The French, therefore, propose postponing a decision on the German rearmament question, at least until the electoral reform has been conducted by the Assembly and general elections have been held on the basis of this new law, possibly in May.

5. In opposition to these arguments, MacArthur says that, in the opinion of the United States authorities who have studied the question, the consideration of the question of German rearmament cannot be postponed until some time next year when the general elections in France have been held. He said that the real danger was that the old military clique in West Germany would conspire to rearm Germany and then undertake to unify Germany by force, which might involve the Western Powers in a general war. It was therefore thought essential by the United States authorities that the German military strength should be amalgamated from the very start within the framework of the integrated plan for the defence of Europe and be subject to adequate safeguards to ensure that German militarism does not endanger peace again. Moreover, MacArthur believes that French public opinion is probably ahead of the Government in being prepared to accept German rearmament, subject to proper safeguards. He indicated that, in any case, the United States Government is not prepared to follow the French in postponing a decision of this important issue indefinitely and would like to canvass the opinions of other Governments in the North Atlantic Treaty organization on this question. He believes, for instance, that substantial support would be forthcoming for the United States position from The Netherlands, Belgian, Norwegian, and probably the Italian Governments. He also indicated that a further expression of opinion from the Canadian Government through the Defence Ministers' Deputies, as well as by the Defence Ministers when they meet, would be very welcome.

6. As the situation now stands, the United States working paper, which has been prepared as a result of interdepartmental consultation in Washington, (in which the Defence Department apparently has taken the initiative, but in which the State Department Bureau of German Affairs under Byroade has also been very active) will be distributed today. The French will probably again raise the procedural objection that it should not be discussed before the Defence Ministers meet on the 28th. This procedural question will have to be decided by discussion and Lovett, I gather, expects that the majority of opinion among the Defence Ministers' Deputies will favour a full consideration of the United States paper. The purpose of the discussion on the substance of the paper would be to improve the text, particularly those parts which refer to the kind of safeguards which are needed to govern German rearmament in order that the Defence Ministers will have a better paper on which to base their discussion.

DEFENCE COMMITTEE PREPARATORY MEETINGS

1. Reference my messages WA-2590 and 2591, Mr. Claxton will no doubt have received personally from Mr. Drury, on his return to Ottawa, an account of yesterday's meeting, but following is a report of the discussion prepared by Ignatieff.

2. The second of the preparatory meetings for the Defence Committee was again occupied principally with a dialogue between Messrs. Lovett and Bonnet on the procedure to govern the discussion of the United States proposals on German rearmament. The French Ambassador began by giving an explanation of his understanding of how the misunderstanding had arisen between the United States and French Governments. He recalled that, initially, the French Government had declined to participate in these preparatory meetings on the grounds that they were unnecessary. Later, when Jules Moch visited Washington, he agreed to have a French representative take part in the discussions, on the understanding that the discussion of the question of German rearmament would not be taken up until the Defence Ministers themselves meet on 28th October. Bonnet said that M. Moch's understanding of the purpose of the preparatory meetings was that the Defence Ministers' representatives would go through the documents which would come up for consideration by the Defence Ministers and would prepare a commentary on these papers, bringing out the more important issues requiring Ministerial consideration. He emphasized that M. Moch's understanding was this preparatory work would not include the item on Germany.

3. Mr. Lovett was completely unmoved by M. Bonnet's arguments which were put forward more than once to the Committee. He recalled that the invitation, as originally sent out, included all the items of the Defence Committee's agenda and there had never been a suggestion that the consideration of any one item should be excluded from the responsibilities of the Defence Ministers' Deputies. Moreover, Lovett said that he had not understood that the French had suggested that any item should be excluded from the discussion at these meetings, nor was the French Government, indeed in a position to prevent the discussion of any item. His understanding was that the French Government had reserved its decision on this whole matter and that if the French representative did not wish to take part in the discussion of the item on Germany, he was perfectly at liberty to attend the meetings in the capacity of an observer only , and would not have to assume any responsibility for the views expressed by the Deputies.

4. There were several other exchanges between Bonnet and Lovett in which, incidentally, Bonnet mentioned that the reason that the French Government did not wish the German question should be taken up until 28th October, was that the whole question of rearmament and the possible German relationship to it would be debated in the Assembly and the French Cabinet would await the results of this debate before defining the French position on German rearmament. He recalled that France was a directly "interested party" in relation to this question. Lovett concluded the exchange rather abruptly by saying that the French position had been made abundantly clear, and suggested that the Committee should go on to the discussion of other matters, and expressed the hope that the instructions of the French Ambassador might be "expanded" on this question. Bonnet made it clear that he was awaiting instructions from Paris on what position he should take.

5. United States recommendations regarding German contributions to the defence of Western Europe were distributed to the Deputies in a paper (D.C. (Dep) 1, 19th October)[70] and Messrs. Drury and George have taken copies back with them to Ottawa.

6. The only other question discussed was the suggestion from Lovett that the Deputies might consider the relationship which the Brussels Treaty Powers should have to the NATO military structure as reorganized. Lovett specifically referred to the proposals previously submitted by the French Government to the Council Deputies in this connection. He suggested that informal consultations might take place in Washington between the representatives of the Brussels Treaty Organization and NATO in consequence of the reorganization now contemplated. This idea was generally approved. The question then arose as to when the Brussels Treaty representatives might meet and Mr. Drury made the suggestion that this consultation might take place on Monday, leaving the detailed discussion of the United States proposals on German rearmament until Wednesday, October 25th, which would give more time for representatives to consult their respective Governments. This idea, however, was not favoured by Mr. Lovett, although Mr. Drury's suggestion was supported by Messrs. Bonnet and Kauffmann (Denmark). It was agree that the preparatory meeting would proceed with the discussion on the United States paper on "recommendations by the Defence Committee regarding German contributions to the defence of Western Europe" (D.C. (Dep)1, 19th October) on Monday, 23rd October at 4. p.m.[71]

[70] Ce document reprenait en grande partie le libellé du texte diffusé le 26 octobre 1950 par la délégation américaine au Comité de la défense et que l'on trouve dans :/This paper was substantially the same as the text circulated by the American delegation to the Defence Committee on October 26, 1950 and printed in:/United States, Department of State, FRUS, 1950, Volume III, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1977, pp. 406-409.

7. The United States representatives at these meetings evidently want to get on with the discussion of the United States paper on Germany before the recommendations of the Military Committee, which are to be reviewed by the Deputies of the Defence Ministers, divert their attention from the German problem. However, it is questionable whether many of the representatives present will have had an opportunity of getting instructions on the United States paper in time to enable useful discussion to take place on Monday. Possibly the United Kingdom comments, at least, may be forthcoming, as the United Kingdom Embassy is equipped with a special Attaché to deal with German problems, in addition, of course, to having a wealth of experience to draw on as a result of their role as an occupying Power.

NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION ON GERMAN PARTICIPATION IN THE DEFENCE OF WESTERN EUROPE

The U.S. Defence Department, with the assistance of the Department of State, have prepared a draft recommendation from the North Atlantic Defence Committee to the Council, in answer to the Council's resolution C5 D/11 asking the Defence Committee how Western Germany could make its most useful contribution to the defence of Western Europe. The U.S. paper is intended to serve as a draft reply for consideration by Ministers when the Defence Committee meets on October 28. It has been circulated to the Preparatory Group of the personal representatives of [71] Évidemment, le comité préparatoire ne s'est pas réuni de nouveau; le document américain a par la suite été étudié lors de la réunion du Comité de la défense tenue le 28 octobre 1950.

Evidently, the preparatory committee did not re-assemble and the American paper was subsequently discussed at the Defence Committee Meeting which convened on October 28, 1950.

Ministers which met in Washington on October 18 and 19 and is to meet again on October 23 when the U.S. Delegation have indicated that they would like informal comments from the representatives of other countries. It is understood that any comments which other representatives may wish to make would be taken as their personal comments and not as those of their Governments whose views would be given by their Defence Ministers on October 28.

2. Although Mr. Drury, as the representative of Mr. Claxton in the Preparatory Group, will not have to speak for his Minister, it is desirable that on October 23 he should be in a position to indicate, generally speaking, any Canadian views or misgivings on the U.S. paper so that a better paper can, if possible, be prepared before the meeting of Ministers.

3. Our comments may be divided between (A) those bearing on the paper itself and (B) those that have to do with what might be said about the paper in the Defence Committee or in the Preparatory Group.

4. In the first place, then, we have the following comments on the paper itself:

(a) The recommendations advanced by the United States as regards the most effective way in which Western Germany could participate in the defence of the West, and as regards the most effective safeguards, appear technically sound.

(b) The wording of the paper could, in several places, be improved and clarified; small changes of phrasing, as distinct from changes of substance, should be suggested by the members of the Canadian Delegation who could perhaps take up such points informally with the U.S. Delegation during the Preparatory Group meetings next week.

(c) As an additional safeguard, it might perhaps be suggested that the length of service in German units should be fixed so that German units could not be used, as they were by the Weimar Republic, for training a large number of men brought into the forces for short periods of service. (This argument could be based on purely military considerations: the length of service required by the Supremo for units of the integrated force.)

(d) The safeguard contained in sub-paragraph (c) of the U.S. paper is considered unrealistic and unnecessary, as it might be difficult to find an appropriate civilian who had not served in the German Forces during the past 10 years.

(e) On the other hand, sub-paragraph (d) of the U.S. paper might be strengthened by saying that "There should be established ..." an Inspector General, rather than "Consideration should be given to the establishment ...".

(f) In the last sentence of sub-paragraph (f) of the U.S. paper, it might be made clearer that the defence costs of which the German Government must bear its share are those of defence production, as it has already been stated at the bottom of the first page of the U.S. paper that the German Government should pay for the recruitment, uniform, pay and accommodation of German units.

5. As regards what might be said in Committee about the U.S. paper, our comments are a good deal more general. Perhaps the chief point to make is that, in the Preparatory Group, the representatives of Defence Ministers will not be asked to make comments on the political assumptions of the paper but only on its technical aspects. However, it seems impossible to divorce the two considerations and we have, therefore, tried to put on paper some tentative views as to the political setting in which the U.S. paper will have to be discussed at the meeting of the Defence Ministers.

6. Our first proposition is that safeguards, however carefully framed, may not endure much longer than the establishment of a fully independent West German Government. From this reasonable expectation it follows that, in the final analysis, only the integration of Western Germany in the Western community can ultimately protect the other nations of Western Europe from a resurgence of German militarism.

7. Second, it would be desirable (if it is politically feasible) for the French and others to be given some assurance, even an informal one, that the Americans are thinking in longer terms in their planning for the establishment of an integrated force in Western Europe. Plans calling for the creation of an integrated force by 1954 leave open the question of how long U.S. forces will continue to remain in Europe. On the other hand, the French themselves must realize that Western Europe has little chance of surviving in the face of Russian power in anything like its present form unless the Americans remain in Europe, so they have, in effect, no option but to plan on the assumption that the United States will not build up German units and then withdraw from the Continent.

8. Our final proposition is that we should not be led by the logic of the purely military argument into pressing the French too hard for an immediate agreement on a programme that has immense political difficulties for them and, in any case, cannot be implemented immediately. As the timing of military planning is basic to some of the French misgivings, it might be helpful if more attention were given either in the paper itself or in the discussion of the paper by Ministers, to the probable timetable. For example, we do not have authoritative military answers to the following questions:

(a) When can we expect the establishment of an integrated force in Europe? (That is, when will the first United States divisions under SHAPE probably arrive in Europe?)

(b) How long would it take for present and planned production programmes in North Atlantic countries to turn out enough equipment for not only North Atlantic units which are to be formed but also for German units to participate in the integrated force?

(c) How long are we planning to have an integrated force in Europe — for a set number of years or indefinitely?

(d) When are Governments expected to commit themselves to the establishment of an integrated force and the participation of German units in it (Mr. Acheson's "single package" proposal) — at the next meeting of the Council, probably in December?

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; RE-ORGANIZATION

21. The Minister of National Defence recalled that he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs had in recent statements indicated their dissatisfaction with the organization under the North Atlantic Treaty. In this connection, certain proposals were submitted for the simplification of the organization to be put forward at the forthcoming meeting of the Defence Committee in Washington.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 24, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 241-50)[73]

22. The Cabinet, after discussion agreed that, at the forthcoming meeting of the Defence Committee in Washington, the Minister of National Defence should support the simplification of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization along the following lines:

(a) a single Council of Ministers who would be representatives of governments;

(b) a committee of deputies responsible to the Council; and,

(c) considerable simplification on the military side and strengthening of the status of the accredited military representatives to the Standing Group.

WESTERN GERMANY; RE-ARMAMENT

23. The Minister of National Defence reported that, at the recent North Atlantic Council meeting in New York, the U.S. representatives had strongly urged that Western Germany be progressively rearmed. The military situation was such that without this, the defence of Western Europe was a virtual impossibility. France had up to this date resisted the idea in its entirety. However, it was believed that in the long run France would come to accept it.

24. Mr. Claxton said that in his view this was a matter of primary concern to the countries more immediately affected and that while Canada should support the idea of encouraging the establishment and arming of units of Western Germans under the command of the occupying forces it should not be actively pressed and we should take no active part in discussions.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 24, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 241-50)

25. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that, at the forthcoming meeting of the Defence Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Washington, the Canadian representative should support the policy of establishing and arming units of Western Germans under the command of the occupying forces, without actively pressing it.

N.A.T.O.; RECOMMENDATION ON COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

26. The Minister of National Defence reported that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, the Canadian representative to the Military Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization at present meeting in Washington, had informed him that a paper prepared by the Standing Group had been circulated to the Military Committee, in the form of a recommendation from that Committee to the Defence Committee, that all N.A.T.O. governments should require at least eighteen months compulsory military service. It did not appear that the resolution was directed at Canada, the only N.A.T.O. country except Iceland without some form of compulsory military training. The purpose rather seemed to be to increase the period to eighteen months in countries where it was less. From a military point of view, it was considered that it would be unsatisfactory and inefficient if the troops of some countries contributing to the integrated force were enlisted for a shorter period than this.

General Foulkes had made it clear that such a recommendation involved Government policy and was quite beyond the terms of reference of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff. The recommendation had been passed to the Defence Committee, with Norway, Iceland and Canada reserving their positions. It was being considered that day by the Defence Deputies and the Deputy Minister of National Defence, our representative, had been instructed that he should take the strongest possible exception to it, pointing out that the question of how troops were enlisted in Canada was a purely domestic one and that the Canadian Government would be quite unprepared to accept any direction from N.A.T.O. in a matter which it considered came solely within its own competence. It had been suggested to Mr. Drury that he ask the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to put this point of view to the U.S. Secretary of State.

Mr. Drury, General Foulkes and Mr. Wrong had discussed the question and suggested that Canada might:

(i) take the view that it was purely a military recommendation and consequently only applicable to those countries which had conscription;

(ii) seek to have the recommendation amended so that it was formally made applicable only to those countries with conscription in force; and

(iii) oppose the recommendation as an unjustifiable and unwarranted interference in domestic affairs.

27. The Prime Minister said that there could be no question of having N.A.T.O. determine the domestic policy of Canada. While the appropriate military authorities of the latter body were concerned with the size and effectiveness of the forces raised by member nations, recruiting policy was solely a concern of individual governments. Effective participation in an international organization might involve giving up some of our sovereignty but it was for each government to decide what powers would be abandoned.

28. Mr. St-Laurent suggested that as the period of enlistment of troops making up the national components of the integrated force was a question of concern to the military authorities, and as the method of enlistment was of no concern to them whatsoever, we might seek to have the resolution amended so that it would set out a minimum term of service without specifying the method of enlistment.

29. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Canadian representative at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization meetings taking place in Washington point out that the Canadian Government considered the proposed recommendation of the Military Committee on compulsory military training to affect purely domestic policy in each country, quite beyond the competence of the military authorities; and,

(b) that an amendment be sought to the recommendation so that it would set out a minimum term of service without specifying the method of enlistment.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My immediately preceding teletype† re North Atlantic Defence Committee.

1. Standing Group Paper on Mobilization and Training. As I reported yesterday in our message WA-2713;† we made a point of telling all N.A.T. delegations the importance the Canadian Government attached to the amendment which we had circulated yesterday, to enable us to support Document MC-24 (now renumbered as DC-25), extracts of which were sent to you in our message WA-2683 of October 25th.†

2. The results of our work yesterday were immediately apparent today. Mr. Claxton observed in presenting his amendment that the preparation of the paper had not taken into account the situation in all North Atlantic countries. Shinwell supported the amendment but suggested, not too helpfully, that in place of the words we wished added to the first sentence of paragraph 6 of the paper, the words "in conformity with national requirements" should be substituted. Mr. Claxton agreed to add these words to our amendment which was then unanimously carried. The text of DC-25 has therefore been amended by adding the words "or an adequate organized volunteer reserve in conformity with national requirements" to the first sentence of paragraph 6 and the word "concerned" after the word "nation" in paragraph 17B.

3. In further discussion of the paper, reservations of one kind or another were made by the Norwegian, French, Italian and Danish representatives. This led to a rather spirited and unnecessary exchange between Moch and Shinwell in which Shinwell said that he did not think that the French were doing enough in extending their military service from twelve to fifteen months. Moch had explained that the French law now permitted a period of service of eighteen months, but they did not have the equipment for more than fifteen months' service at present. Moch replied that as there were many fewer exemptions in each class called up under the French system, they were in fact doing proportionately more than the British with their twenty-four month period of service; in any case, they could not do better than they were while 30 percent to 40 percent of their effectives were fighting in Indo-China.

4. Iceland also entered a formal reservation as she has no defence forces.

5. The medium-term defence plan was the next subject discussed and will be reported in my immediately following message. Ends.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My immediately preceding teletype WA-2733 re North Atlantic Defence Committee.

MEDIUM-TERM DEFENCE PLAN

1. The Belgian Defence Minister, Colonel [E.V.G.] de Greef, said he did not see why the force, which the Standing Group were asking Belgium to provide, should be proportionately larger than those which, for example, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom were being asked to provide. Under the present table of force, Belgium would be the N.A. country which would have to resort to a two-year period of military service to meet its contribution. He thought the Standing Group should reconsider the figures, and that the load should be more equitably shared.

2. Hansen[74] expressed dissatisfaction with the lack of United States and United Kingdom support for the northern European region, and said flatly that Denmark could not defend itself (now or in 1954) unless there were immediate help within the first few days of an attack. The so-called "forward strategy" to be adopted under the medium-term plan for moving the line further east in Germany would help Denmark, but would not be a substitute for assistance from United Kingdom and United States troops.

3. Shinwell then made a long statement in which he pointed out a number of the shortcomings of the medium-term plan, such as the lack of specific information as to how much it would cost, collectively and individually by countries. He said the United Kingdom had been trying to settle their three-year build-up programme based on the medium-term plan which would cost £3,600 million. He added that in his opinion the financial factor, on which the execution of such a large programme was dependent should not be permitted to prevent countries from making their appropriate contribution. Nevertheless he approved the plan.

[74] Rasmus Hansen, ministre de la Défense du Danemark.
Rasmus Hansen, Minister of Defence of Denmark.

4. General Marshall then spoke in support of the plan, recognizing its deficiencies but pointing out that the recommendation was that the national contribution figures be accepted "as initial national targets" and the Standing Group be asked for recommendations as to how to fill the gaps between what regions considered necessary for their defence and what countries were being asked provisionally to contribute. At General Marshall's suggestion, it was agreed that the Standing Group would take the Supreme Commander's recommendations into account in this regard.

5. Mr. Claxton pointed out that the Canadian Government had not seen the medium term plan in its present form as it had been received only on Monday and approved by the Military Committee only yesterday. The reservation which our representative in the Military Committee had made on the air contribution suggested for Canada — some 11 squadrons (total 203 aircraft) — had been necessary because we did not yet know what the requirements of the Canada-United States region would be, as this part of the plan had not been completed.[75] He said that the Canadian Government would give every possible consideration to the plan and the recommendations as to contributions of forces but that it would, in future, help consideration by Governments if plans and suggested contributions of member Governments were discussed with accredited representatives in advance. Mr. Claxton then said he approved the plan as Defence Minister but could not do so on behalf of his Government until his colleagues had had a chance to see and consider it.

6. The plan (DC-28)† was then approved and will go to the Deputies as the basis for production planning in the Military Production and Supply Board.

7. Later in the proceedings Moch referred to the 1/3 of a division which is the contribution suggested by Canada to the western European region by 1954. He made a passing reference to the possibility of Canada doing more. However, from our discussions with other delegations there is no disposition to regard the 1/3 of a division as an inadequate contribution for Canada to make to the integrated force next year. We may, however, be asked by the Standing Group whether our contribution in 1954 especially at D plus 30 and D plus 90, might not be increased.

8. The next item dealt with the costing of the plan — an operation which has not yet been completed. Moch doubted the value of statistical comparisons, introducing somewhat artificial variables in rates of exchange, costs of equipment and materials, and rates of pay. Marshall admitted that the comparison could not be precise but said that there seemed to be no better basis. In answer to a question by Mr. Claxton, General Marshall said frankly, that he did not know what use would be made of the figures when arrived at; they had been asked for by the DFEC and he did not know what that was! The report (DC-27)† was approved.

1. Moch made the opening statement in the discussion of the participation of German units in Western defence. Although he spoke at some length, he did not add very much to Pleven's statement in the French Assembly, the text of which we sent you with our message of October 27th.[76] The chief thing he stressed throughout was that the proposals of the French Government were the only ones that in their view would provide effective safeguards for German participation and in any case were the only ones that the French Government and public would accept. He [76] Voir Documents on International Affairs, 1949-1950, Londres : Royal Institute of International Affairs, Oxford University Press, 1953, pp. 339-344. Lors d'une allocution devant l'Assemblée nationale, le 24 octobre 1950, le premier ministre René Pleven a proposé la création d'une armée européenne liée aux institutions politiques d'une Europe unifiée. Composée de contingents nationaux intégrés dans une unité de la plus petite taille possible, cette armée européenne serait dirigée par un ministre de la Défense supranational, lui-même responsable devant un conseil des ministres qui rendrait compte à une éventuelle Assemblée européenne. La France, a déclaré M. Pleven, avait l'intention d'inviter la Grande-Bretagne et les nations libres de l'Europe continentale à améliorer ces principes généraux dès que serait terminé le plan proposé par le ministre des Affaires étrangères de France, Robert Schuman, pour intégrer au sein d'un même organisme la production du charbon et de l'acier en Europe.

See Documents on International Affairs, 1949-1950, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs-Oxford University Press, 1953, pp. 339-344. In a statement delivered to the National Assembly on October 24, 1950, Prime Minister René Pleven proposed creating a European Army that would be "linked to the political institutions of a unified Europe". Composed of national contingents which would be integrated at the smallest possible unit, the proposed European Army would be headed by a supra-national Minister of Defence, who would be directed by a council of ministers and who would be responsible to some kind of European Assembly. France, Pleven stated, intended to invite Great Britain and the "free nations of continental Europe" to perfect these general principles as soon as the plan proposed by the French Foreign Minister, Robert Schuman, for the integration of European coal and steel production under a single authority had been concluded.

appeared to leave no room for compromise of any kind. He did, however, clarify one or two points that may have been misrepresented in the press.

(a) The French proposals were not, he said, an elaborate device for introducing delay. He believed they would provide a quicker means of bringing Germans into units for the defence of the West than the American plan, which would postpone their incorporation in an integrated force until they had been built up to divisional level.

(b) He challenged the contention that the defence effort of France had been lagging and said that since Korea it compared with those of other countries.

(c) The French plan was a step towards European union but was not, for that reason, a step away from the North Atlantic framework. The European army which was proposed would be placed at the disposal of the North Atlantic Supreme Commander and the European Defence Minister would deal with the Supreme Commander in the same manner as the Defence Ministers of NATO countries outside Europe.

(d) The French were not trying to discriminate permanently against the Germans. Although it might be justifiable to do so, their plan in fact provided an effective means of including German units for the common defence of Western Europe.

2. Without directly attacking the United States proposal Moch said that it was completely impossible for his Government to agree to the creation of German divisions and a German federal agency which would camouflage the resurgence of a German army and general staff. In fact, he argued that the French Government were making a great effort to go in their own way along the lines proposed by the United States Government in September. Whether in the long term or in the short term, he believed that the only way to deal with the German problem was to integrate Germany into a larger European whole. In the creation of a European army, the integration should be at the unit level. (From the United States delegation we learned informally that Moch had told Acheson a battalion was the largest German unit he could contemplate).

3. He then repeated the economic conditions, laid down in Pleven's statement, which must be met before the military question is tackled. He said that this need not introduce long delays. The French were not proposing to wait for the ratification but only for the signature of the Schuman plan. They were prepared to call a conference in Paris eight days after its signature in order to discuss the establishment of a European army and the political structure to which the European Defence Minister would be responsible. To this conference Germans would be invited, like the representatives of other countries, thus avoiding the bargaining that would be inevitable if we were to proceed along the lines suggested in the Acheson plan. The Paris conference might lead to the establishment of a mixed political-military commission to study the execution of the plan once the principles had been agreed.

4. Leaving technical questions aside, he thought that a European army might start on a small experimental scale of 100,000 men with a fixed percentage of Germans in it and be increased as the experience proved satisfactory.

5. No changes in NATO were contemplated.

6. The European army might, he concluded, eventually lead to a United Nations force.

7. It might have been better if the discussion had been terminated at that point but it was allowed to proceed.

8. The Danish and Portuguese representatives both spoke against the French plan and in favour of the more immediately practicable United States proposals. This was followed by a series of categorical questions from Shinwell which provoked very uncompromising answers from Moch. Moch said the French Government could only accept the creation of German military units on condition that they were small and integrated into European divisions; that he did not care whether German units were raised by compulsory or voluntary systems; and that in no circumstances could the French Government approve either the American plan or any interim measures implementing the first stages of the American plan while the French proposals were being studied.

9. Before the meeting ended, Moch made a final plea for the most earnest consideration of his proposals over the weekend. He said we faced a crisis in NATO which could lead to a crisis in the domestic affairs of member countries and he charged us both to ponder the issues and to be discreet in our dealings with the press.

10. General Marshall will make a statement on Monday, probably after allowing other European delegations to speak first. The Dutch are known to be strongly opposed to the French proposals which will probably not receive much support, if any.

11. While the official United States line is to avoid any appearance of brushing off the French proposals, in private the United States delegation make no secret of their annoyance. Rightly or wrongly, they regard the French proposals as nothing more than an elaborate pose to enable Moch to say no to their project. So far as we can find out, they have not decided what they will do, but the fat is clearly in the fire and the debate so far has only served to spread more combustibles. Ends.

TELEGRAM EX-2111 Ottawa, October 28, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Heeney from Reid, Begins: Following are our tentative views on the French proposals. They may be too late for discussion in the Defence Committee, but since the question is unlikely to be settled immediately and since there may well be off the record discussions on the subject, I thought it worthwhile to forward these views.

2. We were interested in WA-2699 of October 26,† giving Acheson's and the State Department's initial comments on the French proposals for utilizing German potential in manpower and materials for the defence of Western Europe. Outright rejection of these proposals could have had serious repercussions in France and also an unfortunate effect on North Atlantic cooperation.

3. We have very little information about the French plan and closer scrutiny may well lead to the conclusion that the proposal to create a Western European army at this stage is impracticable. Nevertheless, since the plan as a whole is founded on the principle of the political and economic integration of Western Europe, which the Minister endorsed in his speech in Parliament on August 29, it would seem illogical to reject it without the most careful consideration.

4. The French are obviously endeavouring to seek a solution to the German problem which would ensure them against a possible eventual withdrawal of United States forces from Europe, whereas the United States proposal for German participation in the defence of Western Europe seems to have been drafted with a view to creating sufficient armed strength to meet the present Soviet threat. The two approaches, although requiring different timing, are not necessarily incompatible. The safeguards proposed by the United States to prevent the revival of German militarism have appeared to us as being superficial and inadequate for a long-term solution of the German problem. Those safeguards can hardly be expected to survive the establishment of an independent Western German Government fully cooperating with other Western Powers. It seems to us that the economic aspects of the Pleven Plan might furnish the main missing component as a principal safeguard against any revival of German militarism.

5. If our reports are correct, however, the enthusiasm of the Germans for participation in the Schuman Plan has waned as United States pressure for German rearmament has increased, since they are acquiring new confidence that they can obtain the economic and political advantages and position they desire in exchange for their contribution to the defence of Western Europe. The timing of any decision to authorize the creation of German armed forces is, therefore, of decisive importance in determining the success or failure of the Schuman Plan. Assuming that this Plan can, in fact, be realized in a comparatively short time, as the French Ambassador in Washington claims, although we are not in a position to share his optimism, it might be worthwhile avoiding any step which would improve the German bargaining position still further at this stage. We should, accordingly, be reluctant to see the United States proposals adopted prematurely. A postponement of a few weeks is unlikely to affect overall defence planning since NATO countries have no equipment to give the Germans at the present time, nor are likely to have for another year.

6. We are in no position to comment on the other aspects of the Pleven Plan, particularly since it suffers from ambiguity and vagueness; at first sight the setting up of a Western European army under supra-national authority would appear to be unrealistic under present conditions. The main point is, however, that the French now seem to be reconciled to some form of German rearmament. An immediate decision one way or another need not affect planning for armament production. To force the issue under such circumstances might not be politically wise, particularly since the decision taken might well lead to the establishment of a new equilibrium on the European continent giving Western Germany much more power than might be healthy. Ends.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My messages WA-2732†, 2733, 2734, 2735 of October 28th and 29th re North Atlantic Defence Committee.

2. The discussion of German participation in the defence of the West began this morning in a much better atmosphere than it had ended on Saturday, though no real progress was made. There had been a good many private consultations over the weekend among delegations as a result of which it was hoped that it might be possible to work out some sort of compromise, provided the French were willing to countenance immediate practical military steps that should be taken while final agreement was being worked out on political ends and the Americans were prepared to have such steps taken in spite of the conditions of the Pleven Plan.

3. De Greef opened the morning's discussion with a helpful statement in which he observed that there now appeared to be unanimity, which had not existed in New York, as to the necessity of including German units, in some way or other, in the defence of the West, and in doing so as soon as possible. The two proposals as to how it should be done that were now before us, the United States and the French, were both worth studying but were both subject to some criticism.

4. In the first place, the United States plan involved serious risks. It meant arming the only one of the Western countries which could provoke the Soviet Union at a time when "we have not ten effective divisions in the West". Some of the United States safeguards, such as the provision that a civilian should head the federal agency and that most of the officers of German units should be recruited from outside the old officer class, were probably impracticable.

5. On the other hand, the French proposals had been presented in such an extreme form that there was hardly time to reach an agreement on ends before some action had to be taken on means. Considering the experimental first stage of the French plan, however, it was not perhaps so revolutionary or so far distant from the United States proposals as we had at first thought. He therefore proposed that a mixed Political-Military Commission should be created to try to harmonize the two proposals, especially by looking at the time-phases of their implementation. He suggested that lessons could be learned from both the French Foreign Legion, and the United Nations forces in Korea whose Commander, incidentally, had accepted units of battalion strength. In the formation of a European Legion, to be paid for by a common European fund, he did not think it was impossible to reach a compromise between the participation of German units on a divisional level and their participation on a much lower level.

6. The Netherlands Defence Minister, [Hendrick L.] 'S Jacob, took a more direct line in opposition to the French plan. He reminded the Ministers that although eleven delegations at the Council in September had been in agreement as to what positive steps should be taken, all that had been decided was negative — no German army and no German General Staff. Something more positive was to be moved to the Elbe. He, therefore, fully supported the general aim of the United States proposal. He welcomed the conclusion of the French that German participation was necessary, but said that the form of their rejoinder threatened the objectives it was intended to promote and contained much that was unacceptable on military grounds. He concluded: "I cannot believe that the French will force a stalemate".

7. Pacciardi[77] (Italy) then pleaded for compromise solutions acceptable to all, saying that it was inconceivable that we should have Germany on our side but not France. He begged the French to at least accept the United States paper as a basis for discussion, bearing in mind that United States troops would not be sent to Europe unless measures for German participation were agreed. Such a revolutionary turn in United States policy as a proposal to send United States forces to Europe in peacetime should not be repulsed. The difficulty with the French plan, as he saw it, was that it could not be implemented quickly as constitutional changes would be necessary in all countries, including France, and we could not afford the luxury of delay because of our present danger.

8. Hauge[78] then made a very sensible statement expressing understanding of Moch's position and sharing both the emotional prejudices and rational fears of Europeans faced with the problem of German re-armament. Like the Danes, he said, the Norwegians were, however, in agreement that we could not afford to abstain from a German contribution in combat units and production. Without it there would be no integrated force, and without an integrated force, no "forward strategy". We were on the threshold of a great idea proposed by the United States government. We could not afford to "keep the Germans in the long run but must let them work their passage". Their contribution, however, must be a real one making military sense. We should not reap all the disadvantages of German participation (in our countries, in Germany and behind the Iron Curtain) without getting an effective contribution from them. The Council had asked the Defence Committee how this could be done and we must answer, dealing primarily with the military aspects.

Jens C. Hauge, Minister of Defence of Norway.

9. The United States had proposed balanced ground divisions as the basic unit of an integrated force. He could accept that but wondered if a compromise might not be reached on brigades or regimental combat teams integrated into "Atlantic divisions". He also thought there was room for compromise on the administrative, recruiting and training proposals put forward by both sides.

10. The Defence Committee, he said, could not plead bankruptcy on such an issue. We clearly had to have more time to work out a compromise, and he suggested the same expedient as at New York — that the Ministers should adjourn for a few days and leave the discussion to the deputies.

11. Le Gallais[79] for Luxembourg made the only statement of the morning in general support of the French position. Although his Government had not yet studied all the implications of the French plan, and although it would "change the political face of Europe", he thought that further study of the plan was worth the delay it might cause in order to secure the unity of all countries and peoples concerned. He remarked that the changes in Europe in the last 85 years, when compared to what had been happening in the United States in the same period, led to the conclusion that it might not be unreasonable for Europe to federate.

12. At this point Mr. Claxton made a statement which will be reported in my immediately following message. Ends.

MR. CLAXTON'S STATEMENT ON GERMAN PARTICIPATION

2. While we were not a European country, Mr. Claxton said, Canada had a profound interest in the subject under discussion, both as a North Atlantic country and as a people whose 100,000 war graves in Europe testified to our interest in peace. Our ties of blood with France and our actions in their defence and liberation in two wars made it clear that we fully appreciated the sincerity of their point of view. The French proposals were indeed revolutionary; but so were those of the United States which had never before contemplated sending troops to Europe in peacetime. If the United States were to take part in an integrated force in Europe, Canadians would too, subject to parliamentary approval as required by our law.

3. As regards the political difficulties of the French plan, we would do everything possible to be of assistance but did not feel it proper to discuss the issue in detail. As regards the military difficulties, however, we did feel it would delay matters. It would mean creating a European army in which Germans would be second-class soldiers which would not encourage them to cooperate as they must to make the endeavour worthwhile. Also, there might be difficulties in working out a satisfactory relationship between the European army and Canadian and United States forces serving separately under the Supreme Commander. These difficulties might tend to make the force less effective than that which we know the Communists have today.

4. While we have made astonishing progress, we cannot believe, Mr. Claxton said, that our choice today was between the French plan and doing nothing. We must get on with the rest of the job without delay. This was primarily a task for the Defence Committee but if it could not agree, he suggested either a mixed commission as proposed by the Belgian Minister or that the Deputies in London, assisted by military advisers, should see what could be worked out before a further meeting of the Council. He added, inter alia, that the difficulty of the discussion of this subject in New York and Washington pointed to the desirability of having a Council of Governments rather than separate Committees of Foreign and Defence Ministers.

5. After a few preliminary expressions of sympathy for the French, Shinwell then returned to the charge against his fellow socialist with a series of questions, which he dignified by the name of the "Socratic method", but which were rather rhetorical. In view of the need to build up our strength in 1951, he asked:

(a) Do we consider we need German participation now, or are we going to allow the Germans to sit on their "backsides", defended by the allies?

(b) Why should we accept the French plan, with all its attendant political difficulties, when all we are going to get out of it is a sort of "European Foreign Legion" which no military man would regard as satisfactory?

(c) Why should the European army be tied to a European assembly which is at present no more than a highly controversial and theoretical experiment?

(d) Are we going to turn down the United States offer of manpower which may mean the avoidance of a major conflict?

(e) Would a European army, lacking support from the United Kingdom and probably from the United States, strike much fear into the heart of the Russians?

6. While both the United States and the French plans demand study, the United States plan demanded prolonged study. We might find, he said, that we would be left in the end "in an academic quagmire while the Soviet gloats over our complete defeat". Calling on the French to accept the United States plan in principle, he said that we must all, including the French, be prepared to take political risks to achieve our goal.

7. Marshall concluded the morning's session with a simple statement that the United States Government and people were aware of the hazards of re-arming Germany and that these hazards bore more directly on the European people than themselves. The United States had assumed that there would be other plans. So far there were only two. The United States plan might not be the answer but what they wanted was a "realistic military plan" that would give "solid assurance of a possible successful action in the near future and probably success at a later date". Any plan would have to consider timing, national psychology, and economics, but first of all it must be realistic from a military point of view.

8. The Defence Ministers then adjourned to go to the White House before lunch. The morning's discussion had not advanced agreement but had rather hardened the French position. Clearly we are not going to reach agreement on Germany today. Ends.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My messages WA-2746 and WA-2747 of October 30th. Re North Atlantic Defence Committee.

1. After lunch yesterday, Moch made another of his admirably concise and clear expositions of the French view that the question of German re-armament should be regarded as predominantly a political problem, and not as General Marshall had suggested, one that could readily and usefully be separated into military and political aspects. Moch re-affirmed that his Government could not agree to take action in the military field until the overriding political questions had been settled. The guiding preoccupation of the French Government and others, he said, was that European power should be brought to its maximum without taking any actions which would weaken the power of the European countries by leading to internal disorders.

2. Moch then said he thought he could stretch his Government's instructions to associate himself with the Belgian proposal that there should be a mixed political-military commission. He said his Government was ready to discuss in such a commission the details of their plan, but, if the principle of their plan was turned down, the position of their Government would revert to that expressed in the formula adopted by the North Atlantic Council (i.e. use of German labour and some productive resources, but opposed to arming Germans).

3. He pointed out that the French text of the New York Resolution (C-5D/11) contained no allusion to an integrated force in the paragraph dealing with the request from the Council to the Defence Committee as to how, from the technical point of view, Germany could make its most effective contribution to western defence. His statement implied that the mixed commission proposed by the Belgians would study only the French plan, and opposed the suggestion of the Netherlands and Italian representatives of taking the United States paper as a basis for discussion — an action which he said would certainly cause a French Government crisis.

4. As regards the fear that the French plan would cause delays, he said that he did not think any constitutional revision would be required, certainly not in France, to take the first steps towards the creation of a European army. There was nothing in their plan which would cause any delay in implementing North Atlantic plans, he assured Mr. Claxton.

5. He then said (in order to correct assumptions of previous speakers) that the French Government had not agreed to re-arming Germans, except with the substantial safeguards provided in their plan. In order to go that far, they had made an "effort of conciliation which has cost us dearly". They hoped their proposal was a step towards rallying the peoples of Europe to an effort to build up their collective strength with the participation of Germans.

6. He then disposed of Shinwell's questions (my message WA-2747) by saying that the debate was too serious for such sarcastic remarks, and concluded by expressing his confidence that the United States would not try to impose its will on its free allies of Western Europe by any kind of threat, for they too wanted the most rapid and realistic solution acceptable to all peoples.

7. The rest of the afternoon was taken up with a rather useless debate on procedure in the worst U.N. manner that General Marshall as Chairman made no attempt to control. The Belgian representative put his suggestion of the morning (WA-2746) in the form of a draft resolution which requested the Deputies, with military advisors, to examine the proposals that had been made within the framework of the Council decision in New York, and report to a joint session of the Council composed of Foreign Ministers aided by Defence Ministers.

8. This resolution was amended by the Italian and French representatives, but was finally (in a dubious ruling of the Chair, probably based on a misunderstanding) considered as not carried on the grounds that it had not received unanimous support.

9. In fact, the only contending resolution, proposed by the Norwegian and supported by the United Kingdom and Danish representatives, had by that time been more or less tacitly withdrawn. It had proposed as an alternative that the Defence Committee should not accept defeat so easily, but should turn the question over to their deputies and military advisors and resume, possibly on Friday, November 3rd, after the tour of defence establishments that was scheduled to begin on October 31st.

10. In the debate on procedure, Shinwell led the attempt to have the question kept in the Defence Committee, while Moch agreed with some success that as it could not be divorced from its political context it should go to the Deputies.

11. Mr. Claxton contented himself with saying that, as we were not going to find a solution immediately, the problem would have to be referred to some other group; it did not much matter which, provided they had the advice of the Military Committee; a decision as to which body should receive their report could be taken later. He added that the whole discussion powerfully supports the Canadian suggestion that the top structure of NATO must be simplified by creating a council of Governments in place of the present three Committees of Ministers, so as to avoid passing problems from one body to another, as was being proposed.

12. After General Marshall's sudden ruling that the Belgian resolution had been defeated because it was not unanimously supported, he got quick assent for a United States resolution referring both the French and United States proposals on German re-armament, along with any other proposals on the same subject that might be made, to the Deputies and the Military Committee which would meet at first separately and then jointly, and would report to the Defence Committee. We think this decision is unfortunate and believe that most of the countries represented would have much preferred a joint session of the Council and Defence Committee, but after three hours of argument, no one questioned the Chairman's ruling and the United States proposal.

13. From our talks with members of the United States delegation, including Colonel Beebe, General Marshall's Staff Officer, it is clear that General Marshall and his military advisors believe that it is possible to separate military from the political aspects of the German problem.

14. The Committee adjourned at 6 p.m. after agreeing to meet this morning and to postpone today's programme of visits to United States establishments until Friday, November 3rd. It is hoped that we shall complete our agenda this morning. Ends.

RE NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE COMMITTEE

1. Yesterday's concluding meetings settled nothing of importance and all that was discussed was how we could, with the least public embarrassment, agree to disagree for the time being and reassemble as soon as we had some prospect of reaching agreement on the German question.

2. As reported in my message WA-2751, we agreed on October 30th to refer the German question to the Deputies and the Military Committee. Yesterday morning General Marshall introduced a formal resolution on this subject which was approved. The text of this resolution was reported in my message WA-2764. General Marshall then turned to Items 7 and 8, dealing with the re-organization of the military side of NATO, the establishment of an integrated force in Western Europe, and the appointment of a Supreme Commander. He said flatly that in the opinion of the United States Government it was not possible to reach final decisions on the above questions until we had reached agreement as to how Germans should participate in western defence. He, therefore, suggested that both papers on this subject (DC. 24 and 24/1)† should be referred back to the Military Committee with or without further discussion in the Defence Committee.

3. Shinwell's immediate reaction to this grave announcement was that our peoples would be "grievously disappointed" if the Defence Committee were to leave Washington without achieving some measure of success.

4. Moch then made a rather artificially disingenuous statement. He said that the United States offer of troops for Europe and the appointment of a Supreme Commander had specifically not been linked, during all previous discussions of the subject, with the question of German participation. Whether or not other countries changed their positions on building up strength in Europe, however, the French Government had authorized him to say that they would nevertheless go ahead as planned in the creation of a French army of 20 divisions as long as it was materially possible for them to proceed.

5. Pacciardi spoke of the gravity of the situation with which the European countries were now faced and thought that any further discussion of the organization of an integrated force would be bound to be theoretical.

6. After interval for private consultations, there was considerable discussion as to whether it was better to recess for two or three days or adjourn until there was some prospect of reaching agreement. The latter course prevailed after Moch had made it quite clear that he could not get his instructions changed this week. The French position was attacked with some heat by Hansen (Denmark) and with more moderation by Hauge (Norway) on the general grounds that the inflexibility of the French position had not only made agreement impossible at this meeting, but had forced the United States to withhold troops vital to the security of Western Europe. 'S Jacob (Netherlands) also spoke against the French plan but agreed that without more time nothing further could be done. After further discussion it was agreed that the chair would decide on the date of the next meeting, which would probably be held in London. Mr. Claxton emphasized the need for haste if our peoples were not to lose the sense of urgency in strengthening our defences with which they had been seized since the Korean crisis. He referred, in passing, to the expanded Canadian defence programme and the Canadian mutual aid programme, and reminded the Ministers that Congress would be meeting shortly so that it was particularly important not to lose the momentum which United States public opinion had achieved during the last few months.

7. The remainder of the day was spent in drafting the final communiqué and in clearing away the remaining items on the agenda. The text of the communiqué has been sent to you in message WA-2763.†

8. The final papers before the Ministers were noted without much discussion. These included papers on:

(a) North Atlantic Ocean Command Organization;

(b) Military Standardization Agency (with which Mr. Claxton said that Canada would be happy to cooperate in any capacity, bearing in mind our long experience and considerable capacity in military production and standardization fields);

(c) East-West trade (a United States plea for the denial of strategic materials and equipment to the Soviet bloc);

(d) The association of Greece and Turkey in military planning, as approved by Council in September (there are to be exploratory talks but no Mediterranean Command structure at present);

(e) Chairmanship. It was agreed that as we were only adjourning the present session of the Defence Committee, General Marshall would keep the Chair at the next meeting but that at the next session the Chair would pass to the Belgian representative. General Marshall made it quite clear that he would be happier not to be in the Chair when the United Sates and French proposals were being considered but was prevailed upon to keep it until the end of the present session.

9. As soon as the Defence Committee adjourned, the Military Committee met briefly to discuss procedure. The Deputies are to meet this morning for the same purpose; Spofford hopes they will resume their sessions in London sometime next week. Ends.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My preceding messages re North Atlantic Defence Committee.

2. Now that the Defence Committee has adjourned, I will review briefly my impressions of the meetings.

3. Once again a top North Atlantic body has been faced with major new proposals which, with the best will in the world, could not possibly be dealt with in one session from a standing start. At New York the Council was faced with the American proposals. Here we have been confronted with the still more far-reaching French plan which the French themselves asked should not be discussed, as it otherwise could have been, in the preparatory group which met for several days before the Defence Ministers arrived.

4. General Marshall and Mr. Acheson decided very sensibly to leave most of the running to the Europeans who were being asked under the French plan to federate. With the exception of Luxembourg, none of the European representatives showed any inclination to do so — at least they did not want to hold up present defence plans during the elaborate process of negotiating a European union. On this point, therefore, the French were virtually isolated and their "take it or leave it" attitude did their cause no good.

5. In the discussion on procedure, however, the French almost succeeded in isolating the United States and the United Kingdom, who kept insisting that the military aspects of the problem could and should be separated from the political. The rest of us did not disagree that the Military Committee should assist in the examination of this problem, but we could not see much point in it coming back to the Defence Committee alone as, at the ministerial level, the decisions are bound to be primarily political. This fact would seem to have implied a joint session of Foreign and Defence Ministers.

6. The United States have chosen to risk the letdown in public opinion to which Mr. Claxton drew attention in order to make the French face up to the consequences of their present policy. General Bradley told the French and ourselves privately that he could not possibly testify to Congress in favour of sending more United States troops to Europe and building up an integrated force unless that force could be made a going concern; and in his opinion that required German participation in a form which they could accept with at least some measure of enthusiasm. As Shinwell pointed out, all the non-Continental Governments would be in the same position of finding it almost impossible to send troops to the defence of Germany while the Germans simply sat back and watched. The question of course remains as to what the Germans themselves would accept. Certainly the longer we wrangle the better will be their bargaining positions.

7. The alternative United States policy, which was privately advocated by some United Kingdom military representatives, would have been to have announced that, in spite of the French, the United Kingdom and United States were going to arm the Germans in their zones. In our opinion this would have been fatal; for, if the defence of the West is impossible without Germany, it is equally impossible without France. The United States have chosen to wield their second biggest stick. There is to be no Supreme Commander and no integrated force until the French give some earnest of their willingness to compromise. If and when they do, the United States will probably go a short distance towards meeting them — for example, on the size, of German units. But, the present United States attitude to the French has been considerably hardened by the attitude of the French in blocking further progress by attaching conditions that cannot possibly be accepted at least within the time which may be given the West for building up its defence. As one of them said, they have been "Moched"! Although Moch presented his case with great clarity, the ill-concealed satisfaction of his stone wall performance has thoroughly annoyed the Americans.

8. It would appear that the lesson we have still to learn is that, in the final analysis, no member of the North Atlantic community, neither France nor the United States, can really afford to call another's bluff. In our present danger we are too inter-dependent; and for that reason a great effort will have to be made in the meetings of the Deputies and the Military Committee that are to follow during the next two weeks or so before the Defence Ministers resume their meeting. Ends.

I. FORTHCOMING MEETINGS OF MILITARY AND DEFENCE COMMITTEES OF NATO IN LONDON

(b) Medium Term Defence Plan

5. The Minister of National Defence drew attention to a document circulated at the meeting which, in tabular form, compared Canadian force capabilities under current authorizations with the force requirements shown in NATO Medium Term Defence Plans (D-Day assumed as July 1, 1954). The reason for bringing this matter before the Committee grew out of a resolution passed by the NATO Council on September 18th, 1950, which read:

> The Council "recommends that Member Governments upon being advised by the Council of the provisions of the revised Medium Term Defence Plan and the respective contributions required thereby, consider as a matter of urgency the acceptance of the Plan and the taking of such measures as may be necessary as rapidly as possible to meet the contributions required of them, on the assumption that the necessary complementary action in the fields of production and finance will be taken to provide the equipment required."

On October 23rd, the Military Committee had approved the NATO Medium Term Defence Plan as submitted by the Standing Group, but in view of the implications of the NATO Council's resolution, General Foulkes had made reservations at that time respecting the force commitments earmarked as Canadian. These reservations were recorded in the column listing forces earmarked against Canada and a footnote inserted stating:

> "as far as Air Force and Navy were concerned: subject to review, confirmation or revision when the Canada-United States plans are available".

These Medium Term Plans had been approved shortly afterwards by the Defence Committee, with the same reservations qualifying the forces earmarked as Canadian contributions.

6. Mr. Claxton said that it had been urged that these were simply military plans and could therefore be accepted as such for planning purposes. He took the view, however, that while other countries might be able to accept the scale of forces laid down in the Plan, relying on the United States to make up the differences between their own capabilities and what was called for in the plan, Canada, which expected to implement all its undertakings out of its own resources, could not accept any plan that we could not carry out ourselves. As matters stood now the force tabulations put down for Canada in the Plan, especially for the Air Force, were well beyond Canadian capacity as presently organized for defence purposes.

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs noted that other countries were not unwilling to accept high target figures as a means of increasing their pressure for aid from the United States; moreover, the higher the defence forces planned for other NATO countries the easier it would be for the U.S. Administration to get Congress to approve its defence appropriations.

8. General Foulkes noted that the Standing Group and the Military Committee would review, starting about February 1st, 1951, the gap then existing between the total forces called for in the NATO plans and the totals of national acceptances to date, and would make further recommendations on the sizes of contributions by individual nations. The gap was expected to be in the order of 12 or 13 divisions and 3,500 aircraft. He suggested that Canada should state before February 1st the commitment it was willing to accept.

9. Mr. Claxton said that the special position in which Canada found itself was not adequately understood or appreciated. The Chief of the General Staff might first discuss the size of the Canadian contribution informally with the Americans, so that we might consider whether we should put forward a letter outlining the forces which the Canadian Government might be willing to furnish.

10. Mr. Claxton, turning to the document before the Committee, said that although the Canadian D-Day Army forces capabilities under current authorizations were three air-borne infantry battalion groups (Arctic), 4 composite anti-aircraft batteries and 1/3 of a division, leaving a deficiency as compared with the NATO plans of 18 heavy and 10 light anti-aircraft reserve regiments authorized at present at various strengths and states of training. Equipment was available, and these regiments could be put into shape in about three months after mobilization. If these units were placed on an active force basis they would require about 20,000 men; in all the circumstances, it was considered the risk of not having them fully ready for action at D-Day was justified. There would be no difficulty in meeting the requirement for 1/3 of an infantry division; any increase beyond this strength might put the Canadian contribution out of line with those of the U.S. and the U.K.

(Chart showing Canadian force capabilities under current authorizations compared with force requirements shown in NATO Medium Term Defence Plans, CSC 5027-0-4 (CS), Nov. 30, 1950, was circulated)†

The Canadian capabilities under current authorizations of 1 carrier and 1 cruiser met the NATO force requirements, but the current authorizations of 14 ocean escorts (7 destroyers, 3 destroyer escorts and 4 frigates) were 16 ships short of the 30 called for in the NATO Plans. This number of 30 ocean escorts represented a Canadian proportion of 10% of the total, the U.K. having allotted 35% and the U.S. 45%. These ocean escorts were for convoy duty only. In the circumstances, this 10% share did not seem out of balance. As for the deficiency of 16 ocean escorts, there were 9 ships in reserve and it would require 7 more ships to reach the NATO total. The 16 crews could be found from the Royal Canadian Naval reserve to put the ships in action within three months after D-Day. The Coastal escorts, outer patrol vessels, coastal minesweepers, loop and mine layers, and inner patrol craft were all regarded as being for our own defence. Of the 16 outer patrol vessels (Bangor) and 19 coastal minesweepers called for in NATO plans, the authorized Canadian establishment provided for 3 and 8 respectively, but some of these deficiencies in ships could be met from the ships now laid up at Sorel which could be available for action in about three months after D-Day.

With respect to the Air Force contribution, the Canada-U.S. Regional Group Plan called for 19 interceptor fighter squadrons totalling 475 aircraft, one area Reconnaissance Squadron and two transport squadrons. The North Atlantic Ocean Regional Group Plan was for three maritime squadrons, while the plan for the integrated force required 11 squadrons from Canada. The various plan requirements added up to a total of 12 squadrons in excess of what was currently authorized, or about 500 additional aircraft. To provide these additional aircraft would cost about $250 millions, not including the further monies needed for expanded construction, personnel and operating costs. Such increased expenditures appeared to be out of the question for Canada at this time. The 11 squadrons totalling 203 aircraft had been put down as a Canadian allotment for the NATO integrated force by the Standing Group. He doubted how firm these figures were and mentioned that he had heard that the U.S. had originally put down 2,000 aircraft as its own contribution to the integrated force and then overnight had reduced this to 1,000 aircraft. As for the question of proportion of the Canadian Air Force totals in the overall, it should be noted that the U.S. were responsible for all the strategic bombing and for most of the air transport forces.

11. The Chief of the Naval Staff pointed out that the Canadian 10% applied only to ocean escort forces and did not take account of the North Atlantic Ocean group striking and non-convoy forces which, if added into the overall picture, brought the proportion of the Canadian contribution down to about 4 1/2%.

The ships at Sorel were deteriorating steadily, and the forecast of our ability to have them manned and ready for operations in three months after D-Day assumed that the ships would be put into shape before D-Day. If this were not done it would take up to nine months after D-Day to recondition many of the vessels. It was recommended that some of these ships be taken out of storage at this time. It should also be noted that the NATO requirement of Canada for ships at D-Day plus six months would be heavier than at D-Day.

12. General Foulkes said that he had first seen this figure of 11 squadrons and 203 aircraft as the Canadian allotment for the NATO integrated force the night before the Military Committee meetings began in Washington. He had protested at once to General Bradley who had expressed his regret that the Standing Group had inserted definite force allocations for Canada in the Medium Term Plan without first consulting Canadian military authorities. Because we were not in regional groups which had covered this ground in detail, Canada was the only country which had been faced with such a decision on such short notice and without prior consultation; most of the other NATO countries, in particular those associated in the Brussels Pact during the past year or two, had had an opportunity to work out the scale of their defence contributions in considerable detail.

13. Mr. Pearson suggested that the insertion of figures against Canada without consultation served to illustrate the necessity for a re-organization of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

14. Mr. Claxton thought that the Chief of the General Staff should talk this question over with General Bradley pointing out that Canada wanted military plans which she could fulfil. We could not undertake to keep 203 aircraft in Europe as part of the integrated force. The Chief of the General Staff should report back to the Cabinet Defence Committee, and then an official statement of the Canadian position could be conveyed to the Standing Group.

15. The Prime Minister pointed out the difficulties of Canada maintaining sufficient air strength to provide protection against attack for this continent and Europe at the same time. It might be possible to move aircraft to meet needs as they developed.

16. The Chief of the Air Staff said that three months after D-Day the threat of air attack on North America might be expected to be reduced. It might then be possible to send more aircraft to Europe. On the other hand, Europe could not be held during that period without increases in the air forces there.

17. Mr. St-Laurent said that with our tradition it made it exceptionally difficult to bring Canada to the peak of her strength before war. Our people in the past had only achieved their maximum effort under the stress of actual conflict. Our object however was to help in building up sufficient collective strength to deter an aggressor from starting such a conflict.

18. Mr. Claxton suggested that our representatives in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization should make it plain that the commitments of Canada were to be understood as limited to the forces authorized by the government, and say that we could build these forces up after mobilization, using the ships in reserve and also counting in the ten reserve fighter squadrons. Other NATO countries would be deeply concerned if Canada decided not to contribute any squadron to the integrated force as there was an estimated overall deficiency in fighter aircraft of some 3500 planes.

19. The Secretary to the Cabinet inquired what proportion of the nine presently authorized fighter squadrons should be retained in Canada and what made available for service with the integrated force.

20. Mr. Claxton suggested that three of these squadrons be made available for the integrated force and the six regular plus the ten reserve fighter squadrons held in Canada for the Canada-U.S. Region be made available as the circumstances showed to be desirable.

21. Mr. Pearson and General Foulkes both supported the idea of making a proportion of the authorized squadrons available in Europe.

22. Mr. Claxton said that the (air) defence of Canada was of course closely integrated with the (air) defence of the United States. The United States has assigned 61 squadrons, plus six in Alaska, for continental defence.

23. Air Marshal Curtis said that the U.S. National Guard squadrons would also be available for U.S. defence, but plans called for none of these U.S. forces to be based in Canada. The nine regular squadrons authorized for use in Canada was our experts' view of the number necessary to exert a reasonable interference with the scale of raids that could be contemplated, especially in the first thirty days after D-Day.

24. The Deputy Minister of National Defence said the forces in Europe were intended to serve as a deterrent to Russia; those in Canada were a provision for our defence.

25. Mr. Robertson said the goal of ourselves and our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was to build forces sufficient to deter Russian aggression before it began. Canadian planning should not therefore be based on assumptions as to what might be made available only after a war was started.

If no sizeable Canadian air contribution to the integrated force was feasible, it was doubtful whether it would be worthwhile trying to maintain 1/3 of a division in Europe as an Army component of the integrated force.

26. General Foulkes thought the United States regarded the Canadian 1/3 of a division as a token force and important in that it demonstrated Canadian willingness to participate.

27. Mr. Robertson inquired how long it would take to make up the aircraft deficiencies, if this became necessary. A case might be made for limiting our commitments for a time if this enabled us to expand our defence production effectively.

28. Air Marshal Curtis estimated that two years would be required for production of aircraft and aircrew training — perhaps eighteen months — but two years was more probable.

The production of CF-100 aircraft might be accelerated to build up the effectiveness of the reserve squadrons, all of which at present had few fighting aircraft. The current CF-100 production programme would not equip these squadrons until 1953-54.

29. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he believed very little could be done to speed up production of CF-100 aircraft before the summer of 1951.

30. Air Marshal Curtis said production of the airframes could be speeded up before the coming summer, but stepping up production of the engines would not be possible before then.

31. Mr. Claxton said substantial increases in aircraft production were possible and desirable but they would be very expensive and would require practically a total war economy to sustain them.

32. Mr. St-Laurent said the Chief of the Air Staff's recommendation, which might be desirable from the military viewpoint, must also be considered in the light of the burden it would place on the Canadian people, and on their willingness to accept it. The Government could not make commitments at this time for increased production. There had been enormous increases in defence expenditures since before 1939. There had to be progressive realization by the public of the need for increases. The proposals to be made to Parliament at the coming session for defence appropriations of $350 plus $555 millions are likely to be as large as the Government could make in present circumstances. The emphasis was on the deterrent effect of placing forces in Europe. Our hope must be that they would be effective in this role, and to this end we must take a calculated risk in placing some forces in Europe at the expense of forces at home.

33. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on Canadian force capabilities under present authorization as compared with force requirements shown for Canada in the NATO Medium Term Defence Plan;

(b) agreed that the Chief of the General Staff discuss with the U.S. Chiefs of Staff the question of keeping Canadian force requirements under the Medium Term Plan at a level which Canada was capable of implementing from her own resources.

Chairman, Delegation to General Assembly of United Nations, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 289 New York, November 2, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington No. 28.

Following from Heeney, Begins: My immediately preceding message† re North Atlantic Deputies' discussion of German participation.

1. As the Military Committee representatives each have to prepare a paper on German participation within a week, and as we shall also have to prepare instructions for Wilgress by the November 13th meeting of Deputies, I think we should begin now to put some ideas on paper, working within the general policy of the Government to leave the prime initiative on this subject to those countries more directly concerned with German participation than we are.

2. In our judgment, the extremely grave situation we are now faced with can only be resolved if the French Government are prepared to modify their proposals. This almost certainly means modification in substance. If the French can be brought to this course, the United States would, we think, be prepared to compromise on the details of their proposals. The problem is, therefore, how best to move the French.

3. In the first place, we think that both the French and the United States Governments may have an inflated idea of the strength of their respective bargaining positions. The Americans feel that the piper will, in the final analysis, be able to call the tune. The French believe that Western European defence is hopeless without their participation and that the United States will have to come around and produce their reinforcement of Western Europe if the most cooperative French Government possible in present circumstances is to remain in power and France is to produce the twenty divisions she has promised by 1953. Before there can be successful negotiations, both sides will have to realize their interdependence. On the one hand, therefore, it seems to me we should be urging on the French the political, psychological and military risks of delay, and on the other hand, trying to impress the United States with the dangers of any attempt to steamroll the French, which would only get their backs up and strengthen French "neutralism".

4. On points of detail, we must be careful that the Military Committee do not introduce political assumptions for example, as to the size of units that would be politically acceptable to the Germans. (General Bradley said informally that the United States military were not prepared to accept anything less than German divisions because it would be politically unacceptable to the Germans — not because it was militarily impracticable.) For this reason, I think our military paper should address itself to the problem of the smallest German units that would make sense from a military point of view in the immediate future. I think that General Foulkes mentioned battalions as sufficiently large for training requirements in the early stages.

5. Another line of possible compromise might be developed on the question of a German federal agency for recruiting and training purposes. It does not perhaps matter very much whether this agency is regarded as a section of the German Ministry of Labour, as is apparently proposed by the French, with SHAPE providing as much of the central administration and direction as possible, or is a separate agency as proposed by the United States and perhaps on this point we might meet the French for appearance sake.

6. In attempting to work out some formula that would bring the French along, at least on a short-term basis, perhaps the most fruitful approach would be to try to draw up a timetable showing what steps might be accomplished during the next three months, during the following six months and during the year after that, searching for common elements in both United States and French proposals.

7. These are preliminary and incomplete thoughts on this problem which has now become critical for the whole Atlantic community. When I return to Ottawa we must immediately get at the production of a paper for the Minister and Cabinet. Meantime I would be grateful if urgent consideration could be given in Ottawa and London to how we might help to resolve the present unhappy dilemma.

Please repeat this message to Wilgress and Vanier. Ends.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur en France

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in France

TELEGRAM 412 Ottawa, November 6, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Pearson, Begins: You will have received copies of telegrams reporting the difficult and discouraging meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee in Washington and the very serious situation which has developed as a result of the French refusal to compromise over the Pleven plan and their insistence that steps leading towards the political integration of Western Europe must precede any measure of German rearmament. I am much disturbed over these developments which, as you will readily appreciate, put in jeopardy the whole concept of the NATO integrated forces in Europe and threatened to arrest the forward movement of NATO plans for the defence of Europe. I feel that there must be a way of reconciling the position of France with that of the majority of her North Atlantic partners and that in the long run a way will be found. Meanwhile, however, time presses and delay at this juncture presents special dangers and difficulties.

2. M. Moch's personal intransigence at the Washington meeting was very marked and contrasted with the more conciliatory attitude which Mr. Schuman adopted when this subject was under discussion at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in New York in September. I think therefore that it might serve a useful purpose in view of your excellent personal relations with Mr. Schuman if you were to see him on my behalf and speak to him on the following lines.

(a) You should express my own concern which I am sure he will share at the divergence of views revealed in the Defence Ministers' discussions and you might add that we in Canada, although not directly involved in this divergence of views, are prompted by long-standing ties of blood and friendship with France to appeal to Mr. Schuman to use his wise influence to facilitate a solution.

(b) You should explain to Mr. Schuman that we share French apprehensions regarding the potential dangers involved in any measure of German rearmament. Like the French we approach this problem in a spirit of great caution and with the desire to obtain the maximum safeguards against the resurgence of German militarism. Moreover we also sympathize with the broad lines of French policy which aim at the creation of a political and economic framework on a Western European scale with which Germany should be closely associated. You might remind Mr. Schuman in this connection that I have already publicly expressed my sympathy with the aims of the Schuman plan.

(c) While I think we all share the same long term aims the problem seems to us to be primarily one of timing. It is our belief that on the military level a compromise could and should be worked out at once. Military planning could thereupon go forward as rapidly as possible. We would hope that simultaneously with the advance of military planning other steps could be taken in the direction of building up the European political and economic framework of Western Europe and that cooperation in military planning would itself be a stage in political development. We agree with the French that the military and political elements in the situation are closely inter-related. We fear however that if no progress can be made on the military side until agreement is reached on problems of European integration, this delay may present difficulties and dangers. In this connection you should call Mr. Schuman's attention to the following considerations:

(i) At the present time United States public opinion has taken a great swing forward in accepting the stationing of United States forces in Europe in peacetime and in accepting as a basis for strategic planning the concept that the battle for Europe, if it must come, should be fought as far to the east in Europe as possible. These are ideas which successive French Governments have emphasized from the beginning. The French are indeed on the very brink of gaining the greatest assurance of their own security which they could hope for. Yet this long step forward depends upon the support which the present administration enjoys from American public opinion. We in Canada are naturally particularly close to the mood of public opinion in the United States and we feel that there is a very real danger that if there is delay in implementing these policies opinion may swing in the opposite direction and that the strong undercurrent of resistance to such essentially unpopular decisions as the extension of the term of military service and the stationing of United States forces in Europe will come to the surface. Indeed the same forces in public opinion manifest themselves in Canada. The United States Government are certainly not bluffing when they say that they could not go to Congress with a proposal to station major United States forces in Germany in peacetime while the Germans themselves were not participating in western defence; and the same considerations apply in Canada.

(ii) We have no doubt that the French are as aware as we are of the danger that a continued cleavage of views over German rearmament will encourage the tendency of the Germans to play off one side against the other and thus to strengthen their bargaining position. This would be a very unhealthy development leading straight in the direction which the French, like ourselves, are so anxious to avoid.

3. You might conclude by assuring Mr. Schuman that I am convinced that we have the same eventual goals in view and that it is our appreciation of the constructive and statesmanlike lead which France is giving in Europe which makes me particularly anxious that this good work should not be jeopardised by divisions among ourselves at a time when a firm and united front is so necessary, not only against Communist aggression but in dealing with the German problem itself.

4. For your own information our delegation to the Defence Ministers meeting came away with the impression, first that the French thought that in any case United States forces would be stationed in Europe in peacetime and that they therefore were in a position to stand on their own plan without risk. Second, that M. Moch was satisfied with the deadlock at the Defence Ministers meeting as it delayed the whole problem of German rearmament. (This, we are sure, is a very shortsighted view.) Third, that M. Moch's personal opposition to any measure of German rearmament made compromise more difficult. In this latter connection I should be glad to have your appreciation of the French domestic political situation insofar as it bears upon this question. We appreciate that the French attitude is largely conditioned by the composition of the present French Government and in particular the position of the French Socialist Party within it. Do you think that Mr. Pleven and Mr. Schuman fully share Mr. Moch's uncompromising attitude?

5. It may be that you will have the opportunity to discuss this question along the above general lines with either M. Pleven or M. Vincent Auriol. I should leave this to your discretion but I should be grateful if you would, as soon as possible, take the matter up with Mr. Schuman.

6. Please repeat your reply to London by telegram. Ends.

1. The Prime Minister welcomed Mr. Moch and introduced him to members of the government and to civil and military officials present.

2. Mr. Moch said that he was very grateful for this opportunity to outline the French point of view to members of the Canadian Government. He also expressed gratefulness for the very useful role Mr. Claxton had played during recent meetings of the NATO Defence Committee in Washington. Canada was in a particularly happy position, through her ethnic and other associations with the United Kingdom, the United States and France, to bring about better understanding and co-operation amongst those three countries.

In order to gain a true picture of France's present position, it should be borne in mind that geographically France had been the immediate neighbour of Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy. Furthermore, the French border was only 150 kilometres from the Soviet front line in Germany. The economic and social upheaval caused by the Second World War had played into the hands of the Communists with the result that the French Communist Party had grown considerably immediately following the cessation of hostilities. Of a total of 600 members of the House of Representatives, 180 were Communists. Despite these and other difficulties, France had embarked resolutely on a programme of economic and social reconstruction with priority to the rehabilitation of production and transportation facilities. At the present time France's total production was 20% higher than during the best pre-war years. The Korean incident and other international developments would now force France to make many sacrifices which, although necessary, might indirectly help the Communist cause within the country.

In so far as the re-armament of Germany was concerned, it was an indisputable fact that this in itself was extremely distasteful to the vast majority of Frenchmen. German participation in the defence of Western Europe was recognized by the French Government as being necessary. However, unless this were done in a very careful manner it was possible that such a move might cause the collapse of the French Government and give to French Communists a golden opportunity to attempt the destruction of France from within. It seemed obvious to the French Government that there would be no purpose in raising sizeable military forces to resist the enemy from without, if, in the process of so doing, the political destinies of the country were handed over to the enemy from within. The United States had proposed that German divisions be raised for incorporation in an international military force for the defence of Western Europe. The U.S. proposal did not involve the setting up of a German military headquarters but did propose that a German ministry of defence be established. To France it seemed inconceivable that any German army could for any length of time remain under civil direction. Inevitably the military would become the real policy makers, particularly since the senior officers in any German military force would of necessity be recruited from the same group which had served under Hitler. For this and many other reasons France had proposed that a European army be established to consist of approximately 100,000 men at the outset, of which 20% would be German troops. No German formation, however, would reach divisional strength. It might be agreed that the largest German unit would be a battalion. This European army would be under the direction of a European minister of defence responsible to the Council of Europe. For military purposes, this army would be under the NATO Supreme Commander together with military elements from non-continental countries such as the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada.

3. Mr. Moch was firmly convinced that this plan could be implemented much more rapidly than the U.S. proposal. It involved an extension, on the military level, of the principle embodied in the Schuman Plan, which plan would likely be approved within a matter of days. Shortly after implementation of the Schuman Plan, the various European countries concerned, including Germany, could sit down together on a basis of equality and work out the details to bring about establishment of the European army. It was felt that this army could be organized before the end of 1951 whereas the equipping of German divisions, as contemplated by the United States, could not be completed before 1952 or 1953. Mr. Moch stated repeatedly that the Pleven Plan was not, as had been intimated at Washington, a dilatory scheme prompted primarily by domestic political considerations.

4. In so far as the French increased defence programme was concerned, Mr. Moch said that the period of compulsory conscription had been increased from fifteen months to eighteen months and that no exemptions would be granted as had been the case under the old conscription law. The waiving of exemptions alone would permit the raising of three additional divisions. At the present time France had three divisions, 70% complete, stationed in Germany, and two divisions at 50% of their total strength in France. By the end of 1951 there would be a total of 10 French divisions of which 5 would be completely mobilized and stationed in Germany and 5 would remain in France on a semi-mobilized basis. This total would be increased to 15 divisions in 1952 and 20 divisions in 1953. It was stressed that the French proposed to go ahead with this programme whether or not the Pleven Plan or any other plan respecting integrated forces were carried through. In so far as ground troops were concerned, the French government was aiming at providing one French division for each allied division raised. Great strides were now being made in the production of armaments. The French defence budget had been approximately doubled.

5. In conclusion, Mr. Moch agreed that active German participation in the defence of Western Europe was necessary but that some means would have to be devised to achieve this desired result without causing the destruction of France from within. Canada was perhaps in a better position than any other country to understand the various and frequently conflicting points of view of the NATO countries, and could be of very great assistance in helping to reach a satisfactory solution to this very difficult problem.

6. The Prime Minister said that he and his colleagues fully appreciated the real difficulties facing the French government with respect to German participation in the defence of Western Europe. He was in full agreement that the security of France must not be weakened from within. Recent and not so recent events seemed to force the conclusion that some form of European federation was desirable if the intra-European conflicts of the past were to be avoided in the future. However, the French plan for the integration of German manpower in the defence of Western Europe seemed, at first glance at least, rather startling and embodied certain features which involved fundamental political changes in the European structure. This in itself might prove to be an obstacle too difficult to be overcome in a short period of time, and it was generally agreed that time was of the essence and that some provision had to be made immediately for the defence not only of Western Europe but of the free world. The obvious conclusion seemed to be that it was essential for all NATO countries to resolve their differences at the earliest possible moment, since it was all too clear that if those difficulties were not overcome we would, in fact, be playing the enemy's game.

7. The Minister of National Defence asked Mr. Moch whether he did not feel that the Germans would be disinclined to accept the Pleven Plan because of the severe restrictions it placed on German military activities. In effect, the plan seemed to contemplate that Germans would be merely second-class soldiers.

8. Mr. Moch replied that he thought the Germans would accept the plan since it would not be implemented before all the countries concerned, including Germany, were consulted on a basis of equality. Furthermore, it should be kept in mind that this plan would likely be the only one favoured by the German democrats who feared above everything a revival of the Junkers. It was also pointed out that the French could arm 20,000 Germans in small units by the end of 1951, whereas the United States could probably not equip German divisions before 1952, or even 1953, largely because the United States had undertaken to arm and equip the forces of NATO countries before making any provision for German troops.

9. Senator Robertson enquired as to the rates of pay for the European army contemplated by the Pleven Plan.

10. Mr. Moch stated that obviously the rates of pay would have to be uniform and this might present some difficulty. The rates would likely be higher than the prevalent French scale, but lower than rates in effect in the U.S. Army.

11. The Prime Minister said that all the NATO countries had the same objective in mind and had agreed on general principles. It was our common task now to adjust our respective views in order to enable concerted action to be taken without any further delay.

12. The meeting, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence of France.

TELEGRAM 404 Paris, November 8, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.
Repeat London No. 61.
Following for Secretary of State for External Affairs from Vanier, Begins: Your telegram No. 412 dated 6th November, German rearmament. M. Schuman returned from Rome yesterday and received me today in the most cordial manner. As your message was quite a long one I made a French translation which I read to M. Schuman "in toto". At the end after listening intently M. Schuman said "will you please thank your Minister for his message which I look upon as a mark of personal friendship". He then added at once much to my pleasure and may I add a little to my surprise "je te souscris entièrement à tout ce que M. Pearson dit d'un bout à l'autre". In other words he shared all your views without the smallest reservation.

He said he had read the account of the meeting at Washington and was "consterné" which as you know is a very strong word, best translated by "dismayed", at M. Moch's conduct. M. Moch who is a "polytechnicien" deals in terms of mathematics, and had been much too rigid and intransigent. His attitude at Washington did not reflect the opinion of the French Government. To some extent it might have been dictated by what he called "incidences personnelles" on the part of Moch. Ever since the conference at Washington he had been exerting all his powers to find a solution. One of his difficulties of course was that the Cabinet was not as united as it might be.

It would be most unwise to allow any delay to interfere with the advancement of the military plan. He was sure it would be possible to find a solution. He went so far as to say that he would not even be stopped by the question of the size of the units or formations. This would be left to the military experts and if they said that for military reasons a division was the smallest formation which was practicable he would accept their view. There was a very great difference between an independent German division and a German division integrated in a European army commanded by a non-German. He did not expect that there would be any difficulty in obtaining the consent of continental nations but there might be some opposition from the Scandinavians who might not like the idea of their troops being integrated into a European army.

M. Schuman said the French and Germans were in complete accord, that he and Adenauer saw eye to eye and that he expected that today the latter would speak in the Bundestag in veiled terms perhaps but in a way which would confirm this.

In the course of conversation I pointed out the radical difference between the situation today in respect of French security and that which existed when I was in Geneva with the League of Nations. France then could obtain nothing worthwhile but now she was being offered the security of a large army which would fight to the east of her frontier. He agreed in terms which indicated that he would consider it madness for the French to allow an opportunity of this kind to pass.

M. Schuman added that the views he had expressed were those of M. Pleven also. Later this evening he would be receiving Mr. Bruce to whom he would speak in similar terms.

As I was leaving M. Schuman said with obvious pleasure that he had noted and was much touched by your reference to the ties not only of friendship but also of blood which bind our two countries.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre de la Défense nationale

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister of National Defence

SECRET. IMMEDIATE. Ottawa, November 9, 1950

Dear Mr. Claxton,

I enclose herewith telegram No. 404 of November 8, from General Vanier, which arrived last evening and which throws a new light on the discussions we have been having with M. Moch on the subject of German re-armament. As you will notice, M. Schuman told General Vanier that M. Moch's attitude in Washington did not reflect the opinion of the French Government. On the specific question of the size of German units to be incorporated in the European army, M. Schuman said "that he would not even be stopped by the question of the size of the units or formations. This would be left to military experts and if they said that for military reasons a division was the smallest formation which was practicable, he would accept their views". M. Schuman added that the views he had expressed were those of M. Pleven also.

2. M. Schuman's views as expressed to General Vanier are obviously in complete contradiction with the views expressed by M. Moch on this question. This points to a division in the French Government, with the Socialists headed by M. Moch taking an intransigent attitude, while M. Schuman and the M.R.P.[80] may be willing to compromise. Such a situation may in turn produce one of the all too frequent French Government crises. We may then be faced either by a victory for M. Moch and the Socialists, in which case the French may stand on the views put forward by M. Moch, or by a Government from which the Socialists have resigned and which would be willing to accept German divisions in the European army. Until this French domestic division has sorted itself out I should be inclined to advise great caution in putting forward to Washington any proposals for a compromise based on our conversations with M. Moch. We do not wish to get into a position of being "plus royalistes que le roi", "le roi", in this case, being M. Schuman and, according to M. Schuman, M. Pleven also. An attitude of caution seems all the more indicated as M. Schuman told General Vanier that he would be receiving the American Ambassador, Mr. Bruce, last night and expressing views similar to those which he had expressed to General Vanier. If this is the case, Washington will already have been informed on behalf of M. Pleven and M. Schuman, that the French Government would, in certain circumstances, be willing to accept German divisions. We should, therefore, be in an awkward position if we put forward suggestions based on the assumption that the largest German units the French would accept would be brigade groups.

3. It may prove, as I have suggested above, that M. Moch and those who share his views prevail in Paris, in which case the proposals for a compromise which we have been discussing with M. Moch may come in useful in due course. Meanwhile, I think you will agree that they should be kept on ice.

4. We shall be preparing draft instructions for Wilgress at the meeting of deputies in London on November 13, during the course of the day, for your consideration.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TELEGRAM 1768 Ottawa, November 11, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-2295; Paris No. 418.

With reference to our telegram No. 1745 of November 9, 1950†, the following are our views as to the line we should take when the question of German participation in the defence of the West is discussed at the deputies' meeting next Monday, November 13.

2. As you will gather from the messages which have been referred to you on the subject during and since the Defence Committee meetings in Washington, there seems little prospect of the deputies getting beyond the discussion of procedure at their first meeting on this subject. Nevertheless, we think you should know how our thinking here has been developing.

3. For the last two days M. Moch has been in Ottawa. He has spoken to the Cabinet Defence Committee and to individual ministers and officials. His interpretation of the French Government's position is less inflexible than that which he presented during the Washington meetings. He still insists in the strongest terms that the French Government will never accept German divisions or a German federal agency. He is willing, however, to consider incorporation of German units up to the level of "régiment", which is an advance on the Pleven plan limitation to the battalion level. He is apparently not wedded to the idea of a Minister of Defence for Europe and is willing to consider an alternative suggestion. But he stands fast on the idea of a European army. M. Moch has suggested that Canada, perhaps in association with Belgium, might advance a solution which would be acceptable to all parties.

4. For our part, we have not yet decided what contribution we might be able to make towards a satisfactory solution of this difficult problem. We have, however, been considering possible ways out of the deadlock. My immediately following telegram contains some preliminary ideas which we have been considering here as the basis for a possible compromise solution. Meanwhile, however, General Vanier's message (repeated to you in telegram No. 61 from Paris) reveals a distinct cleavage within the French Government on this subject. M. Schuman has expressed the view on behalf of Pleven and himself that, if the military could make a good case on technical grounds for German divisions, he would make no objection. Until we know, therefore, what views will prevail within the French Government itself, we think it would be unwise to put forward any compromise suggestions of our own. The views contained in my immediately following telegram are, therefore, for the time being at least, for your own information. However, if you think best there would be no harm in your discussing them informally with any of your colleagues in the deputies.

5. As to procedure, we assume that both the defence ministers and the foreign ministers will have to meet at some stage on this subject. If this is so, we think you might argue on Monday in favour of a joint session of the Council and of the Defence Committee to meet only when substantial progress has been made towards a solution. A further meeting of the Defence Committee alone on this subject should be avoided as the New York experience has shown that this body is unlikely to be the most appropriate one to deal with it effectively.

6. You can hardly argue in the deputies' meeting for a joint meeting of the Council and Defence Committee on the grounds that we should prefer to have M. Schuman at the table rather than M. Moch when German re-armament is discussed. In this connection it may be pointed out that both in the Washington meetings and in private conversations here M. Moch himself supported enthusiastically our idea of strengthening the organization of NATO, including specifically the establishment of a single council of ministers, external, defence, finance, as needed in each case, to be representative of governments. We think that a good case can be made for dealing at a ministerial level with a problem that has both military and political aspects in the same way that it is being dealt with at the official level. The Defence and the military committees are to meet jointly and they should properly make joint recommendations to a joint meeting of ministers. You might perhaps add that such a council of governments (which we advocated unofficially in Washington) would have the added advantage of placing the problem of German rearmament in a political framework which the French regard as essential to German participation in the defence of the West.

7. The Prime Minister considers it important that you should take any appropriate opportunity during the Council discussions to remind your colleagues that time presses for a decision on this question and that every effort should be made to take advantage of the favourable public opinion in North America which might well change if there is to be further delay in reaching the fundamental decisions affecting German participation in Western defence.

TELEGRAM 1769 Ottawa, November 11, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-2294; Paris No. 419.

With reference to my immediately preceding telegram on the subject of German rearmament, the following are our preliminary ideas of the lines along which conflicting views might be reconciled. They are set down assuming that the French position is that stated to us by M. Moch while in Ottawa. The situation would, of course, be modified if the French Government's position were to develop in the manner indicated by M. Schuman to General Vanier. Our thinking has been principally directed towards aspects of the problem on which some compromise might be found:

(a) German Federal Agency

M. Moch expressed irreconcilable opposition to the acceptance of a German Federal Agency which he saw as simply a camouflaged German War Ministry. It might, therefore, be suggested that German civil agencies, perhaps the German Departments of Labour and of Health, might be charged with the registration, health examination and recruitment of German effectives. This might be done under the supervision of the Allied High Commission in Germany. M. Moch too expressed his preference for a German volunteer force over a conscript force.

(b) Size of German Formations

The idea of resisting German divisional formations has come to have an almost mystical significance for M. Moch (if not for the French Government). On the other hand he has shown in his conversations here considerable flexibility as to the possibility of accepting larger formations than the battalions which originally figured in the Pleven Plan.

We have, therefore been wondering if it would not be possible to avoid a decision on the problem of German divisions at this stage. If, as suggested above, the German service agencies could begin the first steps towards the registration and recruitment of German effectives this would take up several months but could be started without prejudice to the decision upon the question of German divisions which could be hammered out meantime in the light of political and military developments.

Two alternative approaches might be:

(1) To agree now that the size of German components should be that of the brigade group. This compromise would mean that the United States would recede from their insistence on German divisions and the French would move up from battalions. The brigade group as a self-contained fighting formation might meet the military argument that the plan must be workable. On the other hand, the brigade group would have the advantage over the division from the French point of view that it would not imply the necessity for any German general officers to which the French are particularly opposed.

(2) We might agree now on a time-phased programme for building up German forces. Stage 1 — Battalions; Stage 2 — Brigades; Stage 3 — Divisions; with provision for review upon the completion of each stage. Agreement to move on to the next stage would be dependent upon political and military developments at the time.

Possibly some combination or (1) and (2) above would offer the best ground for compromise. It may be that upon reaching the brigade group level, the whole question of larger German formations could be examined de novo.

(c) The European Army

One of the elements of the Pleven Plan on which all members of the French Government seem to be in agreement is the concept of a European Army as the only framework which would provide adequate safeguards for the incorporation of German military units in the defence of the West. Moch argued here that the Germans would enter such a force on a footing of equality with the other European nations contributing to it. He said that within a week or two after the signature of the Schuman plan, the French Government would be willing to summon a conference for the purpose of drawing up a protocol for the creation of a European Army.

There are, as you know, military objections to the concept of a European Army. These objections might, however, diminish if the units contributed by the European nations involved were in sufficiently large formations (e.g. brigade groups) to be workable. In the event, we think that the French will be most reluctant to drop this idea, which is fundamental to their approach to the German problem and is closely linked in their minds with the Schuman plan. On the other hand, we understood from Moch that the French might be willing to drop their idea of a European Minister of Defence and the political superstructure of a European political body or bodies to which such a Minister would be responsible.

It might, therefore, be possible to salvage from the Pleven Plan the idea of a European Army, which we think may have a certain political and psychological value for Europeans, without becoming involved in trying to negotiate the embryonic federal framework which the French propose. Moch himself suggested that a High Commissioner might replace the Minister of Defence, but that in any event there would have to be some European political authority to which the Commander of the European Forces was responsible. He did not develop this idea, and it is by no means clear to us how it would work.

It might be possible to contemplate a European Army to which continental European governments, including the Germans, would contribute on some basis of assessment, e.g. as they are planning to do to the Western Union infrastructure. Such units would come under the Commander of the European Army, but would still be national units in the same way as the formations now under the United Nations Commander in Korea.

There are many obscurities in Moch's presentation of the idea of a European army and its relationship to the national armies of contributing countries which would have to be fully clarified before we could be satisfied that it does not constitute a device for restricting German participation to one fifth of a small experimental European army instead of the integrated force.

TELEGRAM 2182 London, November 14, 1950

Re meeting of Deputies, November 13th. Discussions of item 2, dealing with German contribution to Western European defence.

2. Spofford introduced this subject by making a brief statement referring to the previous discussions in the Council, and in the Military Committee and the Defence Committee. He hoped it would be possible for the Military Committee to meet jointly with the Deputies on this subject, possibly next week, but in any case within the next fortnight. He stressed the long-term objectives of the North Atlantic Treaty, the considerable progress which had been made over the past year and a half, and the dangers of losing impetus. Linking up the conception of an integrated force with the question of a German contribution, he made the point that during the period since September, when this matter had been before successive NATO agencies, the world had not stood still. Spofford referred to the difficult situations existing in Korea and on the borders of China and Indo China, and the renewal of the Soviet offensive directed at Germany, expressed in the Prague declaration. On the other side of the ledger he expressed the deep interest of his Government in the encouraging progress being made towards completion of the Schuman Plan.

3. In the Deputies' consideration of the German problem, Spofford suggested that any solution must

(a) Conform with the Council's resolution, and with the concept of an adequate integrated force;

(b) Be acceptable from the point of view of NATO requirements;

(c) Be acceptable to German public opinion, while at the same time safeguarding against a recrudescence of German militarism; and

(d) Be capable of early realization.

4. With this preliminary statement the Chairman then turned to the French Deputy, who made a lengthy statement on the French proposals. This statement, the text† of which was subsequently circulated in French, indicates that the French position has moved forward in certain respects within the framework of the Pleven Plan. This advance may be summarized as follows:

(a) The "smallest possible German unit" which the French Government would accept is the "combat team" of five to six thousand men, three such teams comprising a division in the European force;

(b) For the "European Minister of Defence" might be substituted a "High Commissioner" with similar political and coordinating functions;

(c) Agreement to recruitment being carried out in Germany by a federal German agency such as the Ministry of Labour, the interior, or possibly public health;

(d) Agreement to pressing forward with interim measures, including preparatory arrangements for recruitment in Germany, the construction of barracks and camps, etc.;

(e) The European Assembly referred to in the Pleven Plan would be the same Assembly as provided for in the Schuman Plan and non-participants in the Schuman Plan could be associated with this Assembly.

5. At the outset, Mr. Alphand stressed the points of agreement, emphasizing that since September a considerable step forward had been taken by the French Government which was now not opposed to a German military contribution to the common defence, subject to reservations as to its practical implementation. There was also agreement that neither a German army nor a German general staff should be reconstituted. The Pleven Plan, which was then briefly summarized, had as its principal object the building up of the necessary forces in the West, including German forces, while at the same time avoiding the danger of a resurgence of German militarism. It was neither utopian nor impractical in the French view, the United States proposals did not contain all the necessary guarantees, and only a European framework could provide the necessary basis of security. The French did not object to the United States proposals that the number of German units should be limited to a fifth of available allied units, and that the prohibitions and limitations on German industry, with certain revisions, should be maintained, particularly those relating to heavy war materials and aviation.

6. But these conditions, which were accepted as essential by France, were not considered adequate to meet the problem. In particular, the reference in the United States plan to German "divisions", in the French view, seemed to be inconsistent with the decision that there should be no German general staff. History had shown that controls imposed by force were short lived, and that agreements reached on the basis of mutual interest had a far greater chance of survival. In considering the German problem, it was of the greatest importance to ensure that the German military caste and the big industrialists should never again be allowed to become the dominant elements in Germany. With such forces in the saddle there was always the twin dangers that a war would be unleashed with the object of unifying Germany, (German unity was a fundamental Western aim, but it must be achieved by peaceful means) and that a nationalist Germany might bite the hand that fed it.

7. These considerations had inspired the Pleven Plan, which in essence brought the German problem within the framework of the broad European policy which the French Government was pursuing both in the fields of economic development and of security. The movement towards European unity had been supported by the United States, and as M. Alphand also recalled, "nos amis canadiens" had always declared themselves in favour of French efforts to build European unity.

8. To bring about the participation of a democratic Germany in the framework of Western Europe, the first guarantees required were of an economic character. Thus, the Schuman Plan was an indispensable pre-condition of the Pleven Plan. It was with this same object in mind that the French Government had proposed the creation of a European army, which would have the maintenance of peace as its principal object, and prevent any one nation pursuing its own nationalist policies. The Pleven Plan would complete that Franco-German reconciliation towards which the Schuman Plan had been the first step.

9. M. Alphand noted that the proposals for German re-armament had stimulated the Soviet Government to lively protest, as was evident from the Soviet note of October 19th, the Prague declaration, and the aide mémoire of November 3rd, addressed to the United States, United Kingdom and France.[81] He felt that the creation of a European Army in which Germany participated only under clearly defined conditions would constitute far less provocation to the Soviet Union than the creation of German divisions in the framework of an Atlantic force. The combination of the Pleven and Schuman Plans would provide a "capital element" in building a United Europe, closely linked to the United States, and to Canada "au sein de la communauté Atlantique ainsi qu'au Commonwealth Britannique. Ces trois communautés — Europe occidentale, Amérique, Commonwealth — forment le monde libre". The day would doubtless come when these communities will join in establishing political, economic, and military institutions corresponding to their degree of integration.

10. M. Alphand then dealt with the principal criticisms which had been directed at the Pleven Plan and in so doing made several statements modifying in some degree earlier versions:

(i) The criticism that the ultimate goals of the French proposals, while acceptable, could only be achieved in the distant future, whereas the immediate threat was urgent and required urgent military measures. To this M. Alphand declared that the French proposal in its practical application was not unrealistic. Dealing with the size of the German units, he stated that he was authorized to say that in the opinion of the French Government the "smallest possible unit" would be the "combat team", made up of from five to six thousand men, including, in particular, infantry, artillery and engineer units, with three combat teams forming one division. This question of the size of German units would be primarily one for the Military Committee, but in M. Alphand's view it would be far less difficult for a German officer to participate effectively in such a "combat team" within a European division than in a German division within an integrated NATO force. This proposal was "an essential element" of any unanimous solution.

(ii) The criticism that a European Minister of Defence was unnecessary. To this he argued that a European army required political institutions, to which it could be attached. But M. Alphand indicated that there was room for compromise with respect to the proposed European Defence Minister, throwing out the suggestion that a European "High Commissioner" would be an acceptable substitute, acting vis-à-vis the European army in the same way as a National Defence Minister acts with respect to the national force of his own country. The European Defence Minister (or High Commissioner) would be charged particularly with carrying out the general directives of the Council composed of the Ministers of the participating countries. He would be the normal intermediary between "the European community", and third countries, or international agencies in all matters concerning the carrying out of his mission. In Germany itself, the French would be opposed to the establishment of a German Ministry of Defence as foreseen in the American proposals, but would agree to the recruitment of German effectives coming under a German federal agency. This agency might either be the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Labour, or possibly Public Health, and would operate in close liaison with the European Defence Minister or High Commissioner. Further, the French Government would not object to the immediate application, even before the signature of the treaty creating a European army, of certain interim measures preparing the way for the participation of German units. To this, however, M. Alphand attached two conditions: (a) That these interim measures should not hinder the ultimate formation of a European army; and (b) that until the formation of the European army they should not include the actual training of German units. Such interim measures would include the preparatory steps for recruitment in Germany, the construction of barracks and camps, etc. They would require careful study on the technical level.

(iii) To objections that the political element in the French proposals would mean further delay, M. Alphand stressed that barring unforeseen circumstances the Schuman Plan would be signed in a very short time. The treaty was now ready, and the solution of the last technical difficulties was in sight. Adenauer had given his complete accord and there had been encouragement from both the United States and the United Kingdom. Once the Schuman Plan was signed, the other problems fell into place. There was no question of having to wait for the completion of a European political federation, as some had said. The Parliamentary Assembly to which the European Defence Minister or High Commissioner would be responsible would be the same Assembly as provided for in the Schuman Plan. Within two or three months from the signature of the Schuman Plan it would be possible to take definitive steps and in the interval the necessary interim measures could be taken. Thus, less time would be lost than in the case of the implementation of the United States proposals, which provide that the allied forces must be given an absolute priority vis-à-vis Germany.

(iv) M. Alphand then dealt with the objection that Germany would be an unwilling partner were the French proposals to be implemented. He reiterated that the French Government did not intend to discriminate against Germany within the framework of the European army. Any discriminations which existed were the result of international actions arising out of the war, or of particular geographic situations such as exist in the overseas territories which require national forces for their defence, or from the structure of the Atlantic Pact itself. The European army would rest on a basis of reciprocal obligations. The French Government had received indications from Bonn that the German authorities fully understood the significance and the "generosity" of the French proposals, and agreed that without a formula for a European army the forces of German militarism would benefit at the expense of those German democracy.

11. M. Alphand then directed a special appeal to the United Kingdom. The French Government hoped that even though the United Kingdom Government had not found it possible to participate in the Schuman Plan, they would be able to participate in the European army. United Kingdom objections to the Schuman Plan were not pertinent in the case of the European army. However, if because of its overseas interests, its links with the Commonwealth, "or for any other reason", the United Kingdom could not participate in the European army, the French Government would understand the position, and the final decision of the United Kingdom Government would not alter the close and friendly relations existing between the two countries. If United Kingdom participation in a European army was not practicable, M. Alphand hoped that the United Kingdom would do everything it its power to support the French proposals.

12. M. Alphand concluded his statement by summarizing his principal points, stressing that it was the hope of his Government that a basis of agreement could be reached rapidly in order to remove any difficulties which might stand in the way of an integrated Atlantic force and the naming of a supreme commander.

Reference my immediately preceding telegram re German defence contribution.

1. Following Alphand's statement, at the Chairman's suggestion, it was agreed that the Deputies should study the French statement before dealing with its substance. Several questions were directed at M. Alphand. In reply to a question from Hoyer Millar, Alphand indicated that in addition to the units contributed to the European army, there would also be separate national contingents.

2. In reply to a further question dealing with the proposal that the Schuman Plan assembly should provide the higher political co-ordination for the European army, M. Alphand made it clear that in the case of countries which were not participants in the Schuman Plan special arrangements could be made for their association with the Schuman Plan assembly should they decide to participate in the European army. Hoyer Millar, who had raised this question, took the opportunity of making the point that while consideration of the German problem was proceeding, it was highly important that the impetus given to defence measures at the time of Korea should be maintained, and said his Government was going ahead at full speed with its expanded production programme.

3. The Netherlands Deputy raised a question concerning relations between the federal German agency and the European Defence Minister or High Commissioner. M. Alphand's reply was that the French had no fixed views on this relationship and he took the line that the details of the relationship could be worked out in the Assembly. He thought such problems relating to the European army would prove easier than those which had arisen in the Schuman Plan negotiations. In raising his question, the Netherlands Deputy made it clear that he had in mind avoiding the dangers of a situation where the European Defence Minister or High Commissioner would be a virtual dictator of German defence measures, a procedure which would be wholly unacceptable, in his view, to the Germans.

4. Having in mind the points raised in paragraphs 5-7 of your telegram No. 1768 of November 11th, I made a brief statement relating only to procedure to be followed in our consideration of the problem of German contribution, and to the need for urgency. Stressing the fact that the Deputies and the Military Committee were to meet jointly, I suggested that providing progress is made towards a solution at our current meetings, it would be necessary and advisable at a later date for both the Defence Ministers and the Foreign Ministers to meet jointly to consider this question. The problem had both political and military aspects, as had been recognized, and a joint session of Foreign and Defence Ministers seemed to be a logical consequence of the approach on which we were now basing our work.

5. In addition, I took the opportunity of making the point that time presses for a decision, and that every effort should be made to take advantage of the favourable public opinion existing in North America, which might change should there be further delays in reaching fundamental decisions.

6. There was general support for this suggestion as to further procedure, and Spofford stressed that the United States view was that meetings at Ministerial level should only be held when the Deputies had reached a substantial measure of agreement. M. Alphand supported our suggestion strongly, and referred to a previous proposal on these lines made by the Belgian Minister at the meetings in Washington. He also urged that the sooner the Deputies could meet with the Military Committee, the better.

7. The next meeting of the Deputies will be held November 15th at which discussion of this subject will be resumed. We gather that the United States Group here was given an indication before yesterday's meeting of the concessions which M. Alphand was authorized to make, but though these are regarded as substantial by the French, this view is not shared on the United States side. Leaving the meeting yesterday, Alphand agreed that the French position was more "flexible" than had appeared at Washington, but added that it was flexible only within the general framework of the Pleven Plan.

8. I am sure you will agree that there are many points yet to be clarified in the latest revision of the French proposals. It seems likely that a considerable part of tomorrow's session will be devoted to obtaining further clarification.

Repeat Washington EX-2359; Paris No. 429; Bonn No. 122.
Your telegrams Nos. 2182 and 2183 of November 14 and No. 2207 of November 16,† Deputies discussion of German defence contribution.

2. Unfortunately, as your telegram No. 2207 had no priority, we did not receive the advance copy until yesterday afternoon, by which time your Deputies' meeting had already taken place. For your next meeting, which we suppose may be November 20, we should like to let you know how our thinking on the German problem is developing. In general, we are reluctant at this distance to give you definite instructions as to what you should say for four reasons:

(a) Although the position of the French Government has been considerably clarified by the statements of M. Alphand in London and General Ely[82] in Washington, we are still none too clear as to what views will prevail in Paris at the Ministerial level;

(b) We are reluctant to put forward anything that might be labelled a Canadian compromise plan;

(c) Most of the Europeans have not yet clarified their attitude to a European Army;

(d) In the present delicate but hopeful state of negotiations, we believe that it is preferable to rely on your judgment on the spot as to whether a given suggestion that we might put forward would tend to smoke the French out or to dig them in.

3. We are encouraged by the concrete advance that M. Alphand and General Ely have been authorized to make during the past week. We think that the representatives of other countries might have gone out of their way to recognize that the French were making concessions and in your next statement we suggest that you might welcome both the advances made and the more flexible position adopted by the French, without indicating that you now think they have gone far enough. The prospects now seem brighter of reaching enough agreement to enable a successful Ministerial meeting to be called within the next month. We are satisfied that it would be folly to allow negotiations to founder on the points that now divide us in the military field. As A/V/M Campbell said to the Standing Group when General Ely announced the French willingness to accept the regimental combat team (or brigade group) as the basic unit, Canadian experience has indicated that while divisions are more desirable, brigade groups had functioned efficiently and successfully as a national component in the past, and could do so again. (As you will fully appreciate, the brigade group meets our own position since we ourselves contemplate a contribution of this character to forces in being in Europe.)

[82] Le lieutenant-général Paul Ely, représentant de la France au Groupe permanent.
Lieutenant-General Paul Ely, French Representative on the Standing Group.

4. A further reason for our readiness to go along with the French on brigade groups is the likelihood that the march of events will make the French realize, before any re-armament plan can actually be put into practice, that divisions are militarily a more efficient and necessary operational unit. Our immediate objective is to reach a point of agreement now from which progress can be made.

5. If agreement on the size of components seems in prospect, the most serious problems remaining centre around the organization of a European Army in both its military and political aspects. Before receiving your telegram No. 2215 we had intended to send you with this message our views on a European army, but as you will not be discussing this question on Monday, and as we have not yet cleared our own minds on this problem, we shall send you a separate message early next week.

6. All in all, we think that what we now need most is to keep our eyes on the essentials of the political and military problems, and not get bogged down in prolonged discussions of contingent detail, on which we could all argue indefinitely without reaching agreement. Essentially, the French are searching for an acceptable political formula, just as they do in their domestic politics. It would surely be their understanding as well as ours, once we agreed in principle on a formula, that the details could be worked out with a good deal of flexibility. Such a formula will have to be found preparatory to a meeting of Ministers, preferably a joint meeting of the Council and the Defence Committee. This meeting should take place as soon as possible, so that a practical start can be made with recruiting and training Germans. Prolonging our debate encourages both Soviet propaganda and American isolationism, and Germany, if she is not re-armed within a Western framework, may re-arm outside one.

DEPUTIES' MEETING, NOVEMBER 17TH: GERMAN DEFENCE CONTRIBUTION

Our discussion at this third meeting did not advance matters much further. The Chairman said at the outset that the Military Committee now expects to meet in London on November 23rd, and to meet jointly with the Deputies on November 27th. He then reviewed the way the question of a German contribution had come before the Deputies, in order to stress that our problem was primarily the practical one of recommending the ways in which this contribution could best be worked out. Alphand's statement, he said, had substantially broadened the area of agreement, although it was clear that both the United States and French proposals would require further elaboration as to details.

2. To make progress, he suggested de-limiting the specific areas of the problem under three broad headings:

(1) Purely military questions on which the advice of the Military Committee was a pre-requisite;

(2) Organizational and administrative questions relating to the machinery for the recruitment, training and supply of German units; and

(3) Political questions raised primarily by the French proposals. Spofford proposed that (1) should be reserved for discussion with the Military Committee; (3) should be taken up "later on"; and that we should seek now to make progress on the limited front of (2). For example, there seemed to be agreement in the two plans on the need for a German Federal Agency. Should the same Agency deal with both recruitment and training, and with procurement and supply? What were the problems incidental to setting up a Federal German Agency? What should be the methods of Allied control? How did the French conception of a European Defence Minister, or High Commissioner, fit in, and what would be his relationship to S.H.A.P.E.? These were practical matters on which a start might be made.

3. At this point Hoyer Millar intervened to raise the political issues on which almost everyone else had been silent hitherto, by pointing out that much more information was needed about the French plan, and suggesting that it seemed to be illogical in that it provided for equal German participation in the European Army, but an inferior status for Germans vis-à-vis the NATO participants in the whole integrated force. Under the French plan the German people would have a dual and confused status. This prompted Alphand to make a statement in which he was careful to say that he was giving only his own personal views, but which threw some further light on the French conception of the functions of the proposed High Commissioner (the term "European Defence Minister" now seems to be taking second place) and on the organization of German participation. At some future date the hope was that Germany would be a free partner in a united Europe. The present controls of Germany, however, were the product of the Occupation Statute, and could not be expected to disappear at a single stroke. The French envisaged the need for a German Federal Agency, and accepted the limitations on German rearmament set forth in the United States proposals.

4. Turning to the status of the proposed High Commissioner, Alphand repeated that his relationship to S.H.A.P.E., so far as the European Army was concerned, would be the same as that of the Defence Ministers of other NATO countries contributing forces to the integrated force. He then cited examples of the kind of functions which might be carried out by the High Commissioner. These included the development of common training programmes for the European Army, the establishment of officer-training courses aimed at developing European "esprit de corps", a common structure of command, standardization of arms, equipment, etc. He would also be charged with developing plans, in consultation with the Defence Ministers of other countries participating in the European Army, for the common budget envisaged. These suggestions were heard with considerable interest by the other European Deputies who have maintained a discreet silence on the French proposals, and the Netherlands Deputy extracted a promise from Alphand to put this rather "off the cuff" statement in writing and to circulate a paper setting forth these personal views as a basis for further discussion. Alphand agreed to do this, subject to the understanding that his paper would have no official status.

5. The Netherlands Deputy has been anxious to get further details of the French proposals, to focus attention on the practical aspects of the problem of German rearmament and on the need for securing German co-operation for any plan which is adopted.

6. Another question which was briefly touched upon, but not examined in detail, was the need of defining more clearly the respective spheres of responsibility in the raising of a German force as between the three Occupying Powers and the other NATO countries. Spofford threw out the suggestion that in subsequent discussions with the German authorities it might be best for the High Commission to act on behalf of the NATO countries in this respect.

7. At this point of the meeting the Chairman was obliged to leave for Brussels, where he is to see Mr. Van Zeeland, the new President of the Council. The Belgian Ambassador, as Acting Chairman, then took over, but little, if any, progress was made.

8. In the hope of focussing the attention of the Deputies on the practical organizational questions to which Spofford had referred earlier, I proposed that a Working Group of officials should meet at once to try to work out a short list of questions on the administrative problem only, which might provide a basis for our discussions on Monday. This suggestion was accepted, and a working group of officials, representing the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the Netherlands and Canada subsequently drew up the following brief list of suggested points for discussion on Monday:

"The ad hoc Drafting Group suggests the following questions to assist the Council Deputies in their consideration of the principles which should govern the setting up of machinery to deal with the recruitment, training, equipment and administration of German units to be incorporated into the integrated force for the defence of Europe (a) within Germany; (b) among the Occupying Powers; (c) within NATO:

(1) Should these matters be dealt with by a single German Federal Agency or by separate agencies in appropriate fields?

(2) What controls should be exercised over such German Federal Agency (or agencies)?

(3) By what authorities should such controls be exercised?

(4) What should be the mutual relationship between S.H.A.P.E., the German Federal Agency (or agencies) and other authorities concerned?"

9. At this stage it is difficult to see what progress can be made until the other European countries who are most directly affected by the French proposals, are prepared to express their views. Privately there seems to be no enthusiasm whatever for the French proposals, and particularly for the elaborate super-structure envisaged. But with the exception of the Italian and Portuguese Deputies, none of the other continental representatives has as yet expressed his views openly. The United Kingdom Deputy has made no general statement, but his comments and questions leave no doubt as to the United Kingdom attitude. Spofford's own position has been difficult since, as Chairman, he is anxious to get on with the job, but as United States Deputy he is still awaiting the formulation of final United States views. I am therefore not optimistic of the ability of the Deputies to make much advance prior to the session with the Military Committee until the European Governments particularly define their attitude more clearly to the French proposals.

10. The approach which Spofford has suggested of concentrating attention on practical problems of administration may be a useful one, and on the basis of the questions listed in my paragraph 8 above I should be grateful to have your guidance in advance of Monday's meeting.

11. Finally, it would be useful, in advance of the discussions with the Military Committee, to have a summary of your views on military aspects. In particular I should be grateful to have your comments on the views of our Washington Joint Staff on the French proposal summarized in telegram No. 1747 of November 9th.†

For three main reasons the meeting yesterday was more productive of ideas and almost of a sense of achievement:

(1) A number of the Deputies had been able to consult their Governments on the specific questions prepared by the drafting group, referred to in paragraph 8 of my telegram No. 2215 of November 18th, and were in a position, if not to give concrete answers, at least to indicate general views;

(2) There was an evident feeling of the importance of seeking ways of bringing more closely together the United States and French points of view; and

(3) A counter-proposal was introduced by one of the European countries most directly affected by the French plan, i.e., The Netherlands, stressing the importance of maintaining the unity of the North Atlantic area, and putting forward the suggestion of a NATO High Commissioner as an alternative to the European High Commissioner advocated by M. Alphand. This compromise proposal lost some of its effect by a concluding United States statement suggesting postponement of consideration of political aspects and the implementation of interim military measures, reported in my immediately following telegram.

2. At the outset, the Chairman referred briefly to his recent visit in Brussels with Mr. Van Zeeland, and their discussion of plans for the next Council meeting, which would depend upon the progress made here. No date for the meeting was decided upon. You will already have noticed the discrepancy between the dates given by Spofford, as reported in our telegram No. 2215 of November 18th and the timetable outlined in your telegram No. 1799† of the same date. Yesterday Spofford expected that the Military Committee would meet in London about December 5th, and that an announcement would be made from Washington.

3. Spofford then turned to consider the questions prepared by the drafting group, as set forth in paragraph 8 of my telegram under reference. He stressed the importance of directing our discussion to general principles, rather than to details, and of avoiding establishing too rigid a framework at this stage. Before proceeding round the table on the detailed questions, Spofford made a brief comment in connection with the problem of discrimination, stating that the United States' view was that discrimination against the Federal German Government in the matter of defence should be kept to a minimum, and that efforts should be made to obtain their co-operation and willing participation in the integrated force.

4. A general discussion based on the drafting group's questions then followed. The discussion of question 1, dealing with the nature of the German Federal Agency, and question 4, dealing with the mutual relationship between SHAPE, the German Agency and other authorities concerned, was least productive. There were three principal difficulties. It was recognized

(1) That military factors were involved in arrangements dealing with recruitment and training, etc. of German units,

(2) That special responsibilities rested upon the three Occupying Powers and on SHAPE, and

(3) That it was necessary to have a clearer picture of the political institutions which might emerge before useful comment could be made on the relationship between such institutions, SHAPE, and the German Federal Agency.

5. On question 1, it was generally recognized that the aim should be to combine a militarily efficient German contribution with appropriate safeguards. There was, however, a difference of view as to whether this aim could best be achieved by the establishment of a single German agency or separate agencies. There was a good deal of support, in these preliminary discussions, for the view that recruitment and administration might appropriately be handled by a German Ministry of Labour, or Interior, but that training was a matter for which the Allied Occupation Forces and the Supreme Commander must be responsible. The general feeling was that the question of the allocation of duties as between agencies should be determined on practical grounds. A number of Deputies, including Spofford and Alphand and myself took the view that supply matters might be dealt with by a separate German agency. The Norwegian Deputy on the other hand, felt that from the point of view of efficiency and security it might be best not to split up the various functions. Support for a single Federal Agency was also given by The Netherlands Deputy on the ground of efficiency and security.

6. The discussion of question 4 made it clear that it was difficult to deal usefully with the relationship between SHAPE and the German Federal Agency, or Agencies, until more is known about the "other authorities concerned". There was, however, considerable support for the view that the general objective should be to try to equate the relations between SHAPE and the German Federal Agency as closely as possible to the relations between SHAPE and the Defence Ministries of the other countries.

7. The most useful discussion emerged in connection with consideration of questions 2 and 3 dealing with the controls to be exercised over the German Federal Agency, or Agencies, and the authorities through which such controls should be exercised. These two questions were considered jointly.

8. In the discussion of the nature of the German Federal Agency, the Netherlands Deputy had taken the view that a single German Agency would be more efficient since it would be easier to supervise its activities, and through NATO, to ensure the necessary guarantees. It was at this point that he introduced the new conception of a NATO High Commissioner, who would give general policy directives to the German Agency and to all the elements in the integrated force. According to these Dutch proposals, the German Agency would be partly responsible for training and for such matters as registration, supply and foodstuffs, clothing, barracks, etc. Such matters, however, as policy coordination mobilization procedures etc., should become the prerogative of the NATO High Commissioner. As time goes on and the German Government gives proof of their good intentions, it might be possible to reduce the tasks of the NATO High Commissioner and transfer some of his powers of supervision direct to the German Federal Agency. The responsibilities of a Minister of Defence in the NATO countries should, in the case of Germany, be divided between the German Federal Agency and a NATO High Commissioner.

9. At this point, Alphand, who had been listening to the conception of a NATO High Commissioner with great interest, asked for a further explanation, to which Van Starkenborgh replied that the conception of a NATO High Commissioner was "easily explainable". The Netherlands Government felt that the German question should be placed as much as possible within the framework of NATO, and that the guarantees against a resurgent Germany would be stronger if we each felt a partial responsibility for maintaining them. While the Occupying Powers had a special position, they were not a permanent institution. The ultimate goal was to make Germany a partner in our endeavours, and that was essentially a NATO question. (The Netherlands Deputy did not expand on how a NATO High Commissioner would fit into the present NATO structure, but he told me privately that he should be responsible to the Council, and have a general responsibility for all elements of the integrated force.)

10. Hoyer Millar drew a useful distinction between negative controls which might best be operated through the three Occupying Powers and the Allied High Commission, and positive controls, aimed at providing ways of permitting the Germans to make an effective contribution to Western defence, which might be the particular responsibility of NATO operating either through SHAPE, or through a NATO High Commissioner, a suggestion which he was inclined to view favourably.

11. Alphand agreed with the distinction between negative and positive controls, and expressed the view that the negative controls which would ultimately disappear, e.g., de-Nazification measures, the proportion of German troops, etc., should be exercised through the machinery of the Occupying Powers, but that the positive controls permitting the German forces to develop within an integrated European framework should be exercised on the European basis outlined in the French proposals.

12. I commented briefly on the negative controls listed in the United States proposal and agreed that these would inevitably be the primary responsibility of the Allied High Commission until such time as a Peace Treaty with Germany becomes practicable, at which time the remaining necessary controls would presumably be incorporated in Treaty provisions. I also expressed interest in the Dutch proposal concerning a NATO High Commission, saying that it was well worth exploring. Such an agency might provide a continuing link between the NATO machinery and the German authorities, and might assume primary responsibility for implementing the positive controls to which reference had been made.

13. The Belgian Deputy agreed that the negative controls on Germany would undoubtedly disappear progressively but thought the best positive control lay in developing some method of integrating Germans within the European framework.

14. Spofford agreed with Hoyer Millar on negative controls, or "wasting" controls as he called them, and said that their authority really derived from the Allied High Commission and the occupation statute. In the United States view, it was best to use existing agencies under the statute. The Supreme Commander would also have certain functions in the field of control, as outlined in the United States proposals. He added that the United States authorities placed considerable emphasis on the importance of developing effective machinery to screen German officer personnel and to select and train new officers. It was extremely important to avoid the establishment of an officer class. In general, the United States view was that so far as possible, existing legal and administrative machinery should be used to meet the present problem.

15. While this discussion was of a very preliminary character, there was a distinct feeling that The Netherlands proposal for the appointment of a NATO High Commissioner went some way towards reconciling the desire of the majority of the countries represented for institutions on a North Atlantic rather than solely European basis, and the French conception of the need for general political coordination and supervision of defence arrangements. It was also felt that this proposal went some distance in satisfying the requirement that the Germans should not feel that they were being discriminated against. Favourable preliminary comment was made on The Netherlands proposal by the Norwegian, Danish and United Kingdom delegate.

16. At the Chairman's suggestion, it was agreed that the Belgian Deputy who has not committed himself on the French proposals should prepare a paper summarizing the discussion, bringing out points of agreement and difference.

17. The Chairman said he had just received a message from Colonel Donnelly, the Secretary of the Standing Group, indicating that Document M C 30,† which, we understand, is the report of the Standing Group on a German contribution prepared after consultations with accredited military representatives, is being sent forward and would be circulated here as soon as possible.

18. My immediately following telegram summarizes Spofford's proposals for the implementation of interim measures. My impression is that while there is no doubt a good case to be made for proceeding immediately with interim measures, it is too early to assume that further measures of agreement of political aspects might not be possible largely as a result of the formula advanced by The Netherlands Deputy.

1. At the beginning of the meeting, we were told privately by Achilles that over the week-end Spofford had received instructions from Washington to the effect that military and political aspects of German problem should be separated as quickly as possible, that efforts should be made to secure agreement to getting on with the formation of military units, and to give the political aspects of the French plan subsequent study. It was on the basis of these instructions that Spofford made his general statement at the conclusion of the meeting, concerning interim military measures. He stressed again need for urgency and for getting the military arrangements out of the planning stage. The continued public discussion of the question of re-armament in Germany was not improving matters, and long delays made the ultimate solution even more difficult. The creation of political institutions required lengthy and mature consideration, and raised difficult problems of sovereignty which could not be solved overnight. It was difficult to arrive now at a definite conclusion on political problems, and any attempt to do so might mean the exertion of pressure which would unavoidably produce unsatisfactory results, and might prejudice the early completion of our common military objectives. The logical conclusion, therefore, was that consideration might now be given to proceeding with military measures on a transitional basis, and to get these preliminary measures working without delay. Careful study should be give to the various proposals for political institutions, but we must abandon perfectionism and seek for interim solutions. Such similar interim programmes had already been developed in the production and financial fields without jeopardizing ultimate solutions. Similar techniques could be developed in connection with this problem of a German military contribution. The question of what the most effective size of units should be would be made clearer in the military paper shortly to be circulated. Preliminary recruitment and training measures, however, might be carried out through a German Agency operating under the Allied High Commission Control, and material problems dealt with through appropriate NATO agencies. If and when the political institutions envisaged should develop, there could be a progressive transfer of responsibility. Spofford thought, however, that the military authorities would make it a condition that any subsequent transfer of responsibility to a political authority, for example, must satisfy military requirements. During this interim period, it would be possible to get on with the appointment of the Supreme Commander, to deal with the related staff problems and obtain some actual experience of dealing with Germans.

2. The Chairman promised to circulate a copy of these United States' views which are to be considered at our next meeting, now called for Thursday morning, November 23rd.

3. Copies of this and my immediately preceding telegram are being sent to Paris and Bonn by air bag.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-2386.

Your telegrams Nos. 2242 and 2243 of November 21 re Deputies' discussion of German defence contribution.

1. The essential question to which the Deputies will, we suppose, be addressing themselves at tomorrow's meeting is whether the political and military aspects could, or should, be separated as proposed by Spofford, and the political problems put on ice while an attempt is made to recruit and train Germans in the Western zones.

2. We all want to make progress on the military front as soon as possible, but we are inclined to think that if there is any prospect of reaching agreement in principle on the major political question, there would be more to lose than to gain by cutting short the political discussion. M. Alphand has made important advances in the French position, although some of these have yet to be confirmed officially by the French Government. The Americans are now prepared to accept brigade groups. According to the French, signature of the Schuman plan may be only a week away. There may be some possibility of compromise along the lines of the Dutch idea of a NATO High Commissioner particularly since Alphand has not turned it down out of hand. It therefore seems to us that the prospect of some compromise is a good deal better now than when the German re-armament discussion began and that we can afford a little more time for the continuation of what is beginning to look like a fruitful political discussion.

3. If, on the other hand, it is agreed to discuss only the military modalities, it would, we think, be an illusion to believe that the political question would stand still. Public opinion will not remain static because the Governments have agreed not to talk about the issue for a few months. Instead of becoming more soluble in the interval, the political problems may grow still more difficult, as is perhaps indicated by the recent elections in the United States and in the U.S. zone of Germany. Political problems are at the heart of not only the French but of the German and American debates on policy.

4. Further, the political and military aspects of the problem are basically inseparable, as even the Standing Group's paper shows. The revisions in M.C.30,† which you will receive through Joint Staff channels, indicate that the Standing Group have agreed that German participation in the air is of such importance that it is within the political province. The paper makes a similar statement in accepting brigade groups as the basic unit.

5. Finally, Spofford's suggestion that in the further discussion of a European Army, the military authorities would virtually have a veto, will probably not commend itself to many Governments. In our view decisions of this order, involving judgment of both military and political issues, must be made by Governments.

6. While the preceding argument leads us to the conclusion that we cannot at present support without qualifications Spofford's proposal that political issues be left in abeyance while interim military arrangements are proceeded with, we are in no position to take a strong line. Our contribution to an integrated force will be small whatever disposition is made of the rest of the Special Force. It might therefore be unsteadying to our partners if we were to be unduly active in proposing solutions.

7. As regards the Dutch proposal for a NATO High Commissioner, as against Alphand's proposal that there should be a European High Commissioner, there seems to us to be a possibility that contradictions may emerge which, if they are not reconciled, would pose awkward choices for us, and indeed for all North Atlantic countries. We hope that it will be possible to avoid a policy clash on future political architecture, and instead that the Dutch proposal may be a basis for compromise between European and NATO concepts of organization.

8. The above paragraphs represent our present line of thinking and are, of course, for your background information only. We do not think that the subjects are ones on which a Canadian representative should be expected to take the initiative.

9. We think that if you feel you can usefully contribute to a solution by so doing you might speak at tomorrow's meeting on somewhat the following lines:

(a) Welcome the concession made by both the French and the United States, including the most recent U.S. concession accepting (in the Standing Group paper) brigade groups as the largest unit for the time being;

(b) Say that we do not think that it is practicable to separate the military and political issues involved in the German problem, although we recognize, with the Americans, the urgency from all points of view of making as rapid progress as possible on the military front;

(c) Confirm your previous statement on the Dutch proposal for a NATO High Commissioner, saying it is worth careful exploration; as yet, however, you should not give it our blessing but rather express the hope that, on closer examination, it may become the basis for a compromise.

From my report of Deputies discussion of German defence contribution at the meeting November 24th,† the following points will be clear:

1. You will see that it has not proved possible to avoid some discussion of future political architecture (paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 1820, November 20th). By raising the objective of a European army (which is the most important element of the French plan) and related European institutions, the French have raised fundamental issues affecting the form of inter-European and NATO association, the consideration of which may perhaps be postponed, but cannot be avoided.

2. The French are not likely to be budged from the main outline of their plan, and do not regard the Netherlands proposal for a NATO High Commissioner as a possible alternative.

3. The French position has been strengthened by the fact that despite the oft-repeated statements from the United States side that the French proposals are essentially a matter for European countries concerned, the United States has gone farther in paragraph 7 of Spofford's memorandum than any European Government in the commitment in principle supporting a study of the objectives of the French proposals.

4. This has increased the difficulties of the United Kingdom whose dilemma is evident from Hoyer Millar's questions, and of those who have anxiously been awaiting an indication of the United Kingdom's intentions. The other European countries have been conspicuously silent.

5. As a result, I am less hopeful of the possibilities of finding a compromise to the French proposals, and feel that beyond comments on specific points raised in M.C.30,† we can only await further indication of intentions of European Governments principally concerned, regarding the latest United States proposals. These, together with the United States memorandum on interim measures are likely to be the principal basis for next week's discussions.

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: Your telegrams Nos. 2284†, 2285† and 2287.

1. In the time available, we cannot give you detailed comments, nor would we wish to do so at this stage. We believe you should continue to take a back seat.

2. For your further informal guidance, however, we can offer one or two general observations.

3. In the present circumstances of urgency, we are impressed by Spofford's proposals, especially as he has now agreed with you that our efforts to reach a wider political agreement have not been exhausted. We agree that it would be useful to proceed concurrently on both political and military problems, and tackle as soon as possible the immediate practical measures of preliminary military organization to the Western Zones of Germany.

4. As regards the political problem, we consider it is primarily for European members to state their attitudes towards the French proposals for a European Army. Until we have a clearer idea as to which continental countries are likely to support a European Army, at least in principle, all our further discussions on political questions will be of limited value.

5. Our hope would be that the European countries would at the least agree to sit down now and work out an acceptable scheme for the establishment of a European Army. We say this because as yet no political alternative has been proposed which offers equal hope of solving the essential difficulty of German association. We do not think that there will necessarily prove to be, in the long run, the clear cut antithesis between the European and NATO concepts of organization which appears to emerge in this debate in the Deputies.

6. As regard the points raised by the Chairman for discussion of M.C.30† at tomorrow's meeting, we think that the Standing Group and military representatives have produced a very sensible draft, giving due weight to political factors that cannot be disentangled from the military specifically, paragraphs 2, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of Document D-D/194† seem to us to indicate movement in the right direction. On the other points, we shall be sending you our views later. Ends.

DEPUTIES' MEETING, NOVEMBER 28TH: GERMAN DEFENCE CONTRIBUTION

1. Meeting originally scheduled for Wednesday was advanced to 28th. Since all Deputies were clearly prepared to make statements, I briefly outlined the Canadian position by (1) supporting United States interim proposals regarding provisional arrangements for participation of Germany in European defence (2) stressing urgency of arrangements for integrated force, including a German contribution; (3) agreeing with United States view that adequate opportunity should be afforded to work out French proposals, and that at same time there should be no delay in commencing forthwith implementing proposal for participation of German units; (4) pointing out that European and NATO conceptions of association were not necessarily divergent, but actually closely linked; (5) referring to significance of Canadian proposals for re-organizing NATO structure; (6) suggesting that should French plan not prove practicable within reasonable time an alternative solution should immediately be sought. Text of my statement which was made at beginning of meeting, is contained in my immediately following telegram.

2. Deputies of United Kingdom, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Denmark, Belgium, Luxembourg, Italy and Iceland then made general statements, majority of which indicated agreement with United States interim proposals, but visible lack of enthusiasm for French plan. Hoyer Millar indicated that Mr. Bevin would be obliged to make some remarks on this subject in Commons debate, and said that United Kingdom Government did not like the French plan, and supported the United States interim proposals which would permit progress on immediate military front and subsequent consideration to be given to French political objectives. United Kingdom Government was not prepared to take part in a European army, in view of existing obligations to NATO and Commonwealth and overseas commitments. At the same time, no difficulties would be placed in the way of other countries who wished to participate in working out French plan. Should French plan be delayed for any reason, United Kingdom view was that original majority plan should proceed in view of great importance of establishing effective military organization under Supreme Commander.

3. Netherlands Deputy said his Government was convinced that German participation was indispensable to NATO defence, and should be proceeded with expeditiously irrespective of outcome of proposed French negotiations. Netherlands Government still preferred German participation on direct and equal basis within NATO framework. Netherlands Government would have been able to consider participation in European army had United Kingdom Government decided to participate, since this was not to be the case, Netherlands Government would not take part, but at the same time would not oppose efforts to group European Powers more closely within NATO framework.

4. Norwegian Deputy emphasized need for urgent action and expressed view similar to Netherlands Deputy. He supported United States interim proposals, indicating that Norway was not opposed to incorporation of German units in a European army if and when such an army is established. He expressed view, however, that Germany would tend to dominate a European group that was too small, as would be the case if only minority of the ten European countries in NATO were active participants.

5. Portuguese Deputy expressed agreement with United States interim proposals and for organizing German contribution within NATO framework, reserving freedom of action of his Government on Paris conference. Danish Deputy also supported United States interim proposals and would prefer to see a direct German contribution to integrated NATO force. While he could not say definitely whether or not Denmark would take part in proposed Paris conference, he would say that his Government would hesitate should acceptance in principle in advance be a requirement. The Danish Government felt that United States plan for recruiting German manpower should not be influenced by results of Paris negotiation.

6. Belgian Deputy said he had no instructions, and had nothing to add to statement reported in paragraph 5 of my telegram No. 2304 of November 28th.† Luxembourg Deputy made surprising statement that while his Government was sympathetic to French proposals, they recognized need for urgency and would favour implementing proposed United States interim arrangements. He added that his Government's view might be modified by comments on behalf of other Governments. Italian Deputy added little to his previous statement and indicated that his Government favoured United States provisional arrangements, leaving French proposals over for further consideration. Icelandic Deputy commented briefly that general objective should be to ensure highest measure of efficiency for common defence.

7. Alphand made no comment yesterday, and we shall not know next step until he returns from Paris in time for next meeting scheduled for Friday.

8. Chairman again referred to draft working paper which he is to circulate today setting forth the points of common agreement and disagreement. In doing so, he followed our thought in emphasizing that there was not necessarily conflict between ideas of European and NATO associations, but that these should properly be regarded as complementary to each other. Should Paris negotiations result in stronger European grouping, this would act to strengthen NATO area as a whole.

9. Norwegian Deputy raised question as to whether Paris conference would be left wholly to European participants to work out themselves, or whether it had better be held under auspices of some NATO body. United Kingdom Deputy quickly pointed out that conference at Paris would certainly not be a NATO conference, and Alphand made it clear that conference would be convened by French Government, and that he would have to reserve his position on his Government's attitude with respect to question of liaison between NATO and Paris conference.

10. In view of atmospheric conditions foregoing summary being sent to you by cable. It is based upon fuller telegram, copies of which have already been sent by air bag to Bonn and Paris.

Reference paragraph one of my immediately preceding telegram. Following is text of my remarks at today's meeting of Deputies on problem of German contribution.

"We are impressed by the recent United States proposals regarding provisional arrangements for the participation of Germany in European defence, and give them our support. Our chief reason for doing so is the urgency of the present situation which requires us to make progress with all possible speed in the arrangements for the integrated force and the participation of Germans under appropriate safeguards in that force.

It is our feeling that the European members of NATO are more directly concerned with working out the political aspects of the arrangements for German participation, and also have more detailed knowledge of Germany than a North American country which, unlike the United States, has not had such intimate connections with German affairs since the end of the war. Our main concern is with the principal objective, which is to bring about adequate defence for the North Atlantic area in the shortest possible space of time.

In this connection we feel that we are in a position to emphasize particularly the effect which undue delay may have on North American opinion. In particular, we are concerned that any undue delay may bring about a change in American public opinion towards the whole possibility of bringing about an effective defence of Western Europe. I think that all the Deputies will agree that this is a most important factor which all Governments should keep constantly before them.

We appreciate the reasons which have led the French Government to put forward their plan for a European army, and think every opportunity should be afforded to the Governments concerned to work out its implications. This, I understand, is an integral part of the recent United States proposals. We agree with the United States Government, however, that in thus affording an adequate opportunity to work out the French proposals, there should be no delay in commencing forthwith the implementation of the military aspects of the proposal for the participation of German units in the integrated force. We hope that attitudes will be sufficiently flexible so that if it should prove not be practical to work out the details of the French plan within a reasonable period of time, consideration will be given to other means of affording that security against the resurgence of German militarism which France so understandably desires to avoid, a desire which indeed is shared by all of our countries.

Our discussions so far have envisaged two conceptions of means for providing adequate defence with German participation and at the same time providing safeguards against the resurgence of German militarism. We are all agreed that there should be no German national army and no German general staff. We are also approaching agreement on the size of the German units to be employed. Where we differ is that some countries feel that the necessary security can best be achieved by the participation of German units within the framework of a European army, and others consider that this security can just as well be achieved within the framework of a North Atlantic integrated force. We think that possibly too much attention has been focussed on what may now appear to us to be two opposing methods of approach. It is not for a country like Canada to say which method is better suited to the requirements, or will better meet with the approval of public opinion in the European countries. We see, however, merits in both approaches, and think that whichever approach is adopted the criterion of military efficiency should always be kept in the forefront. We recognize the considerations which have prompted the French Government to put forward proposals designed to strengthen the European association. We believe that the North Atlantic approach also has merit from the point of view of providing security against the resurgence of German militarism. The proposal for an integrated force represents a great step forward in the direction of greater cohesion of the North Atlantic community. Further cohesion would result from the adoption of the Canadian proposal for converting the Council into a Council of Governments, which we believe the treaty intended it to be. We can see the North Atlantic conception gradually developing until it emerges as an association of countries working closely together, developing close economic cooperation, and consulting continuously on foreign policy. The truth may well lie in our recognizing that these two conceptions of the European and the North Atlantic association are not really divergent, but actually closely linked together.

To sum up, therefore, we support the United States interim proposals because they afford the best chance of making immediate progress in the military sphere which is so important in the present circumstances of urgency. We feel also that they afford an opportunity of working out the details of the French plan within a reasonable period of time. The only suggestion we would make is that if it does not prove practicable to secure acceptance of the French plan within a reasonable period of time, a solution on other lines should immediately be sought. Another advantage we see in the United States proposals is that they would give an opportunity for the occupying Powers to ascertain more precisely the German attitude, which is clearly an important factor in determining which method of approach in the political sphere would eventually be adopted."

TELEGRAM 2341 London, November 30, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

We have just received text of Chairman's draft report (working paper on problem of German contribution). Although it is lengthy, in view of importance of the document and the fact that you will no doubt wish to study it over the week-end, I am sending the text in full, Begins:

Introductory

1. The report of the Military Committee (M.C.30)† was considered by the Deputies and the Military Committee in consultation and has been approved as set forth in Annex "A" hereto.†

2. Certain questions considered in the report were left open for determination pending consideration of the political aspects by the Deputies. These questions have been reviewed by the Deputies and are embodied in their comments set forth below.

General Principles

3. The need for organizing and developing the collective defence of Europe is increasing rather than diminishing. The Council has already decided that the defence of Europe will require the establishment of an integrated force, under centralized command and control, composed of forces made available by participating Governments and full utilization of manpower and productive resources available from all sources.

4. From a political point of view, the Council Deputies concur in and endorse the statements made in paragraph 1 through 8 of M.C. 30, particularly that the defence of the North Atlantic area requires that Western Europe be defended as far to the east as possible, that the considerable potential of Western Germany must be denied to the enemy and secured for the North Atlantic nations, that an acceptable and realistic defence of Western Europe and the adoption of a forward strategy cannot be contemplated without active and willing German participation, and that the process of building up the total forces required must be initiated in the immediate future.

5. The Deputies have been considering the political aspects of German participation in the defence of the North Atlantic area. They are agreed that the following principles are applicable:

(a) Any system of German participation must be within the NATO structure, whether directly or indirectly;

(b) The system must be militarily acceptable and the units formed thereunder must be effective;

(c) In so far as possible, a European, as distinct from a national, spirit should be instilled in the German contingents;

(d) German units should be on a basis of full equality with units of other participating countries with which they are integrated;

(e) Recognizing that in any solution adopted some controls on Germany will be required, the solution should provide for the progressive diminution of such control over Germany to the extent that such diminution will not lead to a resurgence of traditional German militarism.

(f) The solution should provide for the rapid formation and training of German units;

(g) To make rapid progress, existing organizations and agencies should be utilized in the initial phases, without prejudicing the development of effective permanent institutions which can assume the necessary responsibilities;

(h) The solution adopted should be flexible and subject to modification in the light of experience.

6. In reviewing the military and political aspects of the problem the Deputies are convinced that concurrent solutions cannot be found to all the questions presented. While work proceeds toward the solution of the political aspects of the problem, certain measures, upon which there already exists a large measure of agreement, can and must be taken immediately. This conviction dictates the use of provisional measures during a transitional period. The purpose of such a transitional period would be:

(a) To permit the essentials of the military organization to proceed immediately;

(b) To proceed with recruitment of German manpower and production of material under provisional arrangements pending development of a more permanent system; and

(c) to enable the broader political problems to be dealt with concurrently but apart from the urgency of initiating military measures.

These provisional arrangements would be progressively superseded as and to the extent that permanent mechanisms, either military or political, were developed which would be effective to discharge the various responsibilities.

Political Aspects of Military Question

7. The Deputies are agreed on the following recommendations on those military questions left open for determination pending consideration of the political aspects;

(a) Size of German formations: (German formations should be the smallest completely balanced units as determined by military considerations).

Note: The size of German units should await consideration of the final report of the Military Committee.

(b) Air units: The German contribution should include appropriate air units for defence of Western Germany and support of German ground units. Such air units would be within the integrated air components of the Supreme Commander.

(c) Conscription or voluntary enlistment: The Deputies consider that this problem should be determined by the German authorities. There is no political objection to a conscription system for German units. In fact, conscription may give a more democratic and less traditionally militaristic character to these units. In general, the action of the German Federal Republic should be governed by the recommendations of the Military Committee as endorsed by the Deputies with regard to military service.

(d) Contribution of German production: Subject to the safeguards set forth in Annex "A",† the Deputies consider that German production should contribute to the greatest extent possible to the support of the German contribution, and to such other phases of the common defence as may be reasonable and within her capabilities. The nature and size of the contribution required of the German armament industry should be recommended by the appropriate agencies of NATO.

Until other arrangements are adopted the safeguards on production will continue to be exercised by the occupying authorities. There must, of course, be close cooperation between this agency and the Defence Production Boards of the NATO.

(e) Plans for raising and preliminary training of German forces: The Deputies agree that the detailed plans for the raising and preliminary training of German forces should be made by the occupying authorities in concert with the Supreme Commander and appropriate German authorities after the initial discussions with the Germans have clarified the overall problems.

(f) Internal organization in Germany: The Deputies have discussed various aspects of the internal defence organization in Germany. They recognize that a final determination must be made in conjunction with the German authorities. German internal organization will also depend to some extent on the nature of any political defence structure which evolves in Europe and in NATO. The Deputies consider than an inter-Allied agency is not an acceptable substitute for a German organization. Whether or not these functions should be performed by one or more German agencies should be determined after discussions with the German authorities. It is generally agreed that:

(1) The organization should be capable of fulfilling its functions effectively and rapidly;

(2) The functions to be performed by such organization would be limited to prevent the development of a powerful Defence Ministry;

(3) To insure against the possible re-creation of a general staff, operational, planning and intelligence functions above the level of authorized units should not be established in the German defence structure.

The Deputies consider that the enforcement of the safeguards, as set forth in Annex "A", should be the responsibility of the Occupying Powers. The enforcement of those safeguards can be progressively transferred to the appropriate European or NATO agency if and to the extent that this should later be considered advisable, or relinquished as the need for them ceases.

Political Questions

8. The Deputies recalled that the Council in its resolution of September 26th, 1950, (C5-D/11-Final) stipulated that the integrated force should be organized under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and be subject to political and strategic guidance exercised by the appropriate agencies of the North Atlantic Treaty.

9. The Deputies have considered the French proposals that there be included within the NATO framework a European army subject to European as well as NATO political guidance. They are agreed that any such institutions, if and when created, must

(a) Strengthen the North Atlantic community and the integrated defence of the North Atlantic area;

(b) Be integrated into the NATO framework;

(c) Promote the closer association of the countries of Western Europe and tie Western Germany more firmly to the West.

10. The creation of a European defence structure raises problems which require profound and mature consideration, and which cannot be adequately solved in haste. If fully adequate and lasting solutions are to be found, such problems should be considered on their merits and free from the pressure of initiating military measures. Furthermore, it could not realistically be expected that these solutions, even if agreement upon them were quickly reached, could attain adequate development in time to serve as a framework for the rapid initiation of effective military strength.

11. The Deputies consider that the European Powers which wish to participate (including the German Federal Republic) and observers from other NAT Governments, if the latter desire to be so represented, should be convened to consider the French Government's proposals for an European army and the attendant supporting political institutions. To the extent that agreement is reached by the European Powers upon such arrangements, and they are developed to the point where they can create and support effectively military forces of a European rather than a national character, suitable for integration into NATO, these arrangements will be placed progressively into operation and can then supersede the transitional arrangements. The final test of all such arrangements must be whether, in the judgment of NATO, they are militarily effective and serve to strengthen the North Atlantic community. The transitional arrangements shall continue in effect until replaced either by the arrangements so agreed upon or by other arrangements adopted by the NATO in the light of experience. Assurances should be given to the German Federal Government that they would have full equality in the discussions concerning the political superstructure for Western European defence and equality of treatment of German units in the integrated force.

12. Consideration of these political problems must not delay the prompt initiation of those military measures upon which agreement has been reached by the Military Committee and which can be initiated forthwith. The Deputies consider that the Allied occupation authorities in Germany should be authorized, on behalf of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, to discuss with the German Federal Government the question of German participation in Western European defence along the lines set forth in Annex "A". The principles enunciated therein and in this document should guide the occupation authorities. The object of these discussions should be to secure the earliest possible recruitment and training of German formations for the integrated defence force. The German Federal Government should also be informed of the desire of the NATO members to maintain flexibility in such provisional arrangements as may be agreed upon so that appropriate modification can be made in the light of experience.

13. Definitive solutions of the various segments of the problem gained by German participation would be facilitated by actual experience in working under provisional agreements for a period after the Supreme Commander has been appointed and in dealing with the practical problems involved in developing an integrated force for the defence of Europe, including German formations. They consider this a matter of primary importance for the rapid solution of both the short-term and long-term problems.

Conclusions

The Deputies, therefore, submit the following conclusions:

(1) The report of the Military Committee constitutes an acceptable basis, from the political aspect, for German participation in the defence of Western Europe.

(2) The political climate in Germany is deteriorating to the detriment of German willingness to cooperate in the European defence effort.

(3) Consideration of the political superstructure and a European army for Western European defence proposed by the French Government should not delay the prompt initiation of those military measures upon which agreement has been reached.

Recommendations

The Deputies therefore recommend:

(1) That this report and Annex "A" thereto be approved.

(2) That the Allied occupation authorities in Germany should be authorized, on behalf of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, to discuss with the German Federal Government the question of German participation in the defence of Western Europe in accordance with this report and Annex "A" and be requested to report the results of such discussions and the steps taken to initiate German participation in accordance therewith.

(3) That the European Powers which wish to participate (including the German Federal Republic) and observers from other NAT Governments, if the latter desire to be so represented, should be convened at the invitation of the French Government to consider its proposals for a European army and its attendant political institutions. Ends.

DEPUTIES MEETINGS, DECEMBER 1ST AND 2ND

The Chairman's draft report, in the form of a working paper (Document D-D/196 revise) was considered by the Deputies December 1st and 2nd, and discussion is to continue to-day. This document is not having a very calm voyage, and it remains to be seen whether an interim basis for a German defence contribution can be agreed. Some progress was made Saturday afternoon by a drafting group of Deputies and officials of the United States, United Kingdom, France, the Netherlands, Belgium and Canada, in producing a re-draft of the Chairman's working paper, and this re-draft† will go before the Deputies to-day. Since we are almost in continuous session and since the document is still subject to modification this message will deal only with the principal points raised in our discussion so far drawing attention to textual changes only on matters of importance.

2. When consideration of the draft report began Alphand indicated at the outset that he could discuss it only on the basis of a "general reserve". He agreed that the working paper, which he described as the "Spofford Plan" represented a departure from the United States interim proposals (Document D-D/190) which in themselves were far removed from the position of the French Government which had given its solemn pledge in regard to the principles of German re-armament to the French Parliament and people. The Chairman's working paper was a "backward step" and failed to make any real concessions towards the French point of view. It would not be possible for him to indicate the final views of the French Government pending the receipt of firm answers to a number of questions:

(1) Did the Deputies agree that the size of German formations should be limited to the regimental combat team?

(2) During the interim period, would the proposed regimental combat teams be attached to existing allied divisions, and not serve as independent units?

(3) Was it admitted that the controls during the interim period would only be relaxed to the extent to which they were superseded by the definitive controls envisaged in the French plan?

(4) In view of the rumours concerning possible four-Power talks, and future changes in the international situation, what provision was being made for flexibility in the present plan for a German contribution?

(5) What would the NATO policy be in the event that the Germans did not accept these interim proposals?

Alphand said that even if firm answers were forthcoming, it would be impossible for the French Government to take a definite position until an early meeting of Cabinet and he thought it unlikely that this could be held until early this week. Hoyer Millar pointed out that in view of Mr. Attlee's impending departure for Washington, it was of the greatest importance that the French Government's views should be made known at the earliest possible date.

3. Without replying at once to Alphand's questions, Spofford suggested proceeding through the working paper and trying to meet the French points as they were related to its relevant provisions.

4. The ensuing discussion made it clear that Alphand was prepared to go along with the provisional arrangements providing the French position was met in three principal respects:

(1) That there should be a clearly stated relationship between the formation of German units and the establishment of a European army;

(2) That the military controls set out in the Military Committee report M.C.30† should only be relaxed progressively and to the extent to which "permanent solutions" were reached; and

(3) That the regimental combat team or brigade group should be the accepted unit of the German formations. In addition, he said he had no instructions on the question of German air units. Finally, it was also clear that Alphand wished to see rather more enthusiasm for the French Government's proposal to call a conference to discuss the French plan.

5. Thus the sections of the Chairman's working paper which gave rise to the greatest difficulty were paragraph 5(e) (progressive diminution of controls); paragraph 7(a) (size of German formations); paragraph 7(b) on a German air contribution, and paragraphs 8-11 dealing with political questions.

6. In the discussion on 5(e), the essential problem was to reconcile the French view that controls on Germany should only be relaxed to the extent to which they were replaced by an institutional framework (on the lines of the French plan), and the practical objection of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and several other Deputies that since the European army and its attendant institutions might take a long time to develop, or indeed might not develop at all, the diminution of controls on Germany should

(1) Not be rigidly tied to the French plan, and

(2) Should take German defence cooperation into account.

Alphand pressed his point of view, and at one point said that if there were no link established between the relaxation of controls and building the permanent mechanisms, Germany, he warned, would be in the NATO within six months. To meet the French view, Spofford produced a new draft of this paragraph which was accepted by Alphand. Paragraph 5(e) now reads as follows:

"Recognizing that in any system adopted some controls such as those set out in the Military Committee report will be required, the system should provide for the diminution of such controls only to the extent that permanent institutions into which Germany is integrated have been developed, or, failing the development of such institutions, after account has been taken of the extent to which effective, positive safeguards have been established. In either event account should be taken of the extent to which the German Federal Government is cooperating in the general defence effort."

7. The acceptance of the new draft of paragraph 5(e) made the passage of paragraph 6 easier, and this paragraph was approved with minor drafting changes.

8. The next difficulty arose over paragraph 7(a), dealing with the size of German formations. The Chairman's original working paper had contained only a note that "German formations should be the smallest completely balanced units as determined by military considerations", and that the size of German units should await consideration of the final report of the Military Committee. Alphand said that he had informed his Government on the basis of the Military Committee's report and discussions in the Deputies that the regimental combat team or brigade group would be acceptable, and he pressed for a firm decision on this point. The United Kingdom and United States view, however, was that since the transitional period might be longer than the French anticipated, provision should be made so that the military authorities, should the need arise, could proceed to group these regimental combat teams into divisional formations. Alphand was not prepared to leave this decision entirely to the military authorities. This was clear from his reply to a question from Hoyer Millar as to how long German units should be restricted to regimental combat size. Alphand replied "until we decide to the contrary". In an effort to meet the French position, Hoyer Millar then proposed a draft, which Alphand promptly accepted. Spofford, however, could not accept the United Kingdom draft without further consultation with United States service advisers, and later submitted a United States alternative text. Both texts have been included in brackets in the revised report going before the Deputies to-day. The United Kingdom text is as follows:

"for political reasons the size of German formations to be constituted should not exceed that of regimental combat-teams. However, when these regimental combat-teams are formed and trained and if by then no decision has been taken to form a European army, the question of the manner in which these regimental combat-teams shall be used must be determined in the light of political as well as military considerations at the time, due weight being given to the views of the supreme commander."

The United States alternative text is as follows:

"Taking note of the statements of the military committee in paragraph 19 of its report and taking into account political considerations, the Deputies consider that the size of German formations should initially be limited to regimental combat teams or brigade groups. However, when such German units are formed and trained, the question of the manner in which these units shall be combined into divisions shall be determined in the light of the military and political situation existing at the time, giving due weight to the recommendation of the supreme commander."

You will note that the principal difference in the United Kingdom and United States texts is that the United States text included the phrase "should initially be limited to regimental combat teams or brigade groups", and also includes a reference to "divisions", which is glossed over in the United Kingdom text. Both texts agree in emphasizing that subsequent determination of the size of units shall be made in the light of political as well as military considerations existing at the time, with due weight being given to the views of the supreme commander.

9. With regard to paragraph 7(b), dealing with German air units, Alphand and the Danish Deputy indicated that they had no instructions. The United Kingdom, Norwegian, Italian, Luxembourg and Portuguese Deputies accepted the Military Committee's recommendation on this point. The Belgian Deputy said that while his Government was not favourable to the principle of a tactical German air force, they would make no objection should the military authorities consider that such air units were required. The only other modification in paragraph 7(b) was the substitution of the word "command" for the word "components" in the second sentence of the paragraph.

10. With regard to paragraph 7(c), dealing with conscription or voluntary enlistment, with the exception of the United Kingdom and French Deputies, it was clear that the majority of the Deputies favoured the principle of compulsory enlistment. Since it was clear that this problem would have to be determined by the occupying Powers after consultation with the German authorities, however, it was decided to delete everything in the paragraph with the exception of the first sentence, which now reads: "The Deputies consider that this problem shall be determined by the Occupying powers after consultation with the German authorities". It was also agreed that this question should be discussed fully with the Military Committee.

11. Paragraphs 8 to 12 of the Chairman's report dealing with political questions also gave rise to difficulty. Behind the specific points which Alphand raised, the fundamental divergence of view between the French political conception and the views of other European NATO members was clearly visible. This divergence had emerged earlier during the discussion of paragraph 5(c) which referred "to the need to instil into the German units a European rather than a national spirit". This was objected to by the Netherlands Deputy, who talked of the need for a "NATO" spirit. My view, however, was that in the light of the general character of this reference this was clearly a place where Alphand was deserving of support, and the French view was generally upheld.

12. The divergence emerged even more clearly in the discussions on paragraphs 9, 10 and 11, when it was made clear by the interventions of the Norwegian, Netherlands and Portuguese Deputies that they felt the Chairman's draft had gone further than they were prepared to go in supporting the French proposal to convene a conference to examine the question of a European army. It was their view that the text, as originally drafted, implied an acceptance of the principle of the European army and its attendant institutions, to which they could not commit their Governments. The views of this group may be summarized by a reference to the comment of the Netherlands Deputy that while there was no objection to the French proceeding with their scheme, the Deputies had made no recommendation one way or the other. It had been agreed to proceed with the preliminary military measures, leaving the way open for the development of institutions either on a European basis, or if this should not prove workable, on a NATO basis. The Norwegian Deputy finally produced the following re-draft of the first sentence of paragraph 11, reading as follows:

"The Deputies take note of the French Government's intention to call a conference of the countries (including the German Federal Republic) which wish to participate in a European army. The Deputies feel that they should keep themselves informed of the progress of the conference, and should in due time consider the recommendations made there from a NATO point of view".

While this re-draft was agreed, it was obvious that Alphand was far from satisfied, and when the drafting group was subsequently considering this particular paragraph, the French representative reserved his Deputy's position. It may therefore be expected that Alphand will return to the charge on this point to-day, and will try to get a stronger endorsement of the French Government's proposal.

13. The only other substantial change in paragraph 11, made at Hoyer Millar's suggestion, was that the final sentence of the paragraph dealing with the assurances to be given to the German Federal Government should be deleted. This was agreed on the grounds that it was essentially a matter for the French Government to work out with the German authorities.

14. It was also agreed to insert, as a separate paragraph, a reference to the Deputies having noted the Netherlands suggestion of a NATO High Commissioner. The drafting group incorporated this reference as a new paragraph 9 in the draft report, the subsequent paragraphs being re-numbered accordingly.

15. At Hoyer Millar's suggestion it was agreed to delete the last sentence of paragraph 12 beginning "the German Federal Government" on the grounds that it would be bad tactics to suggest to the Germans that the provisional arrangements were "flexible".

16. It was agreed that the sections headed "conclusions" and "recommendations" should be merged in a single section of recommendations, and to delete paragraphs 2 and 3 of the sections set forth in conclusions. The recommendations as re-drafted by the drafting group now read as follows:

"since in their opinion, the report of the Military Committee together with this present document constitutes an acceptable basis, from the political aspect, for German participation in the defence of Western Europe the Deputies therefore recommend:

(1) That the occupying powers be invited by the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty to instruct their High Commissioners in Germany to discuss with the German Federal Government the question of German participation in the defence of Western Europe along the lines set forth in the Military Committee's report and in the present document.

(2) That the occupying powers be invited to keep the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty informed of the course of the discussions with the German authorities and the steps taken to initiate German participation.

(3) That the Council take note of the French Government's intention to call a conference of the countries (including the German Federal Republic) which wish to participate in a European army."

17. When the working paper had been gone over for the first time on Saturday morning Alphand repeated that the result would mean virtually the complete abandonment of the French position and was unacceptable. While he was shuffling his papers in a rather ominous fashion, Spofford retrieved the situation by a calm, but pointed, statement in which he pointed out that his working paper had been based on M.C.30, which was an agreed Military Committee paper, and which itself had contained a number of significant concessions from the original United States proposal. The United States had shown its willingness to compromise in several important respects, and it was only in a spirit of compromise that any progress could be made. He also expressed his personal view that there had been a tendency to fiddle while Rome burned, and he reminded the Deputies that unless a solution were found to the German problem the effectiveness of the whole NATO machinery would be in doubt. This appeal to disavow histrionics had its effect, and it was at this point that Spofford proposed the six-Power drafting group, at which some progress was made towards bringing the positions closer together on the major points I have mentioned. It was probably also useful that M. Pleven's visit coincided with our session. Although it is still too early to make predictions, I hope he will be able to reach an agreed report this week to accompany M.C.30, which will provide a basis for joint discussions with the Military Committee. The present draft report, in view of the basic divergence of view between the French position and that of other European countries, is still a very unsatisfactory document, and the path ahead is still a rocky one.

18. I am sending copies of this telegram to Paris and Bonn by air bag. Ends.

TELEGRAM 2369 London, December 5, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

DEPUTIES MEETING, DECEMBER 4TH

Yesterday's meeting took a wholly unexpected turn, as a result of statement by French "Deputy" (Alphand having flown yesterday to Paris) that in French Government's view further consideration should be given to Netherlands suggestions concerning NATO High Commissioner. According to this statement, present form of draft report was badly out of line with French position, but French Government desired, if possible, to arrive at unanimous solution, and Alphand was now explaining the position to the Cabinet. French Government had expressed interest in the Netherlands proposal, and wanted further details.

2. There was only brief forewarning of possibility of this sudden development, Achilles having told us just before the meeting that Spofford had learned over weekend that French Government was afraid that their proposed conference to discuss the formation of a European army and superstructure was so lacking in support at this time that their whole plan might be jeopardized. We understand that Alphand saw Starkenborgh Sunday morning and gave him sufficient notice so that the latter was able to propose an expansion of brief reference to Netherlands suggestion in present draft report. (See paragraph 14 of my telegram No. 2363 of December 4th).

3. Netherlands Deputy submitted to Deputies expansion of present brief reference in paragraph 9 to suggestion for appointment of NATO High Commissioner in hope this would make it possible for Deputies to obtain general guidance on the principle from their Governments. The Netherlands Deputy proposed re-draft of new paragraph 9 containing following principal points:

(1) Presence of national forces of different countries in Germany would make it desirable to establish a NATO High Commissioner authorized to perform, on behalf of these forces, certain important tasks which normally belong to Ministry of Defence, Ministers of Supply, or a general staff, and distinct from responsibility of SHAPE;

(2) High Commissioner might supervise German defence agency (or agencies) and assume certain functions which cannot as yet be allotted to German agency;

(3) He should be appointed by "an appropriate Council of Ministers who should give him necessary directives". In addition to proposed re-draft of paragraph 9, Netherlands Deputy also tabled an annex listing in greater detail functions which NATO High Commissioner might perform.

4. United Kingdom Deputy also put forward proposal for a "North Atlantic Council representative", which he emphasized was not a firm United Kingdom Government proposal, had not been checked with military authorities, but represented present Foreign Office thinking. In United Kingdom draft "North Atlantic Council representative" is given the following functions:

(a) To advise the supreme commander on political problems relating to national contributions to the combined force, and to effect the necessary liaison between the supreme commander and national authorities in all political matters;

(b) In conjunction with the supreme commander, to assist the Allied High Commission in supervising the fulfilment of the conditions laid down in M.C.30† for the raising and control of German units. It is agreed that, if and when the High Commission ceases to exercise the necessary powers, the North Atlantic Council representative will assume these functions, under the direction of the Atlantic Council, and under arrangements to be agreed with the German federal authorities.

5. You will note that United Kingdom draft seeks to avoid complicating existing allied administrative machinery in Germany, and to preserve clear distinction between functions of SHAPE and of proposed "North Atlantic Council representative". In clarification, Hoyer Millar said he envisaged this official

(1) Carrying out certain functions for all forces committed to SHAPE, not merely those in Germany;

(2) Acting as a political adviser to supreme commander on behalf of all national forces committed to SHAPE;

(3) Assuming responsibility for liaison with national Governments concerned; and

(4) Having certain specific functions in relations to Germany insofar as he might act as principal adviser to occupying authorities in carrying out their responsibility for maintenance of controls. If and when a peace treaty should become a practical possibility Allied High Commission might then be assumed by this North Atlantic Council representative. Hoyer Millar emphasized, however, that if this official were to exercise continuing powers, it would be necessary to do so with consent of German authorities, since there would be no other juridical basis for his authority. Thus, according to this proposal, North Atlantic Council representative would have certain limited powers during period when Allied High Commission continues to exercise authority in Germany, and more important powers as and when the Allied High Commission ceases to function.

6. In commenting on United Kingdom Deputy's suggestion, Netherlands Deputy made it clear that his Government could readily agree to extending task of proposed High Commissioner or "representative" to include duties on behalf of all countries participating in the integrated force, not merely those stationed in Germany. He also agreed that the NATO High Commissioner should not be a "rival" to Allied High Commission, nor should his authority impinge in any way on powers of SHAPE.

7. Spofford, who had learned of sudden shift in French Government line early Sunday, and had been in touch with Washington, was told that the United States authorities were not prepared to go along with idea of a NATO High Commissioner until there was a clearer indication of proposed responsibilities. In commenting on Netherlands-United Kingdom proposals, therefore, he said he was only in position to express very tentative views. As he saw it, the Netherlands proposal would involve the NATO High Commissioner in three principal functions:

(1) Control of defence ministerial functions;

(2) Civil affairs, including duties in connection with use of local resources and liaison with supreme commander in matters of supply, and administration, etc.;

(3) Education of troops and NCO's.

The greatest difficulty arose in connection with (1), which raised problem of control of German Federal agency (or agencies). It was difficult to establish juridical basis on which a NATO High Commissioner could operate. This basis might be either contractual (vis-à-vis German Government) or derived from authority of occupying Powers under the Occupation Statute. Basic problem would be establishing authority of proposed High Commissioner to control important functions of German re-armament. There were also difficulties relating to his relations with SHAPE and the military command structure. Under (2) he agreed there were tasks roughly similar to those outlined in parts of Annex to Netherlands paper. Here there was a prospect of doing something on lines proposed by Netherlands Government since these were tasks which could be carried out by some allied agency responsible to the occupying Powers or to NATO. With regard to (3) according to United States practice, training schools were essentially responsibility of military authorities. Therefore, it would not be possible, in space of time available, to settle all these relationships to satisfaction of all Governments concerned, including the occupying powers. In recent discussions with McCloy[83] the latter had seen considerable difficulties in conception of a NATO High Commissioner. While Spofford felt we should not exclude possibility of a NATO High Commissioner as an ultimate solution, it was not possible to work out complex political and legal problems involved in time to meet present situation. Finally he made a brief statement on lines of his statement on Saturday, to the effect that, in present critical situation, indecision was worse than a decision to disagree, and proposed that we should conclude discussion of German problem at our next meeting.

8. At this stage Norwegian Deputy made a helpful contribution by suggesting that while we could not go into details, it might be possible to obtain views of Governments on general principle of a NATO political authority involved in Netherlands and United Kingdom suggestions. I supported this view by pointing out that while avoiding details, it might be possible to combine Netherlands and United Kingdom suggestions into a more simple statement of principle which would distinguish between (1) the occupation period, and (2) the post-occupation period, and clarify the functions of a NATO High Commissioner or representative in these two phases. In first period, prime responsibility would rest with occupying powers, whereas in the second period the NATO representative might have much broader functions.

9. The French acting Deputy reaffirmed the hope that a broader reference to the substance of the Netherlands proposal could be set out in the text of our report, and described the suggestions made as being "interesting and positive". In particular, he thought our discussion made it necessary to give more precision to the section of the draft report dealing with administration of defence in Germany, to emphasize importance of continued NATO-allied control over the processes of German rearmament.

10. It was finally agreed that there should be consultation between United Kingdom and Netherlands Deputies to produce a simplified draft for inclusion in report which could be looked at by Deputies at next meeting on Wednesday. Meanwhile, the Deputies undertook to seek to obtain the views of their Governments on the principle of a NATO High Commissioner.

11. In addition to discussion regarding a NATO High Commissioner (or North Atlantic Council representative), some further points arose in connection with other sections of draft report:

[83] John J. McCloy, haut commissaire des États-Unis pour l'Allemagne.
John J. McCloy, United States High Commissioner for Germany.

(1) At suggestion of Belgian and Danish Deputies it was agreed that there should be a reference in paragraph 7(e) (conscription or voluntary enlistment) to fact that several Deputies had recognized the danger of applying voluntary methods in Germany, and had expressed a preference for conscription;

(2) At my suggestion it was agreed that the paragraph 3 of the recommendation (see paragraph 16 of my telegram No. 2363) should be expanded by adding the words:

"In view of the importance of the French proposals that the Council request the Deputies to keep themselves fully informed of the progress of the conference, and in due course to consider any recommendations made at the conference from the point of view of the requirements of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization";

(3) With reference to the United Kingdom and United States alternative texts of paragraph 7(a), (size of German formation), Hoyer Millar and Spofford made it clear that these texts had not been approved by their respective military authorities, and should be regarded as tentative for the present;

(4) The Portuguese Deputy was still not happy about paragraph 9 of the Chairman's original draft referring to the French proposal to hold a conference and reserved the position of his Government on the proposed European army, its integration into NATO framework, and related political institutions.

12. A drafting group of officials is to meet today to incorporate these proposed changed in report. Meanwhile, it is hoped that some progress will be made in producing an agreed draft dealing with the appointing of a NATO High Commissioner or representative. By Wednesday we shall know to what extent French Government is seriously prepared to accept a solution on these lines in interests of reaching unanimity. My feeling is that while there now seems a change of the conception of a NATO High Commissioner proving an acceptable alternative to proposal for a European Minister of Defence, the French Government have not yet abandoned their idea of a European army, although in the light of the opposition to this conception (and related political aspects of French plan) which our sessions have clearly indicated, they may be prepared to postpone action on these lines for some time.

13. The emphasis in yesterday's meeting on the importance of basing the political controls to govern a German defence contribution on a NATO framework seems to provide the only basis on which an agreed solution to our difficulties can be arrived at. The original United States reaction, however, was on the negative side and we must now await the news from Paris.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference my telegram No. 2369 of December 5th.

Immediately before further meeting of drafting group of officials referred to in my paragraph 12, we were told by Achilles that they had received a report last night from Ambassador Bruce in Paris, and confirmed by the French representative, Burin Des Rosiers, to-day, that the French Government is still sticking to the French plan, and is not enamoured of the idea of a NATO High Commissioner. If this report is confirmed by Alphand tomorrow questions are sure to be asked about the interest which they evinced at the meeting of December 4th in the alternative Netherlands suggestion of a NATO High Commissioner.

2. Des Rosiers made no reference to the French position on the Netherlands suggestion in the drafting group and the drafting group confined its attention to minor points. It was not possible to make progress in the drafting group on the paragraph dealing with the Netherlands (and United Kingdom) suggestions pending discussions between Hoyer Millar and Starkenborgh, which might lead to a combined draft. Of the minor points considered by the drafting group the most important were the following:

Paragraph 7(b) (Air units): This was revised to read as follows: "The deputies considered this matter in the light of the recommendations contained in the report of the Military Committee, and agreed that to the extent that military considerations require, the German contribution should include appropriate air units for defence of Western Germany and support of German ground units. Such air units would be within the integrated air command of the Supreme Commander."

Paragraph 7(c) (Conscription or voluntary enlistment): This paragraph now reads: "In view of the possible dangers of a voluntary system as applied to German recruitment, several of the deputies expressed a preference for conscription or some similar system. The deputies considered that this problem shall be determined by the occupying powers after consultation with the German authorities". The phrase "as applied to German recruitment" was put in at our suggestion.

Paragraph 7(f) (Administration of defence in Germany): The first three sentences of this paragraph were re-drafted as follows: "The deputies have discussed various aspects of the defence administration in Germany and agreed that it should be of civilian character, and should remain subject to some system of allied control, irrespective of any modification of the regime of occupation. During the initial period, control will, of course, continue to be exercised by the occupying powers. The deputies recognize that a final determination of the form and functions of the German administration must be made in conjunction with the German authorities. The Permanent German Administration, and the form of the allied control over it, will also depend to some extent on the nature of any political defence structure which evolves in Europe and in NATO". The paragraph then continues as in Document D-D/196 with various minor drafting changes.

3. Finally, the drafting group included the amendment to paragraph 3 of the recommendations which I put forward at yesterday's meeting. (See paragraph 11 of my telegram No. 2369).

4. We have just received a United Kingdom re-draft of paragraph 9 which is to be discussed later to-day with the Netherlands deputy in the hope that a combined draft of this paragraph can be agreed.

5. The text of the United Kingdom re-draft of this paragraph is contained in my immediately following telegram.†

DEPUTIES' MEETING DECEMBER 6TH: GERMAN DEFENCE CONTRIBUTION

As soon as Alphand had returned from Paris the Deputies met to consider the draft report (document D-D/196 2nd revise, December 2nd)†. Before discussing the report the Chairman again drew attention to the recent press reports which have dealt, sometimes inaccurately and sometimes accurately, with the principal points of the Deputies' discussions. In particular, the Daily Telegraph diplomatic correspondent here has appeared to have had remarkably good sources of information. The vital importance of maintaining the security of the Deputies' discussions was emphasized, and it was agreed that the Foreign Office should be requested to provide facilities to attempt to trace the source of the Daily Telegraph's information. Particular reference was made to the fact that the Netherlands suggestion of a NATO High Commissioner has been given some publicity in Germany, and the German Federal Government had commented unfavourably on it.

2. In connection with document D-D/196 Alphand said that he expected the final views of the French Government within the next few hours, and that meanwhile he was very hopeful that his Government would find it possible to accept the report. At the same time, he indicated that the French Government was planning to make a communication outlining the basis on which it accepted the report, which would be transmitted to the eleven other NATO Governments either through the Deputies or through the normal diplomatic channels. There were two points, however, on which he said his Government placed particular emphasis.

3. The first point arose on paragraph 7(a) dealing with the size of German formations. It was not possible for the French Government to contemplate any text which specifically mentioned divisional formations. Therefore while he could now accept the United Kingdom draft, he was not able, and would not be able, to accept the United States alternative draft. On this point Spofford said that he had still not got a final clearance from the United States authorities, but that he hoped that agreement could be reached on this point at today's meeting. Final action has therefore not yet been taken on this paragraph.

4. Secondly, Alphand referred to the question which he raised previously as to whether, during the transitional period, the proposed regimental combat teams would be attached to existing Allied divisions in Germany — (see paragraph 2(2) of my telegram No. 2363 of December 4th). This was a point to which the French Government attached special importance. Spofford replied that he was unable to take a firm position on this point pending the joint discussions with the Military Committee, in view of the military aspects involved. Alphand reiterated the French Government's view, but agreed to defer the question until the joint session with the Military Committee.

5. The principal matter discussed yesterday was paragraph 9, dealing with the Netherlands and United Kingdom suggestion for the appointment of a NATO High Commissioner, or representative in Germany. A proposed re-draft of this paragraph had been agreed between the Netherlands, United Kingdom and United States Deputies, and was submitted for consideration. The re-draft as presented was a considerably watered-down version of the original Netherlands proposal, and the subsequent United Kingdom redraft sent to you in my telegram No. 2386.† In particular, the reference to the High Commissioner acting in an advisory capacity to the Supreme Commander in political matters has been deleted. When I raised this point, Hoyer Millar referred to the fact that the Military Committee's report had recommended that the Supreme Commander should obtain his political guidance from the Deputies action through the Standing Group, and said that it had been thought necessary to avoid any conflicting channels for conveying political guidance. While it was not specifically stated, it was pretty clear that this deletion had been made at the request of the United States. With minor drafting changes the proposed re-draft of paragraph 9, the final text of which is contained in my immediately following telegram,† was approved.

6. The following changes were also made in the draft report:

Paragraph 3: At the request of the United States, the following sentence was added at the end of the paragraph:

"The Deputies also agreed on the great importance of resolving, as soon as possible, all other questions involved in the establishment of the integrated force".

Paragraph 7(b) — (Air Units): The French and Belgian Deputies agreed with this paragraph, from which the brackets have now been deleted. The last sentence of the paragraph was amended to read as follows:

"Such air units would be part of the integrated air forces under the Supreme Commander".

Paragraph 7(f) — (Administration of Defence in Germany): The last part of the first sentence now reads:

"Subject to some system of Allied control even should the regime of occupation be modified".

Paragraph 13: In the second sentence the phrase "to instruct their High Commissioners in Germany" has been omitted.

Paragraph 15(3): The French agree that the brackets round this paragraph could be removed. The following new sub-paragraph under "recommendations" has been added:

"The Deputies be authorized to continue their study of the proposals made in paragraph 9 of this report".

7. Following this review of the document, the Chairman said it was hoped that final action could be taken on the draft report today. Alphand took the opportunity of making it quite clear that the French Government still attached the greatest importance to the creation of a European army and was determined to continue to press its views, while agreeing with the present report.

8. Achilles told us after the meeting that Schuman had been in touch with Acheson suggesting that he send a letter to the French Government for publication, possibly after the meeting of the Defence Ministers and the Council, welcoming the French Government's proposal to convene a conference to discuss the European army, and offering to make United States observers available at such a conference. At one stage the French had sought to get an even firmer testimonial from the United States, which would have committed the United States to exerting its efforts to secure the successful conclusion of such a conference, but the United States authorities were not prepared to go this far. Mr. Attlee is discussing western defence arrangements with Mr. Truman, and the American reply had been held up pending these discussions. The United Kingdom authorities would clearly be unhappy about any step which might hint at prior acceptance of the principles of the French plan.

9. At the end of the meeting there was some inconclusive discussion about the forthcoming dates of the sessions with the Military Committee.

Spofford said that subject to confirmation today, the Military Committee would meet here on the 11th and a joint meeting could be held on the 13th. With reference to the meeting of the Defence Ministers and the Council, Hoyer Millar, who has obviously been having some difficulties with Mr. Bevin, said that his Ministers would require some time to study the proposals of the Deputies and the Military Committee. He thought this might take about ten days and would mean that the ministerial meetings might be left over until after Christmas.

10. In private conversation later, Spofford indicated that he was anxious to press forward more quickly than this, but that Acheson would probably find it difficult to get away from Washington in the immediate future. The date for the ministerial meetings is therefore up in the air at the moment. While the Council meeting will definitely be held in Brussels, Spofford said that Marshall had proposed London for the Defence Ministers' meetings, but that he had made the counter-suggestion that both meetings should be held in Brussels, and was awaiting a final reply.

11. I am sending a copy of this telegram to Paris and Bonn by air bag.

Repeat Washington EX-2512.

Our telegram No. 1914 of December 7† and your telegrams re Deputies' discussion of D-D/196.

1. In view of the reported French acceptance of virtually [all] the U.S. proposals, a number of the more general comments which we had intended to send you today go by the board. On certain specific points, however, we can now give you our comments on the Chairman's draft report and the revisions which you have reported.

(a) As regards your telegram No. 2341 of November 30, we think the revision of paragraph 5(e) of the draft report is an improvement and we prefer the U.K. text on the size of German formations to the U.S. alternative text.

(b) As regards your telegram No. 2385 of December 5, we agree with the revised wording of paragraph 7(b) (German Air units), 7(c) (Conscription or voluntary enlistment), and 7(f) (Administration of defence in Germany).

(c) We have not given much consideration to the United Kingdom re-draft of paragraph 9, as reported in your telegram No. 2386 of December 5,† but we would have no objection to a recommendation along these lines, which on the whole we prefer to the original Dutch draft.

(d) As regards the revised paragraph 11 of the draft report concerning the attendance of non-European NATO representatives as observers at the Paris conference, we lack information as to what the position of the United States Government will be; nor do we know whether the French are anxious to have U.S. and Canadian observers in Paris. For your own information, we rather regret the decision of the U.K. not to be represented by an observer. We feel that this is perhaps carrying their attitude of detachment too far. Our own decision as to whether or not to be represented would be affected by the U S. decision, and also by the degree of importance which the French would attach to our being present. Our first inclination, however, is to consider that it is primarily a matter for the Europeans to see whether they can agree on the framework of a European army and that our presence as an observer might be superfluous.

(e) The phraseology of paragraph 11 of the draft report, and in particular the third sentence of that paragraph, implies that the final test of all arrangements must whether they are militarily effective in the judgment of NATO. Political judgments are surely equally important and can have as much effect in strengthening or weakening the West.

DEPUTIES' MEETING 7TH DECEMBER: GERMAN DEFENCE CONTRIBUTION

The Deputies had before them for final approval the draft report Document D-D/196 (3rd revise).† The Chairman submitted the following revision of the United States alternative text under paragraph 7(a) dealing with the size of German units. Quote: The size of German formations to be constituted should not under present conditions exceed that of regimental combat-teams or brigade groups. However, when these regimental combat-teams or brigade groups are formed and trained the question of the manner in which they should be used must be determined in the light of conditions at the time, due weight being given to the views of the supreme commander. Unquote.

2. Alphand who had not previously seen this text said that he would have to consult his Government, and that he hoped for an answer before the date of the Military Committee meeting. At the same time, he again raised the problem of whether or not it was agreed that regimental combat teams would be attached to existing allied divisions. It was agreed that this question should be discussed jointly with the Military Committee. Meanwhile, it would be necessary to leave the alternative texts under paragraph 7(a) in brackets.

3. Before the report was finally approved, Hoyer Millar pointed out that when the Deputies report and the Military Committee report were finalized in joint session, it would be necessary for Governments to have a look at them, and to reserve the right to make any subsequent changes and to determine the method and timing of any approach to the German Government. On this understanding, and with alternative paragraphs 7(a) still bracketed, document D-D/196 was approved.

4. In view of the fulsome press reports which had emanated from Paris following the Cabinet meeting on December 6th, the Chairman proposed the issuance of a brief press release. As originally drafted by the United States delegation the proposed release contained the following reference to subsequent discussions with the German Government:

Quote: The report developed at the joint meeting, if approved by North Atlantic Treaty Governments, will provide the basis on which the matter can subsequently be pursued by the occupying Powers, on behalf of NATO, with the German Federal Government. It will also clear the ground for the establishment at the earliest possible date of an integrated force under centralized command for the defence of Western Europe and for the assurance of peace. Unquote.

Both Hoyer Millar and Alphand pressed strongly against the inclusion of such a reference, and its deletion was agreed to. The text of the final communiqué as agreed and issued last night is contained in my immediately following telegram.†

Agreement was reached yesterday on paragraph 7(a) on size of German formations, with Alphand's acceptance of revision of United States alternative text as contained in paragraph 1 of my telegram No. 2411 of 8th December.

2. In accepting the United States text, he indicated clearly that the view of M. Moch and the French Government opposing the formation of German divisions still stood. The French Government accepted the United States text on the understanding that a final decision is reserved until the end of the transitional period.

3. So that there should be no misunderstanding, Spofford said that the interpretation given by the United States authorities to the word "used" in the second sentence of the United States text was the way and means by which the regimental combat teams could be combined with other units, and not tactical use.

Alphand had no objection to this interpretation, but emphasized the view that the larger formations envisaged by the French Government were the formations appropriate to the European Army.

4. Alphand then said that the French Government accepted the Spofford plan subject to two conditions:

(1) Agreement on Article 7(a) which had now been reached on the basis of the United States text; and

(2) On the understanding that during the interim period German regimental combat teams would not be independent, would not be under a German general staff, but would be attached (the French word was "rattaché") to existing Allied divisions.

The French Government was agreeable to this matter being referred to the Military Committee for consideration by the Deputies and Military Committee at their joint session. He made it clear, however, that acceptance of the report would depend on the Military Committee meeting the French Government views on this point, and said that a satisfactory solution of the problem by the Military Committee was an essential part of the French acceptance of the Spofford Plan.

5. In replying to this statement Spofford said that it was not possible to pre-judge the decision of the Military Committee on this point. With respect to the use of German units in the transitional period, it would be important to ensure that they were not integrated into divisions in any clandestine manner, or directly by the German Government. At the same time, the relationship of the German units to Allied divisions was a matter which would have to be considered by the Military Committee, or jointly with the Deputies. Alphand then repeated that this was a matter which the French Government regarded as of great importance. The brackets were then removed from Article 7(a) and a final version of document D-D/196 is to be issued today.†

6. This question of the attachment of German combat teams to existing Allied divisions, a solution of which on lines acceptable to the French was said by Alphand to be an essential element in their acceptance of the report as a whole, may well cause some difficulty. Privately, the United States officials here anticipate that there would be constitutional difficulties in the way of incorporating German units in United States divisions, and in any event feel that military requirements will make it necessary, at a later stage, to accept German divisional formations. Since this point is likely to be a sticky one at our sessions next week I would be grateful for your comments.

7. The following additional items were also dealt with:

(1) Defence Production Board. It was agreed that the terms of reference of the Defence Production Board should be considered by the Deputies next week. The Portuguese and Norwegian Deputies said that they were now in a position to agree that steps to set up the Defence Production board should go forward. Spofford said that he was still under instructions that the recommendation concerning the Defence Production Board should be approved by the Defence Committee at its next meeting, but he was authorized to go forward with the interim steps. If, for some reason, the Defence Committee should not be able to meet, the United States authorities would re-consider their position.

(2) Canadian Proposals re Re-Organization of NATO Structure: Spofford referred to the Canadian proposals which have already been circulated to the Deputies as raising matters of considerable importance, and proposed that our paper should be discussed at the meeting on Monday.

8. The United States group was in touch with Washington last night about the dates of the Military Committee meeting and the joint session. We were informed officially this morning that the Military Committee will meet here on December 12th and the joint session on December 14th. There is no word as yet concerning plans for ministerial meetings.

On instructions from his Government, French Ambassador here submitted a note, dated December 18, which was also given to all other NATO countries on developments related to German contribution to European defence. Main features of this note, text of which is being sent to you by air, are as follows:

(a) French Government makes acceptance of Spofford Plan and further decisions related to German rearmament conditional upon outcome of Four Power Conference;

(b) French Government reiterates its conviction that the European formula presents the real solution for the problem of German rearmament and that all North Atlantic nations have an equal interest in the outcome of the forthcoming conference in Paris to discuss creation of a European army;

(c) French Government will convene a conference at beginning of January at which "interested governments and governments of the United States and Canada" will be invited to discuss conditions leading to the creation of a European army. (You will notice that no distinction is made between participation of continental European countries and the United States and Canada to such a conference. Up until now it had been expected that French Government would invite United States and Canada only as observers. This of course may still be their intention but the point is not spelled out in this communication).

French Government also expresses hope that European co-signatories of Atlantic Pact will find their way clear to signing the Schuman Plan in near future. Please advise progress made in this field. Ends.

I am attaching a memorandum on my conversation today with Spofford.

As I mentioned to you, Spofford spoke very highly of Wilgress' contribution to the work of the Deputies. He hoped that it would be possible for him to continue even with the increasing importance which the Deputies would assume as NATO moved into the operational phase. I said that while Wilgress' responsibilities were very great, we expected to be able to have him continue for the immediate future at least. We would try to shore him up in his other duties so that his NATO work would not suffer. On his part, Spofford said that he would bear in mind Wilgress' other responsibilities and would try to avoid laying too heavy a burden upon him.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], September 27, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

This morning I had an interesting talk with Spofford, the Permanent Chairman of the Council of Deputies. We discussed a number of questions arising from the Council Meeting which adjourned yesterday, including particularly the general reorganization of NATO, the means by which the Canadian Government could obtain early guidance on the disposition of equipment and the Mutual Aid Programme and the probable course of the projected studies on production and finance.

Reorganization of NATO

The Americans are evidently very much interested in the possibility of reorganizing the Ministerial Committees so as to avoid the parallelism which you referred to during Council sessions and providing for closer integration of the Organization at its top level.

I developed, at Spofford's request, our conception of one supreme council representing governments as a substitute for three committees of Foreign Ministers, Defence Ministers and Finance Ministers. I said that, while we recognized the fact that reorganization on this basis would be particularly applicable to countries accustomed to Cabinet Government in our sense, we thought that there would be great advantages for all if the Council became a council of governments rather than a council of Foreign Ministers. At such a council, governments might be represented by their Foreign Ministers or Defence Ministers or their Finance Ministers according to the nature of the agenda; or indeed they might be represented by two or even three Ministers. We recognized that such a solution would multiply the number of persons attending and deprive the Council to that extent of the virtue of relative smallness. Nevertheless the advantages to be gained by introducing the other Ministers into the highest body where policy was formulated seemed to us to be such that the undertaking would be well worthwhile.

Furthermore, we felt that such a reorganization would enhance the importance of the Council of Deputies. The Deputies might be accepted as deputies not only of the Foreign Ministers, but of the Defence and Finance Ministers or, better, as the representatives at the "official" level of governments as a whole. As such, they would be in a clear position of authority, able to speak for the Council and for the respective governments in directing all other agencies, military as well as civil, of the NATO.

Spofford agreed with much of what I said. He thought that eventually we might achieve a single Council of Ministers. He had been thinking as an alternative (more acceptable perhaps at this stage) of an arrangement by which Foreign Ministers, Defence Ministers and Finance Ministers would meet simultaneously in a sort of "North Atlantic Convention", perhaps twice a year. Under such an arrangement we might have plenary sessions in which all three Ministers participated, and separate but simultaneous Council, Defence and Finance meetings on the different aspects of the problems before NATO. Such an arrangement would not require any amendment to the Treaty. It would give the Defence and Finance Ministers a sense of participation. It would achieve much of what we had in mind in suggestion for our more radical reorganization.

A third possibility which Spofford has in mind is that of a functional division somewhat on the army basis as between the "G", the "A" and the "Q" sides, it being understood that the "G" side represented by the Council dealt with command, i.e. policy. Spofford did not press this and I gather that he felt that such an arrangement would not meet our fundamental objection to the division of authority between the three sets of Ministers.

Spofford asked if we would produce a paper developing our proposal of the one Ministerial Council. He is likely to attend the Defence Committee meetings in Washington beginning October 28th. I told him that you had in mind that I might accompany our Minister of Defence to those meetings. He suggested that if we could meet then (or a few days before) we might discuss this whole question in more detail; he would have a memorandum setting forth his tentative proposals by that time. I undertook to have something ready on our side for his consideration.

Spofford told me that he thought that the Council would likely meet next in December and probably in Brussels.

Provision of Canadian Equipment and New Production to NATO Allies

At Spofford's request I explained further the difficulties in the way of our disposing effectively of the divisional equipment which we have offered to NATO and, in the second place, of our deciding upon items of new production under our Mutual Aid Appropriation. As you had pointed out in the Council, we were ready to deliver equipment immediately where it was most needed; we had also provided the finance for new production. But we still awaited guidance from NATO as to where existing equipment should be sent and what new supplies should be produced.

With respect to divisional equipment in being, Spofford undertook to get after the appropriate authorities in Washington at once so that we might receive authoritative word from NATO as to where we should ship our supplies. He seemed to think that the logical destination for our divisional equipment was Holland, which had trained personnel ready to make use of it. I asked him to have word sent to our Ambassador and to Air Vice Marshal Campbell, our accredited representative to the Standing Group. I pointed out as well that we required to have some firm understanding concerning the availability of United States replacements. Spofford thought that there should be no difficulty in meeting both our requests in this matter very rapidly.

With respect to new production, the situation was more complicated. We would probably have no firm guidance until the combined production programme had got under way. Meantime, all he could suggest was that we should press the Standing Group to let us know on an ad hoc basis what types within the high priorities list would be acceptable to NATO countries. Spofford was frankly pessimistic about the possibility of our getting very far on this until after Christmas.

Deputies' Studies on Production and Finance

Spofford seemed well satisfied with the course of discussion at our last meeting in the Working Group of Seven. He entirely agreed that priority should be given to the study of the combined production programme and hoped that this would be completed by the end of the year so that the new executive agency could then be set up.

It is Spofford's expectation that the United States Government will name representatives with ECA experience. For the production study, he mentioned someone whose name was unfamiliar to me as their "continuing" representative and spoke of Batt[84] as coming in later to give testimony before the study was completed. What he has in mind is that opportunity should be given to those who will probably have charge of the combined production agency to criticize and comment upon the report. It was evident that he hoped that Batt would represent the United States on the combined executive agency.

William Loren Batt, Minister in charge of E.C.A. Mission to United Kingdom; special United States Representative to North Atlantic Defense Production Board.

I told Spofford that Mr. Howe had agreed that we should be well represented on the production study group, if possible, by someone who had experience in the last war. We expected to be represented on the combined executive agency when it was set up. He agreed that this was reasonable.

With respect to finance, I told Spofford that it was quite likely that we would be unable to provide a new expert by October 18th. We might decide to have [A.E.] Ritchie made responsible for our continuing participation and then have others, perhaps from the Department of Finance come in towards the end to criticize and comment. Spofford seemed to think this would be satisfactory. Incidentally, he told me that both Messrs. Schuman and Alphand seemed convinced that the "common fund" proposal was impractical. The French Minister of Finance remained to be convinced.

Following for Heeney from Wilgress, Begins: Since it is evident from the telegrams that you are now working on draft proposals for the reorganization of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it may be helpful if I give you the views which have been slowly emerging from my talks here with my associates in the work pertaining to the Deputies.

2. We endorse as being very necessary the proposal of the Minister that there should be one council of Ministers as the supreme directing organ for the whole Organization. Article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty simply states: "The parties hereby establish a Council on which each of them shall be represented to consider matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty". From this it could easily follow that each country could be represented on the Council by one, two or three Ministers. The practice might be established of having the meetings of the Council attended by the Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers of each country, with an understanding that the Finance Ministers should also attend when matters affecting their fields particularly are under discussion.

3. Under the Council would come the Deputies as the continuing directing organ for the whole Organization. On the military side there should be simply the Standing Group responsible to the Council, and when it is not sitting, to the Deputies. But in view of the limited representation on the Standing Group there should be a Consultative Committee established in Washington of the accredited representatives of all the countries not on the Standing Group, who would meet with the Standing Group from time to time to discuss broader matters of a military character. Thus the provision in the Treaty for a "Defence Committee" under the Council would appear to be satisfied. Further when military questions arise of special interest to any North Atlantic country not a member of the Standing Group, the accredited representative of the country concerned should participate fully in the discussions of the Standing Group. In this way countries not on the Standing Group would be able to express their views at Standing Group level on the military questions which come under its jurisdiction.

4. On the production side we would favour the merging of the Military Production and Supply Board and its Permanent Working Staff, with a view to having it operate continuously to deal with production questions under the general direction of the Deputies. We do not favour the setting up of an executive or directorate for production matters, but think that this function could be performed by the Chairman of the reorganized MPSB. For instance, if the United States wishes to use Batt for this purpose, the simplest course would seem to be to appoint him to the MPSB, on the understanding that the United States would continue to provide the Chairman of this body. This would strengthen the present PWS and perhaps lead other countries to appoint production executives to the reorganized MPSB, which in other respects would function in a similar manner to the present PWS, but would be better qualified to take on the executive functions which are now assuming importance.

5. On the economic side we would also favour a reorganization of the existing PWS of the DFEC, so as to provide the Deputies with a group of experts functioning continuously to whom the Deputies can refer economic questions. There will still remain to be worked out the relative roles to be played by the reorganized DFEC and the Paris group of representatives of North Atlantic countries on the OEEC.

6. This plan of reorganization has the great virtue of simplicity, since it chiefly consists of reorganizing and strengthening existing bodies without superimposing new bodies which might conflict with those already in existence. You will, of course, have noted that this plan of organization implies the abolition of the existing Defence Committee, the existing Military Committee, and the existing DFEC as a Committee of Ministers of Finance. On the military side it would also imply the abolition of the European Regional Groups whose functions would be taken over by the Combined Staff of the Supreme Commander of the integrated force. Presumably, however, the North Atlantic Ocean Planning Group (perhaps with modifications to provide for a Supreme Command) and the Canada-United States Regional Planning Group would continue to function under the immediate direction of the Standing Group.

7. If such a plan of reorganization could be agreed upon, there would appear to be no need for the Deputies' Working Group of seven to set up a group of production experts to consider the production side of the Organization. On the other hand, there may still be value in the setting up by the Working Group of a group of economic experts to consider the broad economic organization of the whole North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and particularly the relation of the Paris group of OEEC representatives of North Atlantic countries to the Organization as a whole. If, however, the division of labour between the North Atlantic Treaty Working Group of OEEC and the PWS of the DFEC, proposed in the revised "Nitze plan", were to be generally accepted now, in this case the establishment of the separate group of economic experts would seem unnecessary. Ends.

2. We have now completed a memorandum which has been discussed with the Departments concerned in Ottawa. Cabinet Defence Committee went over the same ground last week and I think we can now say with some assurance that our paper represents the Government's views.

3. The text of my personal covering letter to Spofford and of the memorandum are given in my immediately following messages.

4. I realize that certain questions of organization are on the agenda for the meeting of Deputies on October 18 or 19, as you reported in your telegram No. 1956 of October 13.† However, I would leave entirely to Spofford the decision as to what he does with our memorandum. Our representatives at the various meetings in Washington this week and next will, of course, be discussing some of the ideas in our memorandum but you can tell Spofford that we do not propose to show it to any other delegation until he has decided what he wants to do with it. SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney, Begins: My immediately preceding message on North Atlantic re-organization.

Following is text of my letter of October 16 to Spofford which will confirmed by bag. Text begins:
Secret and Personal.
Dear Mr. Spofford:

When I met you in New York after the meetings of the Council we had a brief discussion of NATO organization and means which might be adopted to improve the present machinery.

I promised then that I would let you have on paper a brief development of the suggestion which my Minister put forward of a single Ministerial Council to replace the present tri-cameral arrangement. The attached memorandum is the result.

We have tried to make our paper brief and to the point. We have also concentrated on re-organization at the Ministerial level and this for two reasons — first, because it seems to us that if authority is concentrated at the top, the nature and functions of the other bits of the machine will fall into place, and second, because our ideas on the production and finance (and commodity) sides are still far from clear.

While the views set forth in our memorandum are, of course, preliminary, I am satisfied that they represent in general the kind of organization which my government feel to be most appropriate to accomplish efficiently and promptly the purposes we all have in mind for the NATO.

I am expecting to be in Washington during the meetings of the Military Committee which begin on October 24th (though I shall not, of course, attend them). I hope very much that before the Defence Committee meet we will have a further chance of discussing these problems. Meantime, because our paper was only completed today, I am sending the text of it by telegram to Wilgress, asking him to deliver it to you on my behalf. Text Ends. Message Ends.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney, Begins: My immediately preceding messages.

1. Following is text of our memorandum for Spofford on North Atlantic Re-organization.

SECRET Ottawa, October 16, 1950

NORTH ATLANTIC RE-ORGANIZATION

1. At its New York session, the North Atlantic Council asked the advice of the Defence Committee on a number of questions of organization relating to the establishment of the integrated force. At the same time, the Working Group of Council Deputies arranged for groups of experts to meet in London this month to study re-organization on the civil side, particularly in relation to production and finance.

2. During the Council's New York meetings, the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that the enlarged responsibilities in immediate prospect gave new urgency to the problem of re-organization; there were strong arguments for early simplification of the structure of the NATO, particularly at the top.

3. This memorandum sets out the Canadian approach to the problem based on two assumptions:

(a) that there is a general recognition by member governments that the increased responsibilities of the NATO now makes necessary some degree of re-organization, and that it is timely to examine the problem as a whole while certain particular aspects of it are under consideration;

(b) that, if possible, any changes in the organization that may be necessary or advisable should be made without alteration of the Treaty, that is by appropriate revision of the "by-laws" of the NATO, so to speak, rather than by amendment to its "constitution". (This, we think can be accomplished by revising previous decisions of the Council and the Defence Committee).

4. Under the present structure, with three separate committees of Ministers, the problem of co-ordination is difficult, if not impossible, to resolve simply through the Council Deputies. The NATO hierarchy of Foreign, Defence and Finance Ministers does not correspond accurately to any precise division of responsibilities in the government of member countries. Further, if the present ministerial structure of the NATO is not modified, the increasing importance of production and supply problems may well lead logically to proposals for the establishment of a fourth body at the ministerial level, to correspond with those on defence and finance.

5. The prospect of four separate committees of Ministers, each composed of colleagues of equal status in their own governments although three of the committees are formally subordinate to the fourth, emphasizes the necessity for combining all activities of the NATO under one supreme Council which would represent governments. At such a Council, governments might, according to their own domestic requirements and the nature of the agenda, be represented by one or more Ministers. (Representation by Prime Ministers should not be excluded. For example, if the Council were to meet in Ottawa the Canadian Prime Minister might represent the Government of Canada).

6. We recognize that such a solution would increase the number of persons attending meetings of the Council. Nevertheless, the advantages to be gained by introducing into the highest body of the NATO where policy is formulated, Ministers directly responsible in their own governments for Defence, Finance and Supply seem to us sufficient to outweigh the disadvantage of numbers. Further, the practice of meeting in sub-committees might make Council sessions less cumbrous.

7. Such a re-organization of the Council would confirm and enhance the prestige and importance of the Council Deputies which would then emerge quite clearly as the active continuing authority of the NATO. The Deputies would no longer be merely the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers as they are now at least in form. They would also represent their other Ministers concerned with North Atlantic matters; in fact, between Council sessions, they would represent governments and be in a position to speak for the NATO. It would not seem that any new directive would be required for this development. It could be taken to follow directly from the establishment of the "Council of Governments" which we have suggested.

8. On the military side, the re-organization we have in mind would imply that the Standing Group would become directly responsible to the Council and, when the Council was not sitting, to the Deputies.

9. However, in view of the limited membership of the Standing Group, the Military Committee should be re-organized as a continuing advisory or consultative body of the Standing Group. This could be done by appointing the accredited representatives in Washington of all countries not members of the Standing Group as deputies to their respective Chiefs of Staff. This reconstituted Military Committee would then meet with the Standing Group from time to time and its new terms of reference could provide that on occasion, the Chiefs of Staff themselves could attend.

10. This redefinition of the functions of the Military Committee would contribute to a solution of the problem which the Council has asked the Defence Committee to examine, namely, establishing a close relationship between the accredited representatives and the Standing Group. The importance of this close relationship will of course become even more obvious when the Standing Group has been re-organized as, in effect, a combined Chiefs of Staff.

11. By constituting the accredited representatives in Washington as a continuing committee, the provision of the Treaty for a "Defence Committee" under the Council could be satisfied. For this purpose the name might indeed be changed.

12. Our views on other aspects of organization on the military side will be put forward during the forthcoming meetings of the Military and Defence Committees.

13. As regards the machinery best suited for the efficient and prompt attainment of NATO objectives in production and finance (and the same applies to the commodity field), we have reached no firm or precise conclusions. However, in these matters, as well, we would look to the Deputies of the re-organized Council to fulfil the co-ordinating role, rather than to the setting up of any new executive agency or agencies. As the groups of experts on production and finance will be meeting in London shortly, we prefer to wait for their recommendations on these aspects of the NATO.

14. Some of the questions that will require examination in this general field (as, for example, how best to draw on the experience of our OEEC delegations in Paris) are, we believe, chiefly of concern to the European members. Canada, of course, will be very much interested in what course is proposed.

15. In general, we feel that those studying the organization of our production and finance machinery and the relationship of OEEC to the NATO should take into account the broader problem of the general re-organization of the NATO. We believe that the suggestions on the larger problem which we have outlined above may be helpful to these particular studies.

16. Under the Canadian proposals, the Defence, Finance and Economic Committees and the Military Production and Supply Board would have to be fitted into the simplified structure. In this connection, and in order to disturb the present structure as little as possible, the permanent working staffs in London of the MPSB and DFEC could be retained and made responsible directly to the Deputies. In other words, the members of what are now the permanent working staffs, might become the Deputies' advisers on production and finance. The present DFEC and MPSB would have become redundant.

17. We realize that proposals such as we have put forward for centralizing the organization of the NATO will raise further questions which we have not attempted to answer. The locations and relationship of the Deputies and the Standing Group would have to be decided. These decisions would be of considerable importance. For our part, we would be inclined to have the Standing Group related directly to the Council and, therefore, on a continuing basis to the Council Deputies.

18. It would also be necessary to strengthen and probably enlarge to some extent the Secretariat of the Council and Council Deputies, on the one hand, and that of the Standing Group and Military Committee on the other.

19. There are a number of other questions of organization which will require early decision. We believe, however, that, if the Council is re-organized as a Council of Governments, and the lines of responsibility and authority are thus firmly and clearly settled, the solutions to these other problems will be capable of easier and more satisfactory solution.

20. The general argument for drastic simplification of the NATO machinery at this time needs no further emphasis. As the scope and scale of activity increase and we pass from the planning stage to execution, the decisions to be taken at the top level will emerge as being primarily political — that is, questions which can be dealt with only by governments and not by experts. For these reasons, we believe that the time has come to concentrate in one Council of Governments the full authority of the organization.

Following for Heeney from Wilgress, Begins: Your telegram No. 1580 of October 17 — North Atlantic reorganization.

1. Both Spofford and Achilles have told me how much they like your memorandum and that personally they agree in general with our approach to the problem. Both said they did not know how far the United States Government would be prepared to go along these lines, but they left no doubt that they personally gave the proposals in your memorandum their full approval.

2. Spofford left on Sunday for Washington, but he told me he would let me have a note commenting upon certain details in the Canadian proposals. I have not yet received this note, so I am sending you this telegram without waiting for it further, but will telegraph later if I receive the note today.

3. At first Spofford was so pleased with your memorandum that he was inclined to have it circulated immediately. After we had discussed the matter, however, he realized that this might be mistaken tactics and could lead to frantic telegraphing with a hardening of attitude on the part of certain Governments or individuals in those Governments. Accordingly, we agreed that the best thing was to leave the general question of tactics to discussion between you and Spofford. For this reason he hopes that you will be able to go to Washington to see him early this week.

4. There are two objectives to be accomplished. The first is to secure the agreement of the various branches of the United States Government to our proposals. In this connection Achilles mentioned that it would be useful if Wrong could give a copy of the memorandum to Perkins as soon as possible.

5. The second objective is to secure the consideration of our proposals by the organization as a whole. This presents difficulties and calls for careful consideration of tactics. The present position is that the military side of the organization is being considered by the Defence Committee and its subsidiary organs, while the civilian side is being considered by the Deputies, who have set up a Working Party of seven for this purpose, and the Working Party in turn has set up two groups of experts, one to consider the production organization and the other the economic and finance organization. There is an overlap in that the MPSB is technically a subsidiary organ of the Defence Committee, and care will have to be taken to see that the Defence Committee do not run counter to what the production group of experts may be doing in London. I pointed this out at a meeting of the Deputies, and Spofford is very much alive to this possible complication.

6. There is another and still more delicate problem in that obviously it is inappropriate for the Deputies, who represent Foreign Ministers, to take the initiative in suggesting the abolition of the Defence Committee which is a Committee of Defence Ministers. The same applies, although to a lesser degree, to the DFEC, which is a Committee of Finance Ministers. Accordingly, it is desirable that any initiative for the abolition of the Defence Committee should come from the Defence Ministers themselves, and hence the meeting in Washington this week does present an opportunity which should not be missed.

7. Accordingly, it would seem that our memorandum should first be discussed informally with representatives of the various other countries before the meeting of the Defence Committee. For this purpose the Deputies who are going to Washington for the meeting would serve as a suitable first approach. Spofford, Hoyer Millar, Alphand and Van Starkenborgh will be in Washington. Alphand has not been in London during the recent meetings, so I have had no opportunity of talking with him, but Spofford thinks that our memorandum contains many of the views shared by Alphand. Although I discussed our ideas informally with Sir Pierson Dixon,[85] he was not present at the later meetings of the Deputies, and I had no opportunity of talking to Hoyer Millar, who has been very rushed during the few days he was in London prior to his return to Washington. I have talked matters over rather fully with Van Starkenborgh, the Netherlands Deputy, and I have told him that you would be in Washington. He is anxious to see you, and while I have not told him about our memorandum I think it would be useful if you could give him a copy after you have cleared matters in a preliminary way with Spofford.

8. I believe that with these preliminary contacts you would be able to make our views known to those who have been devoting most thought to the problem, and then you could leave it to Spofford to decide what would be the best way of advancing further the Canadian proposals. I shall let you know if anything further occurs to me during the course of the next few days. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC REORGANIZATION

1. The Canadian proposals for reorganization of the North Atlantic structure were discussed today by the Deputies. I led off by emphasizing that the essential feature of our proposals was the reconversion of the Council into a "Council of Governments". I expressed the hope that discussion would be centred on this essential feature. I explained that certain parts of our memorandum had already been overtaken by events, in that the Military Committee were considering the reorganization of the military side and the Deputies had already taken steps to reorganize the production and financial and economic sides. I stressed that from the point of view of efficiency the time had now arrived to streamline the organization.

2. Support for the Canadian proposals was forthcoming from Alphand, who only expressed a doubt as to whether the Military Representatives Committee could properly be termed the Defence Committee and he thought that the technical requirements in the Treaty could be complied with by regarding a meeting of the Council at which Defence Ministers were present as a meeting of the Defence Committee. He added that he was prepared to recommend the essential features of the Canadian proposals to his Government.

3. Hoyer Millar said that the Canadian memorandum had not yet been considered by the United Kingdom Ministers, but that at the official level they were favourable to the [group corrupt] ideas. He objected, however, to paragraph 8 of the memorandum, which stated that the reorganization would imply the Standing Group becoming directly responsible to the Council and, when the Council was not sitting, to the Deputies. He said they could not agree to the Standing Group being made subordinate to the Deputies. I pointed out, in reply, that this related chiefly to political guidance rather than any interference by the Deputies with purely technical military questions.

4. This focussed the discussion for some time on paragraph 8. The Netherlands Deputy argued very clearly that in their view the Standing Group would have to be responsible to some other body, and he raised the question as to what this body would be if the Council was not in session. He compared the relationship of the Standing Group to the Council and to the Deputies as that of a national military organization to the Cabinet. He concluded by stating that he was not yet in a position to express the views of his Government on the main part of the Canadian proposal.

5. The Norwegian Deputy supported the main part of the Canadian proposal, but said that he would regard the acceptance of paragraph 8 as an essential part of the proposal.

6. The Portuguese Deputy raised doubts about the abolition of the Defence Committee and the Defence Financial and Economic Committee. The Belgian Deputy, while expressing sympathy with any proposals designed to increase efficiency, stated that he had not yet had instructions from his Government. The intervention of the Italian Deputy was along similar lines.

7. Spofford said that he had not yet received instructions from his Government on the Canadian proposals. He suggested that the question be taken up again at the meeting of the Deputies on December 13th, and that consideration should be given then to the manner in which the proposals might be brought before the Council. He said he understood it was the desire of the Canadian Government that the proposals should be discussed at the Brussels meeting.

8. During the tea interval I discussed further procedure with Spofford. He was under instructions to keep the agenda as restricted as possible in view of the fact that only two days had been allotted to the Brussels meeting. He hoped therefore I would be able to consult you about your wishes as to how the matter should be brought before the Council He implied that he would be reluctant to have a new item added to the agenda, but thought that possibly a reference could be made to the subject in the progress report of the Deputies. This would then enable you to refer to the question if you so desired, without involving the Council in a lengthy discussion. I should be glad to have your views on this point before the meeting on December 13th.

9. When we resumed after the tea interval, Spofford said we would discuss further procedure on December 13th, but that he thought any discussion in the Council on the Canadian proposals should concentrate on one Ministerial Council which would be regarded as a Council of Governments, and the relationships of the Deputies to the military side of the organization.

10. It is clear that our proposals have given rise to a fundamental issue in that the countries not on the Standing Group wish the Deputies to exercise control over the Standing Group. This will be opposed by the three countries on the Standing Group, who wish to confine the Deputies to giving political guidance to the Standing Group. I should like to know how we stand on this fundamental question. We are seeking in the Military Committee to have the Military Representatives Committee act as a means of exercising influence over the Standing Group. It is obvious that if the Deputies are given responsibility for more than political guidance to the Standing Group, the major responsibility of the three Powers for the conduct of future war will be lessened. I fear that the Netherlands objective is probably more than we can hope to attain, and that the best plan is to concentrate on effective influence over the Standing Group at the level of the Military Representatives Committee, given always the opportunity for higher political guidance by the Council and, when the Council is not in session, by the Deputies.

Your telegram No. 2242 [sic] of December 11, North Atlantic re-organization.

1. We are gratified to know that the Canadian paper is being seriously considered by the Deputies, but we would have no desire to press its consideration by the Council unless it had general approval at the Deputy level. Indeed, we think it would be unwise to press its consideration by Council at this stage. We would not therefore ask for a separate item on the agenda.

2. All that we would ask at the meetings next week would be that governments agree to give serious and sympathetic consideration to the main proposals of our paper, particularly that concerning the Council of Governments. We would make this request on the agenda item "Deputies Progress Report" and would suggest that Deputies continue their study of the subject with a view to making recommendations at the next Council meeting.

3. With regard to paragraph 8, it should be noted that the paper was drafted before proposal for closer liaison between the Standing Group and accredited military representatives was made. Although we are not entirely happy with present text of MC22/5,† (dealing with military reorganization), we think that it goes some distance towards meeting our objections to the present arrangement whereby the Standing Group has been operating without much liaison with military authorities of other NATO countries. We think, however, that the Council, or the Deputies when the Council is not sitting, should give general political guidance to the Standing Group. We would not, therefore, wish to insist on the present text of paragraph 8. We agree with you that the U.S. and U.K. especially would be unlikely to accept a text which would give the Council or the Deputies control over the Standing Group.

DEPUTIES' MEETING — CANADIAN PROPOSALS FOR RE-ORGANIZATION OF NATO STRUCTURE

Discussion on this subject was continued yesterday. At the outset the Danish Deputy said that he had been authorized by his Government to give full approval to the Canadian conception of a single Ministerial Council and abolishing the present Defence Committee and D.F.E.C. His Government also favoured making the Standing Group responsible to the Council and, when the Council is not in session, to the Council Deputies. In practice he thought this would mean that general political guidance would be given to the Standing Group by the Deputies. The Belgian Deputy associated himself with approving the central idea of a single Council.

2. The Portuguese Deputy referred to consideration being given by the Military Committee to the military aspects of re-organization, and suggested that consideration of these points of our paper might be deferred.

3. I then pointed out that we fully recognized that there would not be time at the Council for a lengthy discussion of the Canadian proposals, but that we would like to obtain the authority of the Council to have our proposals given further study in the Deputies.

4. The Chairman agreed that the military reorganization aspects which had been considered by the Military Committee were relevant, but agreed that it would be useful if, without committing Governments at this stage, the Council could be invited to give its general approval to the particular objectives of the Canadian proposals relating to the reorganization of the top structure of NATO and to continuing study being given to the proposals by the competent NATO agencies. We therefore thought it advisable to submit a brief draft resolution which was given informal approval by the Deputies. In submitting this draft resolution I made it clear that it would only be submitted at the discretion of the Canadian representative on the Council on the assumption that the Chairman's report would contain a reference to our discussion in the Deputies of the Canadian proposals. The text of the draft resolution which we submitted (and which was prepared in consultation with the United States representatives) is as follows:

Quote:

The Council

HAVING NOTED that the Council Deputies have considered the proposals put forward by the Canadian Government for the reorganization of the top structure of NATO and the transformation of the North Atlantic Council into a "Council of Governments", and being in agreement that a simplification of the NATO structure in the interests of the effectiveness of its operation should be sought by all appropriate means,

AFFIRMS its adherence to the objectives of simplifying the structure of NATO and prompting further the effectiveness of the operations of all of its agencies;

REQUESTS that the Council request the Council Deputies and the other NATO agencies concerned to study the Canadian proposals for the reorganization of the top structure of NATO, and any other proposals designed to achieve the foregoing objectives, and to make recommendations or take appropriate action as speedily as possible. Unquote.

5. I think that the informal approval given to our draft resolution in the Deputies will greatly facilitate its acceptance in the Council, and that its approval by the Council will make it possible for us to move forward with consideration of the Canadian proposals in the Council Deputies and other NATO agencies concerned.

N.A.T.O. COUNTRIES; PROPOSED STUDIES OF ECONOMIC RESOURCES

The military plans of the twelve North Atlantic countries call for increasing expenditures of money and increasing use of resources for defence. The objective is a common one but the countries differ in their abilities to provide men, equipment and supplies. Both Canada and the United States are relatively well placed to contribute some equipment without charge to other NATO countries in order that the common burden may be shared more equitably.

2. It is now proposed that a study should be made by officials of the twelve countries in order to assist in the process of burden-sharing. All the NATO countries have agreed to this study except Canada. The Canadian representatives have told the others that Canada is willing for them to proceed, and that Canada will supply factual material, but that Canadians may not take any part in the study without government authority.

3. The proposed study falls into two parts. Canadian officials are generally agreed that one part is satisfactory and the other is not. The satisfactory part of the study involves the pooling of certain past statistics and certain estimates for the coming year; these would relate to defence expenditures and how they affect national production, trade, budgetary position, etc. The unsatisfactory part of the study is more extensive statistically and appears to include matters which are political in nature rather than economic; it includes a survey of the capacity of each country to devote resources to defence and a report on what factors are to be considered important in assessing a country's ability to share in this common burden.

4. In several meetings Canadian representatives have objected to and opposed the undertaking of the second part of the study. They have pointed out that the obstacle to increased defence expenditures in all countries concerned is not only economic capacity but political willingness and capacity. However our representatives have not been able to make a single convert to their views. A question has therefore arisen whether, instead of accepting the majority decision, we should refuse to take part and simply supply factual material. The matter is set out in some detail, with some of the pros and cons, in an attached memorandum which has been before the senior officials of departments principally concerned (The Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence). Upon this Cabinet direction is now required.

5. I believe strongly that we should take part. We have played a leading and an honourable role in the North Atlantic Treaty; we should never stand apart from our allies except for the strongest reasons and for reasons that they will readily understand and accept. The present case, in my opinion, is not of great importance and if we alone stood aside from a burden-sharing study our motives would most surely be misunderstood.

6. The proposed study is not intended to supply all the answers to burden-sharing questions. It will only provide some sort of guide; a basis but not the only basis. It may turn out to be quite unimportant or impractical and, like so many reports, be pigeon-holed. If so, we would certainly have made a mountain out of a mole-hill. We may well have scruples about asking our officials to speak on political matters; but other countries are in exactly the same constitutional position and they do not share our scruples.

7. If the study turns out to be important and influential, what risks do we run if we take part?

(a) The most important risk, I suppose, is that the report may suggest we should set our defence sights or our mutual-aid sights uncomfortably high. If so, I believe we must face that issue when it arises. All the other countries are running the same risk.

(b) Another risk is that Canadian aid, relatively small in comparison with United States aid, may be regarded simply as a drop in the bucket. The proposed study is largely, although not solely, designed to meet United States needs; the United States administration requires a lot of ammunition to get mutual aid appropriations through Congress and the study will supply some of it. Thus Canada, and distinctive Canadian aid, might become submerged in a general operation between the United States of America and Europe and we would not get the gratitude or the credit we deserve. There is, of course, a risk here; but we are surely not very likely to retain the gratitude and esteem of our allies if we maintain our present position regarding the burden-sharing study which they apparently agree to be useful not merely in relation to United States aid but as part of the general mobilization of increasing North Atlantic resources for defence of the whole area.

8. But while there are risks if we do take part there are also risks if we do not and I believe the latter are the greater:

(a) There is the risk that we will be misunderstood. Indeed it is hardly a risk at all; it is certain that other countries will believe we are holding back from the study because we are not prepared to foot our fair share of the bill;

(b) There is the risk, again almost a certainty, that the report will be less palatable and more embarrassing to us if we do not take part, merely supplying our factual material for others to present as they wish;

(c) There is the risk that, if we stand aloof, all by ourselves, we will be subjected to even greater pressures than if we took a full part;

(d) There is the risk that our work and usefulness in other North Atlantic fields may be damaged. In this regard our High Commissioner in London has written as follows regarding the proposed study: "Even if the primary purpose is to facilitate United States assistance, it is surely one of substantial interest to us; not as a recipient of United States aid but as a country in the North Atlantic area which has an interest in the improvement of the defence of that area. In any event, if this exercise is to have some connection, however remote, with eventual political negotiations regarding the defence efforts of the various NATO countries, and if those defence efforts are in turn to affect (and be affected by) NATO military planning, it is rather hard to see how participation in this particular exercise can be separated from participation in other NATO activities of more direct interest to us."

9. Accordingly, for all these reasons, I recommend that Canadian officials be authorized to take part in the proposed study.

10. I should add that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, does not share my views.

[SECRET] Ottawa, November 20, 1950

BURDEN-SHARING IN NATO

(Note: On November 14th, the Economic Defence Panel discussed a memorandum on this subject, together with some supporting papers. The present memorandum contains some revisions of the original one, and stands by itself without supporting papers.)

1. In recent weeks a number of papers have been produced in NATO on the subject of burden-sharing, notably a U.K. paper on the "philosophy" involved and a U.S. paper on the economic analysis required. The proposals fall into two parts:

(a) Economic estimates to be undertaken by the Economic and Financial Working Group connected with OEEC in Paris; and

(b) A statement on the philosophy of sharing the burden.

The "Philosophy"

2. It is convenient to comment on part (b) first. In this field Canadian views found many supporters. The extreme U.K. views (which are said to be those of Mr. Gaitskell and which involve a conception of "sharing the wealth" that certainly goes beyond anything acceptable to the Canadian Government) were very greatly toned down. As it stands, this part is probably unobjectionable except for the word "multilateral" in para. 1 (B). Nevertheless, it is important to recognize that the U.K. attitude exists and also that the French proposed "pooling of resources" even before the British proposed "sharing the burden". The philosophy of the U.K. Government is, of course widely different from that of the U.S. Administration; but it so happens that the idea of "sharing the burden" happens to fit in, just at the moment, with the need of the Administration to convince Congress that the U.S.A. is not carrying virtually the whole burden itself.

How far are Economic Estimates Useful? — NATO Proposals and Canadian Objections

3. Part (a) consists of four paragraphs. It is the opinion of the Departments of Finance and External Affairs that the first two paragraphs are satisfactory. Under these paragraphs the background estimates needed for an approach to burden-sharing would be put together. They would be focussed on the expected impacts of defence expenditures in the year 1951-52 and would cover the following items in each country:

use of material and manpower;
distribution of gross national product;
budgetary and monetary position;
and balance of payments.

The study would also "describe and evaluate the effectiveness of the measures being taken or proposed to deal with these impacts." It is agreed that this work would be useful.

4. The second two paragraphs of Part (a) are not considered satisfactory. Under these the study would be extended —

(i) to assess the ability of each country to devote resources to defence, (which would necessarily involve a survey of "the sources and uses of each country's aggregate economic resources");

(ii) to report on "the importance to be attached to the various considerations" involved in burden-sharing; and

(iii) to comment on the effects and practicability of different mechanisms for transferring burdens (but not to propose the nature or amount of transfers).

5. The Departments of Finance and External Affairs agree that these proposals are unsatisfactory for the following reasons:

(i) A complete survey of each country's aggregate economic resources is a monumental task, only to be undertaken if it is really useful;

(ii) In fact, given the basic estimates outlined in para. 2 above, burden-sharing is a matter for political decision, not for estimation by "experts". In Canada (and, indeed, in the United States as well) the amount of aid provided will be guided at least as much by domestic needs and undertakings as by estimated overseas requirements. Hence the material outlined in para. 3 above is not only of doubtful usefulness but may become positively misleading and embarrassing;

(iii) While an international civil-service might make an objective study under para. 3 above, it is quite impossible to expect such a study from national representatives. No man on the group can put forward his country's position objectively; each is in duty bound to aid and protect his country as far as he can. Hence the report which emerges will not in fact provide a suitable objective basis for equitable burden-sharing.

Choices Before Canada

6. Canadian views, along the lines expressed in the preceding paragraph, have been put forward during the past two weeks in London, but with virtually no success. All the other NATO countries are ready and willing to go forward with the whole of the proposed study. Canada can participate:

(i) Fully,

(ii) Partly, or

(iii) Not at all.

7. Partial participation is really not practicable. Canada can scarcely go through the limited motions involved in para. 3 above while all the rest go through the much more extensive motions involved in paras. 3 and 4 together. Canadian representatives would be in the invidious position of supplying partial information about their own country, and approving or disapproving parts of reports, parts of chapters, parts of paragraphs, or even parts of sentences. Our representatives should not be placed in such a position. In fact, the choice lies between full participation or none at all and this choice raises more fundamental considerations than appear at first sight.

The Case AGAINST Canadian Participation

8. The chief pressure for the extensive analysis (para. 4 above) comes from the United States officials. They wish to have massive economic paraphernalia in order to support MDAA appropriations in Congress. In short, they wish to get, for MDAA purposes, the same sort of comprehensive material that they have collected in the past in Paris through OEEC for ECA appropriations. The purpose of the material is, at least supposedly, two-fold; first, to secure as large a pie as possible and, second, to serve as a guide in slicing the pie. (Actually, as has appeared in ECA and is emerging in MDAA, the pie is sliced in large measure on political considerations).

9. In the past Canada has been scrupulously careful to avoid being a beneficiary under lend-lease, ECA, or MDAA. Canada has taken all sorts of special precautions to avoid dependence on the U.S.A. and to avoid getting into the same boat as the U.K. and European countries. Similarly, when Canada has given aid to overseas countries it has been done independently in a pattern of our own, and not merely as a minor adjunct of U.S. aid. If we go in for the full-fledged U.S. exercise in burden-sharing are we exposing ourselves to two dangers: we may be exposed to the same pressures from the U.S. as if we were receiving U.S. aid and, at the same time, we may be expected by other countries to put in our Canadian two-cent's worth just as a slight premium on top of the American dollar.

10. Even if we do not share in this particular exercise, we should continue to share fully in the other work and the responsibilities of NATO. This exercise is one that is apparently necessary between the U.S.A. and the recipients of U.S. aid. We are involved neither as a giver nor a receiver; hence we do not take part in it.

The Case FOR Canadian Participation

11. The arguments for non-participation are strong; but the arguments for full participation are strong also. We ourselves may feel convinced that the extensive economic exercise (para. 4 above) is useless or even misleading; but, after full discussion of our views, we have not been able to persuade a single one of our Atlantic partners to agree with us. They are all ready and willing to go ahead, and they have all had experience of this sort of exercise in the OEEC - ECA operation. We have had no experience. What basis have we for our views that it is useless or misleading; is everyone out of step but Canada? We have already made it plain that we will not accept MDAA aid; if we went forward with the exercise, along with the others, we could also make it clear that, as in the past, our own giving would not be on the same basis as the United States — indeed, in a pinch, we had always been a good deal more generous.

12. Thus our position may not be too strong in claiming that we should stay outside the exercise. But, far more important, some very undesirable results might flow from our decision to stand apart. We would appear to flout the principles of "pooling resources" or "sharing the burden" on which France and the United Kingdom have laid such stress and to which we can, at least in a limited degree, subscribe. Moreover, if the Atlantic Pact is going to work at all it will only work if individual countries are willing to accept majority decisions. Thus we are in danger of doing serious damage to the whole fabric of North Atlantic unity, a fabric which Canada has done so much to build and strengthen. And finally, and most invidiously, our motives would never be understood; we would always be suspected of willingness to play the game only as long as it did not cost too much, of unwillingness to allow our partners even to look at the rich resources that we might be devoting to the common cause. Thus we would lose the respect and confidence of other countries and, in a measure, lose our place of influence and prestige among them.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Repeat Washington EX-2390; OEEC Paris No. 21.

Following for Wilgress from the Minister, Begins: The Cabinet yesterday, as you will have learned from the Under-Secretary, approved our participation in the proposed NATO studies of economic resources although none of our early apprehensions about the wisdom or value of these studies has been removed. However, it was the general opinion that the disadvantages of participation were not nearly so great as the disadvantages of non-participation.

2. I feel sure that you have explained fully to Spofford and the other senior Americans the basis of our opposition. It is not that we have anything to hide, nor indeed, that we are apologetic for what we have done or propose to do.

3. Information received during the last day or two from Washington indicates that the Americans are themselves becoming uneasy about these studies, which are apparently being referred to in some Washington circles as "Operation Mousetrap". The "mousetrap", however, is strictly U.S. manufacture, and it is surprising that they had not realized earlier that they might be the first victims. The fact that it is a share-the-burden operation for them, and a share-the-wealth operation for others, should have given them cause to worry.

4. However, this is all water over the dam and we must now do our best to make sure that the difficulties and dangers which we have always anticipated are reduced to a minimum. It is the feeling of the Government, which I share, that while we should participate honestly in the work, we should, nevertheless, not allow ourselves to become involved in needless investigations and useless research work which would take up the time of Canadian officials here, in England and in France, who are already over-burdened.

5. May I add that your messages from London on this matter were most helpful and made the position much clearer than it otherwise would have been. Ends.

625. DEA/50030-A-40

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], November 22, 1950

At their meeting in New York last September the French, United Kingdom and United States Foreign Ministers agreed that their Governments would take the following steps to maintain their position in Berlin:

(1) Build up Berlin fuel and non-perishable food stocks to one-year's supply with rationing.

(2) Reaffirm that counter-blockade measures against Soviet interference with Berlin transport will be taken in degrees commensurate with the Soviet or DDR (German Democratic Republic) interference. Direct the High Commission to prepare plans for such action at once.

(3) Request the NAT countries to cooperate in such counter-blockade action and, while it is going on, to restrict their trade with the rest of the Soviet orbit to a level at most no higher than in the period preceding the action.

(4) Strengthen Allied forces in Berlin by the assignment prior to 1 January 1951 to that garrison of additional French, British and United States units and authorize the formation of German auxiliary forces there.

(5) Make clear that the Soviet Union is responsible for any attack upon Berlin or Western Germany by the East German forces inasmuch as they are in occupation of the Eastern zone. In the event of an armed attack from whatever source, defend Berlin by force, bring the relevant provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty into effect, and present the issue to the United Nations.

For Canada the most important section of the agreement is, of course, Paragraph (5) which has the effect of bringing Western Berlin for all practical purposes into the area covered by the North Atlantic Treaty. Because of our obligations under the Treaty, we are now more directly concerned with the Berlin situation than at any time since the war. If, in the event of an armed attack on the city, the Western Occupying Powers invoked the "relevant provisions" of the North Atlantic Treaty, as they claim they would, we should presumably be morally bound to take such action as we deemed necessary to restore and maintain the security of the area.

At the end of October this agreement was brought to the attention of the North Atlantic Deputies in London with the indication that, after an exchange of views on the international situation as it affected the security of Berlin, the United States representative would propose for their consideration a resolution concerning the cooperation of North Atlantic Treaty countries in counter-blockade measures, if and when these should be required. We have now learned that the terms of the draft resolution are as follows:

"The Deputies,

Noting the Agreement on Berlin Security arrived at by the Foreign Ministers of the Three Occupying Powers, and in particular paragraph (3) thereof,

Agree on behalf of their governments that the other NAT countries, after having being notified by the Three Occupying Powers that counter-blockade action was being undertaken, will cooperate in such action and, while it is going on, will restrict their trade with the rest of the Soviet orbit to a level at most no higher than in the period preceding the action."

Mr. Wilgress was instructed to indicate that Canada, as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, would be prepared to cooperate in any necessary counter-blockade measures.[86]

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

DEPUTIES' MEETING 23RD NOVEMBER: BERLIN SECURITY

Document D-D/180† was discussed to-day, and it was clear that there was virtually unanimous support for the United States draft resolution. In addition to the representatives of the United States, France, and the United Kingdom, support for the resolution was expressed by the Deputies of Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy, Iceland, Luxembourg, and Canada.

2. In expressing their general agreement in principle with the resolution, the Belgian and Dutch Deputies both made the point that their Governments would wish to know at a subsequent stage in further detail what the counter-blockade measures would entail, a point which was also in the minds of a number of other Deputies.

3. The principal difficulties were raised by the Danish and Portuguese Deputies. The Danish Deputy read out a lengthy declaration by his Government which, in addition to asking for further details as to the precise steps each country would be requested to take in the event of counter-blockade, raised a number of general policy questions as to whether or not counter-blockade measures were desirable. He

[86] Note marginale:/Marginal Note:
This appears to me to be necessarily consequential of our participation in NAT. L.S. St. L[aurent] 21-XI-50.

stressed his Government's concern with the situation in Berlin, and the necessity of taking the greatest precautionary measures to ensure the localization of any conflict in the Berlin area. He also emphasized the importance which Denmark attached to its trade with areas under Soviet control outside the immediate area of the Soviet zone of Berlin, and referred particularly to Denmark's present trade with Poland, Bulgaria and Roumania. In the course of so doing, he mentioned the bilateral treaty obligations between Denmark and Eastern European countries, and the efforts to stimulate East-West trade in non-strategic items in which Denmark was participating through the machinery of the Economic Commission for Europe. It was clear from the Danish Deputy's presentation that his Government had read too much into the proposed draft resolution, and was raising questions which were difficult, if not impossible, to answer in detail at this stage.

4. Hoyer Millar cleared the air somewhat by pointing out that the three occupying Powers, in paragraph 3 of the tripartite declaration on Berlin security (Document D-D/163)† had simply faced up to a situation which might develop in the future as a result of Soviet action, and which, in addition to requiring counter-measures on the part of the occupying Powers, would require the active co-operation of the other NATO countries in order to see that in any counter-blockade action there was an undertaking to restrict their trade with the rest of the Soviet orbit to a level at most no higher than in the period preceding the action. He also indicated that the Western Commandants in Berlin were at present giving study to the possible measures which might be taken by the Soviet and East German puppet regime, and the necessary counter-measures which might be developed to deal with them.

5. The Portuguese Deputy raised, more briefly, a point rather similar to the Danish Deputy, and asked for further details about the undertaking in the resolution "to co-operate in such action", and suggested a redraft which would give a more detailed indication of the kind of action which might be taken. The tripartite representatives repeated the arguments against spelling out detailed measures in advance of knowledge of the type of situation we may be called upon to face, and the Portuguese Deputy accordingly withdrew his objections on the understanding that the minutes would record the discussion and make clear the reason why nothing beyond general agreement in principle could be accorded at this stage.

6. The Danish Deputy undertook to explain the matter further to his Government and seek instructions, which he hoped would permit him to accept the draft resolution in its present form. Because of the Danish difficulties, it was agreed that the views expressed should be noted, and that final action on the United States draft resolution should be deferred until the meeting next week.

7. In connection with the interpretation of paragraph 5 of the Tripartite Agreement, there was also a brief discussion. You will recall that this question was raised at our previous meeting on November 15th by the Netherlands Deputy, who had been authorized to express his Government's concurrence in the view that an attack on West Berlin would automatically bring into play the progressions [provisions?] of the North Atlantic Treaty. This discussion also made it clear that there was a general agreement with the interpretation of the tripartite Powers' declaration in this respect. Alphand took the view that the declaration was not an extension, but a reaffirmation, of the existing clauses of the Treaty, and pointed out that the only modified element was the statement that the three occupying Powers had agreed in advance as to the responsibility of the Soviet Union for any attack on Berlin or Western Germany by the East German forces.

8. The United Kingdom Deputy said that the United Kingdom interpretation was based on both practical and legal grounds. From a practical point of view it was almost impossible to envisage an attack on the Western zone of Germany which would not involve the occupying Powers almost at once, while on legal grounds the position was that occupying Powers, under the occupation statute, are responsible for the actions of the German authorities in their respective zones.

9. The Portuguese and Belgian Deputies drew a distinction between a formal attack, either directly by the Soviet forces or through the intermediary of the East German forces, and a frontier incident, making it clear that while their Governments would agree that in the former instance the relevant provisions of the Treaty should be brought into effect, in the latter every effort should be made to localize the conflict. The Chairman agreed with this distinction between an armed attack and a frontier incident.

10. On paragraph 5 of the Tripartite Agreement the Danish Deputy indicated that his Foreign Minister had given his general approval, but was unable to do so formally pending consultation with the Danish Parliament, which he hoped would take place to-day. The Deputy for Iceland said he, too, was awaiting instructions from his Government on this point. The other Deputies expressed agreement with the position taken by the tripartite Powers. In view of the difficulties of the Danish and Icelandic representatives, it was agreed to defer this question until a later meeting next week.

11. This morning's discussion on Berlin security gave rise to a related discussion on NATO security vis-à-vis the press. This morning's Daily Telegraph had carried a report by its diplomatic correspondent indicating that the question of joint action in the event of a new Russian blockade of Berlin has been raised in the Council of Deputies. The text of the Telegraph's story is contained in my immediately following telegram.†

12. Several Deputies drew attention to this serious leak, and it was agreed that it should be investigated, and that nothing further should be said to the press beyond the fact that in the course of a general discussion on Germany there was also some discussion of the position in Berlin.

13. We were told privately by a United States source that Parsons,[87] of NATO information staff, had been called up by the Daily Telegraph correspondent a day or two ago, and was told by the correspondent that he had obtained a report that the Deputies were discussing the possibilities of blockade in Berlin from "another source". According to this account, Parsons did his best to deter the correspondent from using the story, but had no success. There was no indication at this morning's meeting as to where the leak had occurred.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni

TELEGRAM 1842 Ottawa, November 24, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your telegrams Nos. 2267 of November 23 and 2276 of November 24.† Berlin security.

1. Deputies' discussions of document D-D/180† seems to us to raise both political and military points that we think require further consideration. Especially in the light of the leak to the press reported in your telegram No. 2268 of November 23,† it is possible that embarrassing questions may be asked in Canada, as to the extent of our commitment and as to whether we are writing a "blank cheque" for any action that may be undertaken by the three Occupying Powers in the event of blockade of Berlin.

2. We are of course prepared to commit ourselves to co-operate in counter-blockade measures of the nature of trade restrictions, but the resolution is so loosely worded it may mean more than this. An important question is what types of counter-blockade measures other than trade restrictions are contemplated? It is noted that in the discussion in the Deputies on November 23 the Occupying Powers side-stepped this question. If the counter-blockade measures contemplated include, for example, another airlift or blockade-running by motor convoys (as was proposed at one stage in the last blockade), and if we and other NATO countries are being asked in advance to commit ourselves to cooperation in such measures, the matter is clearly one which would require very careful consideration by our Governments. Furthermore such consideration by Governments would surely require knowledge of the actual measures proposed.

3. When the subject is discussed again next week, you should therefore take the opportunity to say that while we agree in principle with the U.S. resolution it should be clearly understood that we are not thereby agreeing in advance to co-operate in any specific counter-blockade measures other than the trade restrictions which the Occupying Powers might institute, and that we should of course expect to be consulted in advance before under-taking to co-operate in counter-blockade measures other than trade restrictions.

4. With respect to paragraph 5 of the Tripartite Agreement, you should say that it is your understanding of the proposed resolution that it would not extend the commitments of NATO members but would simply serve as an agreed interpretation on the application of Article 5 and 6 of the Treaty to a situation that might arise in Berlin. You should base these remarks on Alphand's view, that the proposed declaration was not an extension but a re-affirmation of the existing clauses of the Treaty. In this connection, the distinction reported in paragraph 9 of your telegram No. 2267 between a formal attack and a frontier incident appears useful and we are glad to note that the Chairman has agreed with this distinction.

5. You should, of course, in your remarks take care not to give the impression that we are attempting in any way to back out of our Treaty obligations but are merely requesting clarification on these points in order to avoid possible misunderstanding.

6. We may be reading too much into the resolution but clearly we should know where we stand.

DEPUTIES MEETING, 7TH DECEMBER: BERLIN SECURITY

My telegram No. 2267 of November 23rd reported the difficulties which the Danish Deputy expressed on behalf of his Government in connection with Document D-D/180.† At the outset of yesterday's discussion the Danish Deputy said his Government could now agree with the interpretation in Article 5, and emphasized the distinction between an armed attack in the general acknowledged sense and minor incidents. The Danish Government hoped for continuing consultation on the question of Berlin security.

2. The Danish Government could also accept paragraph 3 on the understanding that the NATO Governments were not bound with respect to the details of any counter blockade measures which would be worked out at a later stage.

3. The Danish Deputy then proposed amending the United States draft resolution (D-D/180) by adding to the last sentence the phrase: "in such cases where an increase would have effects contrary to the purposes of the counter-blockade". It was finally agreed that the draft resolution should not be amended, but that a reference should be made in the minutes to this interpretation of the resolution.

4. The Chairman informed the Deputies that he would shortly wish to propose for consideration certain measures regarding tele-communication measures in West Berlin. He also drew attention, on behalf of the United States Government, to the great need for rendering economic assistance to West Berlin wherever possible. A heavy burden had been placed on the occupying Powers and on the West German Government, and there had been some hesitancy on the part of certain NATO members in placing orders in West Berlin on security grounds. The security position had, however, improved as a result of the security guarantee made public by the Foreign Ministers on September 19th.[88] The NATO Governments were invited to consider augmenting their orders in the West Berlin sector in view of the importance of the West Berlin economy. The Chairman agreed to circulate a copy of his statement on this subject.

5. In the light of your telegram No. 1842, I raised the questions whether the resolution referred to counter-blockade measures other than trade restrictions and whether it was commonly agreed that paragraph 5 of the Tripartite Agreement did not extend the commitments of NATO members but simply served as an agreed interpretation of Articles 5 and 6 of the treaty to apply to a situation that might arise in Berlin. On the first point it was again made clear that the resolution only referred to measures in the trade and economic field, and did not imply any commitment to participate in measures outside this field. On the second point, satisfactory assurances were also forthcoming.

6. On this understanding, the Resolution D-D/180 was approved.

7. I am sending copies of this telegram to Paris and Bonn by air bag.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: The feeling I get here — from my work at the United Nations, from official and unofficial talks in New York and in Washington with all kinds of people, from the newspapers and magazines I read and the broadcasts I listen to — is one of growing acceptance of the view that a general war is closer than it has been at any time since 1945, and that it will now be a miracle if it is averted. I must confess that I have myself come closer to this tragic conclusion after listening to the President's Thursday night broadcast[89] and after our discouraging efforts to negotiate a "cease fire" with Peking through the Chinese Communist representatives here. It is not so much that the Peiping people speak the tough language of Moscow and show the same brutal, uncompromising attitude. I am more frightened by their fanatical conceit in the strength and righteousness of the Communist side in every issue, and their stubborn insistence that peace can only be ensured — and they talk much about peace — if the United States mends its ways. The American position, in the face of all this, is definitely hardening, between bursts of excitement, into the mould of total preparation for and widespread acceptance of war. The President's broadcast, calm and measured as it was, confirmed that view. The stated reaction to the Chinese Communists here to this broadcast was that it merely proved what they knew all along; that the Americans wanted to fight in order to destroy Communism by arms wherever they could find it; otherwise, why would Mr. Truman talk about mobilization, a word which, to them, presaged war. They, on their part, were just as determined to protect their revolution against the American aggressors as the Russians were in 1918-1919.

2. It is equally clear by now that the United States is determined to make itself far stronger than it has ever been before in peace time, whatever the results may be. I think that there is still a very good chance that, if this increasing strength can be accompanied by wise and unprovocative diplomacy, it may prove to be an effective deterrent against war. There is, however, also the risk that, with China on the march and all of Asia restless, it may provoke the Russians to strike within the next twelve months, before the Western European defences reach a point where an easy victory is impossible. All this means that we have trying and dangerous months ahead. One aspect of this difficulty will be growing pressure on us, within and without Canada, to strengthen even further our own armed forces and our defence potential.

3. I feel quite certain that developments are rolling up which will make it necessary for us to take even more far-reaching decisions in the weeks ahead than we had to take last summer, on matters concerned with defence, finance, economic and industrial organization, and the best use of our manpower to carry out our commitments. In fact, I do not see how we can adjust ourselves to these new developments without such decisions. We will be a little clearer on this point, of course, when we get the results of the Brussels meeting, but the main problem will be one that is deeper than the Atlantic Pact, namely the impossibility of escaping the consequences of the steps that are being taken here in the direction of total mobilization; consequences which will be as important politically and economically for us as they will be in the defence field. We have certainly managed to keep an even keel in the stormy weather of the last twelve months, but it is, to my way of thinking, going to be more difficult to do that in the months ahead.

4. I hope you do not mind my putting down these random thoughts as they occurred to me here in New York. They certainly do not breathe the spirit of Christmas, but then the negotiations I am in the middle of now with the Chinese are not Following for the Minister from Reid, Begins: In the light of the situation outlined in your own message of today's date to the Prime Minister, I thought that you might consider it your responsibility to restate and re-emphasize in Cabinet the grave danger in which the free world now stands. It is on that assumption that the draft memorandum contained in my immediately following teletype has been prepared. Some such summary but comprehensive description of the present danger should be a useful starting point, I think, for a re-examination of our defence programme and policy.

2. This paper would, of course, gain greatly in effectiveness if you could be present in Cabinet to support it. Perhaps the best time for the Cabinet to consider it might be early next week when Mr. Claxton will have returned and will be ready to make a report on the meetings of the Defence Committee and the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. His report would follow very naturally after consideration of this memorandum. On the other hand, I think it would be an advantage if the memorandum could be circulated some time toward the end of this week so that Ministers could study it. I should, therefore, be grateful to have your comments.

3. We are having the figures in the memorandum checked by the Defence Liaison Division.

4. These two messages are being repeated to Wilgress in London and to Wrong in Washington, and will be brought to Heeney's attention on his return on Wednesday. Ends.

TELEGRAM 433 Ottawa, December 19, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat London No. 1971 (Important); Washington EX-2593 (Important).
Following for the Minister from Reid, Begins: My immediately preceding telegram. Following is the text of the draft memorandum for Cabinet on the danger of war.

MEMORANDUM BEGINS: The present negotiations looking toward a cease-fire in Korea, important though they are, must not be allowed to obscure the extreme danger in which the free world now stands and in which it will continue to stand until it has greatly increased its forces in being. The danger will be particularly acute throughout 1951 and, indeed, until the North Atlantic medium term plan has been fulfilled.

2. By its support of the Chinese intervention in Korea, the Soviet Union has shown that it is willing to run the risk of a third world war. In such a war the Soviet Union would have initially and probably over the next two years, a preponderance of force in the conventional methods of warfare and in all likelihood would not be without a considerable stockpile of atomic weapons. In addition, the events of the last few weeks have sharply revealed the danger that, even if a third world war can be avoided for the time being, the forces of Communism throughout the world may be able to seize so many additional areas in Asia and Europe that the position of North America would eventually become desperate.

3. Nor should the danger be obscured by the differences which still separate the policies of Canada and the United States, even after the visit of Mr. Attlee to Washington. We have urged that, if possible, there should be negotiations with Communist China in order to explore the possibility of a settlement. The United States, on the other hand, has been reluctant to agree to such negotiations because it is doubtful whether the Chinese Communists will negotiate on anything but their own terms. We have been willing to see the Chinese Communists admitted to the United Nations in order to facilitate the task of negotiations. The United States, which has borne the heaviest burden of the United Nations action in Korea, has not been ready to accept into the United Nations a Government which has attacked United Nations troops. We have urged that the status of Formosa should be included among the subjects to be discussed with Peking because we believe that all Chinese, of whatever party they may be, regard Formosa as an integral part of China. The United States has insisted that the possession of Formosa is essential to the strategic dispositions they would have to make in the case of war with China. And beyond these present differences lie a number of occasions in the past five months when our views have varied from those of the United States Administration and when we have counselled that great caution should be shown in approaching the boundaries of Manchuria and Siberia.

4. Nevertheless, in spite of these differences, there is agreement between Canadian and United States Governments on at least four fundamentals:

(a) The cause of freedom stands now in great peril;

(b) The expansion of Soviet imperialism must be stopped;

(c) The principle of collective resistance to aggression must be maintained;

(d) The main front which must be defended is Western Europe.

5. Our disagreements arise only when it is a question of deciding how these fundamental doctrines should be translated into immediate policy and action, taking into account the present military strength of the Soviet Union and its friends and satellites and the present weakness of the free world.

6. This relative weakness is most striking in Western Europe, which is the area where the initial Soviet attack would probably be made in the event of a general war. According to the best information available, the Soviet Union could at any moment throw 124 divisions into an attack across the Northern German plain through the Low Countries and France to the Atlantic. To oppose these forces, the countries associated in the North Atlantic Treaty now have only 30 divisions in Europe. Moreover there are only 4 additional divisions in North America. The disparity between Soviet air power and that of the North Atlantic Treaty countries is equally disturbing. For an attack on Western Europe, the Soviet Union could call on 7,900 planes. The North Atlantic Treaty countries, on the other hand, have only 3,500 planes at their disposal. The West is, of course, still superior in atomic weapons, and apparently in the rate of their production; but even this superiority is by now probably not nearly so overwhelming as it was only a year ago since the Soviet Union may now have a considerable stockpile of atomic bombs. Western Europe, therefore, is wide open to Soviet attack whenever the Soviet Union is prepared to run the risk of atomic bombardment of its cities and industries. It is estimated that under present conditions the Red Army could occupy Western Europe up to the Pyrenees within three months.

7. These facts are widely known, at least in outline, to the people of Western Europe and have created great anxiety. If the countries of the free world were to suffer further reverses, there is a risk that governments might be found in Western Europe willing to enter into deals with the Soviet Union. In this way Western Europe could be conquered by a creeping, rather than a blitzkrieg, campaign. The result, however, would be equally disastrous. Within a year the Soviet Union might well be in firm control of new satellite governments and also in full possession of the undamaged productive capacity of Western Europe.

8. The present military weakness of Western Europe is one of the basic reasons why we have contended that all possible steps should be taken to avoid becoming embroiled in a war with Communist China. In such a war, a decision would be almost impossible to secure. Even the atomic bomb would probably not be decisive since suitable targets are few, life is cheap and manpower virtually inexhaustible.

Meanwhile, every day that such a war lasted it would be bleeding white the inadequate resources in the West of trained manpower and military equipment.

9. Assuming that a major war with China can be avoided, it must, however, be recognized that the defeat which the United Nations have suffered in Korea makes more likely Communist attacks on other parts of Asia, the Middle East and Eastern Europe. A full-scale attack on Indo-China, in particular, must be regarded as an early possibility; and if Indo-China were lost the whole of South-East Asia, including Burma, Malaya and Indonesia with their important natural resources of rubber and tin, might well fall under Communist control. In those circumstances the position of India and Pakistan would be highly precarious, especially if a start had not been made with outside financial assistance in the process of economic development, which would have the effect of partially immunizing the poor and underfed masses of the sub-continent against the appeals of Communist propaganda.

10. Persia and the Middle East are also highly vulnerable. The Governments of Middle Eastern countries and the rivalries between them are such that there is little ground for hoping that, with the exception of Turkey, they would offer much effective opposition to armed aggression. Moreover, at the present time the Soviet Union is believed to have deployed facing the Middle Eastern area no fewer than 3,400 aircraft (in addition to the 7,900 aircraft mentioned above as being available for an attack on Western Europe). It is estimated that under present conditions the Soviet Union could occupy the whole of the Middle East within six months.

11. Another country immediately threatened is Yugoslavia. Marshal Tito's Government is facing acute economic difficulties partly as a result of the serious drought and partly as the result of the economic blockade which is being waged against Yugoslavia by the surrounding Cominform states. These difficulties provide a good opportunity for propaganda and infiltration by Cominform agents. In addition, Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria and Albania have between them 32 divisions which could be used for an attack on Yugoslavia without committing any Soviet forces.

12. The dire contingency which has been brought clearly into view by recent Communist successes is a situation in which, either in the course of a general war or as the result of piecemeal attrition, the whole of Asia and Europe would have fallen under Soviet domination with the exception of a few islands and peninsulas such as the United Kingdom and Spain. The position of North America would then be more desperate than it was in 1940.

13. Because of their lack of forces in being, the North Atlantic Treaty countries are obliged to go as far as they honourably can in playing for time. That is one of the purposes of the present negotiation for a cease-fire in Korea. It must not be lost sight of, however, that action by Communist China or by the Soviet Union might at any time precipitate a general war.

14. The future diplomatic tactics of the United States may also be such as to increase the risk of a general war. We have not always agreed with United States tactics in the past and have brought our views forcibly to the attention of United States authorities. It should not be assumed that such mistakes as we believe the United States has made in the past few months account to any significant degree for the present critical situation. The danger arises from the aggressive intentions of the Soviet Union and its allies and satellites. In such a delicate situation, however, any diplomatic ineptitude is costly and might be enough to touch off a general war. We will continue to make our views known in Washington in the hope that we may have some influence, along with other North Atlantic and Commonwealth countries, in urging the United States to avoid any further moves which might be regarded as provocative. It must be realized, however,

(a) that our influence in Washington will be in direct ratio with our willingness to do our full share in strengthening the military power of the free world; and

(b) that in spite of efforts which we and other countries may make, the policy of the United States may be such as to narrow the margin between peace and war.

15. If a general war is forced upon us by the Soviet Union, we will, of course, be committed to full participation alongside the United States and our other allies. For that reason and because of the dangers outlined in this memorandum, it would seem clear that the first responsibility of the Canadian Government, as well as of the governments of other free countries, must be to increase as rapidly as possible our own military strength and that of our allies, while at the same time neglecting no opportunity of reaching an honourable settlement with the Soviet Union and China. If war came, increased military strength would make us better prepared to meet it. If, on the other hand, the Soviet Union is not immediately bent on war, increased military strength in the North Atlantic area, if accompanied by wise and unprovocative diplomacy, alone could provide the deterrent which might prevent war later. In either event, a programme of rapid rearmament would seem to be an indispensable corollary of the diplomatic policy which we are now pursuing. MEMORANDUM ENDS. Message Ends.

Repeat Candel New York No. 99.
Following for Mr. Reid and Mr. Pearson, Begins: Your messages EX-2592 and 2593 reached me just after I had completed a note on the same general subject as your draft memorandum for the Cabinet on the danger of war. My product is briefer and covers less ground than yours, and while it takes the same general line, the emphasis is somewhat different. It was prompted particularly by my impression that it is very important that the Governments which can make a substantial material contribution to defence against the Soviet Union should seek to reach agreement on the urgency to be attached to their effort, and that most, if not all of them are now attaching a lower degree of urgency than the United States. The memorandum reads as follows. Text begins:

1. In North Atlantic planning the period of greatest danger was, until a few months ago, assumed to begin in late 1953 or 1954, and 1954 was the date set for the achievement of the medium-term plan. The reason for selecting this date was that the Soviet Union was unlikely to possess an adequate stock of atomic weapons until then. Thus the basic assumption was that the great United States superiority in atomic weapons and in the means for their delivery would deter the Soviet Union from open warfare so long as it lasted.

2. It may be that the estimate that it would take the Soviet Union about three years longer to build up its atomic armament was a false one, and that the Soviet Union may now, or in the near future, have a large enough stock of bombs to feel confident of their capacity gravely to damage the United States and other western countries. On the other hand, Soviet fears of atomic warfare may have declined, the atomic bomb may not be considered capable of destroying Soviet strength, and they also may have a new confidence in their capacity to intercept strategic bombers carrying atomic weapons; we know that the Soviet authorities have been working energetically on their radar network and other measures of air defence.

3. Whatever the causes, we must now advance our estimate of the period of maximum danger, expand our targets in defence production and military manpower, and increase our capabilities to engage in war, without counting on any period at all in which we shall be free from the imminent possibility of war.

4. The only safe assumption is that the period of greatest danger has already begun. The new defence efforts which have been undertaken by the United States and many other western countries since June have not yet brought about much increase in the defences actually in readiness, and certainly not enough increase to compensate for the men and equipment tied down in Korea. It will not be before the middle of 1951 that a substantial enlargement of available forces-in-being and equipment will be achieved. By that time the democratic countries should be stronger in the west than they would have been if there had been no Korean war, even if considerable forces are still tied down in the Far East.

5. The Russians may, therefore, have decided that they are now relatively in a better position for war than they will be six months hence or thereafter. Furthermore, the behaviour of the Russians towards the plans to include German forces in the defences of Western Europe supports the view that they may be manufacturing a casus belli which would have considerable popular appeal among the satellites, and which they could use or refrain from using at their discretion.

6. War is, of course, not inevitable. The greatest deterrent is still for the western countries to meet the threat by employing their great economic superiority and their resources of skilled manpower in such a way that the prospect is slender of eventual victory over them. This has been their purpose, at any rate since the North Atlantic Treaty came into effect, but the accomplishments have not matched the surge of increased danger.

7. The sense of acute urgency is greater in the United States than in the other North Atlantic countries. If they and their stout-hearted associates, such as Turkey and Australia are to get on with the job and avoid unpleasant recrimination between friendly countries, and especially with the United States, agreement is essential by the Governments concerned on the assumptions on which their defence planning is based and on the general grounds on which to appeal to their peoples for greater efforts and sacrifices. NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL AND DEFENCE COMMITTEE MEETINGS, BRUSSELS

59. The Minister of National Defence, reporting on meetings of the North Atlantic Council and Defence Committee held in Brussels on December 18th and 19th, said that the groundwork had been well prepared by the Council Deputies and the Military Committee, and that the meetings were marked by a spirit of harmony and a general desire to reach agreement.

At the suggestion of the United States delegation, the Belgian chairman had put forward a resolution regarding the Integrated Force which the Council adopted. This gave approval to the Defence Committee's proposals for establishment of the Force, the terms of reference for the Supreme Commander and the re-organization of the N.A.T.O. military structure to provide for the Force and the Supreme Commander. The immediate constitution of the Force and the appointment of a Supreme Commander were agreed upon, the U.S. government were asked to designate the Supreme Commander, and member countries were requested to take immediately all practicable steps to have ready, as set forth in the 1954 Defence Plan, their initial contributions to the Force on the request of the Supreme Commander, and to consider means of rapidly completing the necessary additional contributions.

The Canadian delegation had agreed to the portion of the resolution relating to contributions because, in so far as Canada was concerned, force tabulations in the 1954 Plan were subject to ultimate agreement on Canadian requirements for the North American region. This point had been confirmed in a letter of December 19th† to Mr. Spofford, who had asked members to indicate their interpretation of their commitments under the 1954 Plan in the light of the Defence Committee's approval of that Plan at its Washington meeting. Canada was obviously in a position of having to indicate soon what its contribution to the Force would be.

The United States had been expected to introduce a resolution which, inter alia, would ask member countries to report by January 10th, 1951 on the defence efforts they were prepared to make, would propose that the 1954 Defence Plan be implemented by 1952 and that the force requirements in that Plan be increased. They had, however, found that this would not be acceptable to other N.A.T.O. countries and the Belgian resolution had been introduced instead.

On December 18th, the Council had passed a resolution, which he had introduced, recommending to the U.S. President the designation of General Eisenhower as Supreme Allied Commander, Europe. Mr. Truman had communicated his consent on December 19th. The Council had then adopted a resolution appointing General Eisenhower and, in view of the constitutional requirements of some countries, the resolution had been signed by all the Ministers, who had also arranged to provide letters agreeing to the appointment.

Mr. Acheson had announced that the U.S. forces in Europe were being placed under General Eisenhower's command immediately and the French and British had made similar statements.

One accomplishment of the meeting had been the unanimous approval of the recommendations of the Deputies and the Military Committee on German participation in the Integrated Force as a basis for negotiations with the Germans by the three Occupying Powers.

On December 18th, the Defence Committee had agreed to the establishment of the Defence Production Board to replace the Military Production and Supply Board. It should be an improvement on its predecessor, being charged with accelerating production and furthering the use of the industrial capacities of member nations.

The question of raw materials had been raised in connection with the report of the Council Deputies and with reference to the possible establishment of a U.K.-U.S.-French allocation Board in Washington. His proposal for reference of the question to the Deputies for study had been carried.

60. The Prime Minister expressed the hope that there would be close liaison between General Eisenhower and the new Defence Production Board. With a view to obtaining appropriations for contributions to Western Europe, it would be desirable that Western European requirements from Canada be recommended by the Supreme Commander of the Force which was serving as a common deterrent to Soviet aggression. If individual countries were left to recommend their requirements, there could be a repetition of the criticism that had arisen over the Mutual Aid programme. The matter of raw materials was a further field in which the Supreme Commander should be in a position to coordinate efforts.

61. Mr. Claxton said that he thought Canadian contributions could be handled in this manner since the military side of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would, in fact, be recommending requirements for necessary items even though it would be up to the Defence Production Board to suggest which countries had appropriate facilities for production.

Throughout the Brussels meetings, the need for early adoption of the Canadian proposals for simplification of the top structure of N.A.T.O. had been apparent. He had introduced a resolution, adopted by the Council, in which it had affirmed its adherence to the objectives of simplification and requested the Council Deputies and other agencies concerned to study the Canadian and other proposals.

The Council's discussion of the world situation had been opened by Mr. Acheson who had given an appreciation of the gravity of the situation, outlined the extensive additional defence measures being taken by the United States, and urged that all N.A.T.O. countries increase their defence efforts to the utmost. A statement of the Canadian position was made. This indicated that, in the face of increasing threats of aggression, the Canadian government had taken substantial additional steps since June and was giving consideration to further measures; that the main lessons of Korea were that the Communists were prepared to risk a world war and that Europe must have first place in the global strategy of the free nations who should not be drawn into dissipating their resources in the Far East; that the Canadian government believed the N.A.T.O. countries must greatly accelerate their efforts to meet the goal of security, taking political as well as military factors into account; that Canada was prepared to assume its share of the added responsibilities arising from the new situation; that in view of the need for increasing and accelerating the North Atlantic rearmament programme, there would have to be a collective re-examination of the whole programme, not merely of the shares of individual countries, and Canada hoped that the new Defence Production Board would bring about the acceleration in coordination of defence production efforts, which was an essential part of an increased military programme. In this statement, which had been approved by several Ministers, it had proved unnecessary to refer specifically to new Canadian commitments under the 1954 Plan, as the United States had decided not to raise the matter in that form at the time.

The appointment of General Eisenhower could be expected to result in a speed-up of all North Atlantic activities. By summer or early autumn there should be about twenty division in Western Europe. This build-up of forces and the appointment of General Eisenhower should hasten German participation in the Integrated Force.

62. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, from his experience, responsible U.S. officials stated frankly the opinion that Canada was not aware of the seriousness of the situation and was not taking adequate steps to meet it . Many Americans were almost hysterical about the urgency of further defence measures and there was no doubt that there would be increasing U.S. pressure on Canada in this connection. Some Americans, although not the more sober members of the Administration, accepted the inevitability of a war. The Soviet Union and Communist China were probably quite sincere in their fear of U.S. aggression since they had no contact with sober opinion in Washington. In the circumstances, the next six months would be very dangerous.

63. Mr. St-Laurent recalled that, at the last session, he had said that the free nations should be secure if war could be avoided for a year. He agreed that the next six months would be dangerous but thought that the threatening behaviour of the Communist countries might be due to some extent to a desire to keep the rest of the world in a nervous frustrated state of mind.

64. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the Brussels meetings of the North Atlantic Council and Defence Committee, and the suggestion of the Prime Minister that it would be desirable for Western European requirements for equipment and raw materials from Canada to be recommended by the Supreme Commander rather than by individual nations.

Your telegrams No. 1970 and No. 1971 of December 18th reached me on return from Council sessions in Brussels, and Mr. Claxton and Mr. Heeney will have reported fully on the atmosphere and proceedings at these sessions.

2. I fully agree that an appreciation of our present situation and prospects should be made at this time, and I would have little to add from this end to the general lines of the draft memorandum given in your telegram No. 1971. It seems to me to provide a comprehensive and accurate picture, and points to the need for building up, as a matter of the greatest urgency, increased military strength in the North Atlantic area. You will no doubt wish to bring the memorandum up to date in the light of the Brussels discussions. This might be done towards the end of the memorandum and would again highlight the increased danger of war and indicate clearly the need for a more rapid build-up of economic and military strength, in order to deter aggression or to prevent defeat in war. Something along the following lines might be appropriate:

The new defence efforts which the North Atlantic countries undertook to make in August this year have not yet brought about a very large increase in the military strength of the North Atlantic Treaty countries. The greater part of the increases in defence strength has been diverted to Korea and in Western Europe there has been no significant increase in our ability to resist aggression. The action of the North Atlantic Council in appointing a Supreme Commander for Western Europe and the decision to include German forces in the integrated force under the Supreme Commander could be considered as a casus belli by the Soviet bloc. Whether this is so or not, it is possible that the USSR may well believe that the North Atlantic Treaty Powers are determined to build up sufficient forces quickly to deter Soviet Imperialism, and as such it might be tempted to wage war in the near future in order to prevent the free world attaining the position where it could check Soviet Imperialism by the threat of effective force.

Events of the last few months indicate the Soviet Union is willing to run the risk of a third world war, and we must now advance our estimate of the period of maximum danger from the previous planning [figure] of 1953-54 to 1951-52, and the North Atlantic Treaty countries must take immediate action to expand defence production and build up their military forces, particularly in Western Europe.

3. I realize you will be checking with the Chiefs of Staff Committee the military strengths shown in your paper. In addition, I think it might be advisable to ask them to estimate the effective value of the number of formations. I doubt if the 30 divisions mentioned in para 6 of your telegram have anything like the strength of one nationality under the control of a single commander. Of the 30 divisions, some 15 are Italian of questionable morale and fighting quality, and of these some are low establishment divisions and are located far from the North German plain. The one Norwegian and one Danish division are not fully organized, equipped, trained, and are not in a suitable geographic position effectively to intervene in resisting an attack on Western Europe. One and one-third Belgian and one and two-thirds Netherlands divisions are not yet equipped and trained. The present position was probably fairly accurately given by Field Marshal Montgomery in August when he stated that of the 10 divisions available for the defence of Western Europe, only two were fit to fight.

4. On the other aspects in view of the character of your appreciation it may be that in paragraph 3 too great emphasis has been given to the particular position of Canada in considering the differences which separate us from the United States, and that in a general appreciation of this kind, it might be preferable to make it clear that the views attributed to Canada in this paragraph are shared by a great many other countries. As a matter of presentation, perhaps it would be advisable to extract the specific references in the general memorandum referring to the implications for Canadian Government policy, and to include these references in a supplementary memorandum assessing the Canadian position from the point of view of: (1) Our contribution to date to the defence of the North Atlantic area and to maintaining stability in the other critical areas in which we are concerned; and (2) The further steps which Canada should now take to increase the effectiveness of our contribution to North Atlantic security and to participate in concerted measures affecting the stability of the other critical areas referred to in your memorandum. In such a paper, while the emphasis on the need and urgency of re-armament measures should be paramount, due weight should also be given to the importance of economic assistance to the peripheral areas (which is recognized in paragraphs 9 and 11 of the draft memorandum).

5. It might reasonably be questioned whether an increase in the military effort which reduced the economic assistance available to such countries as India, Pakistan and Yugoslavia would be advantageous even from the military point of view. Within limits, the expansion in defence effort should presumably be at the expense of restricted standards of consumption and investment in the western countries themselves. To the extent, however, that rearmament and economic aid to the critical areas are competitive, thought should be given to the most effective balance between the two. The modest Colombo Plan, which was designed for a situation rather les dynamic than the present, may prove insufficient even if it is implemented in full. In any event, it would seem essential from all points of view to get ahead with aid along the lines of that plan. Similarly, the possibility of Canadian aid to Yugoslavia (particularly in the form of bread grains and other basic supplies available from Canada) should be re-examined in the new and more dangerous situation in which we now find ourselves.

6. A point which might well be emphasized in any current consideration of the relative importance of re-armament and economic aid is that no matter how energetically we may exert ourselves, it is going to take time for any increased defence effort to make itself felt. (We note in this connection that para 4 of Washington teletype WA-3315 of December 19th does not anticipate substantial progress in any event before mid-1951). It will take time to convert plants to war production and to mobilize and train manpower for the new tasks. Even if the highest priority is given to re-armament and military aid, there is bound to be an interval during which our resources will be better adapted to the contribution of civilian types of aid. It would seem desirable to take advantage of this transitional period to provide a high proportion of our help to other countries in the form of civilian supplies. Later when a larger part of our economy has been turned over to defence preparations, we may not be in as good a position to make our economic weight felt in such places as Yugoslavia and Asia. While it is probably desirable to concentrate attention at this stage on the need for increased defence preparations, there would seem to be much merit in recognizing that for the immediate future at least a fairly high proportion of our contribution to the strengthening of friendly countries can probably best take the form of economic aid.

7. Although the importance of the "impact" and "capacity" analysis to be undertaken by the Paris Working Group of NATO should not be exaggerated, it would seem desirable, from the point of view of effective timing, to make our plans sufficiently early to avoid giving comfort to those European countries which may be rather inclined to drag their feet in that exercise. If we intend to match our efforts with the needs of the present situation — and with the impressive effort of the United States — it might be well for us to make our intentions clear in our submission to the Paris Working Group. In that way we may be able to provide a useful stimulus to the NATO countries in Europe.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 312-50 Ottawa, December 28, 1950

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

In North Atlantic planning the period of greatest danger was, until a few months ago, assumed to begin in late 1953 or 1954. Now, the only safe assumption is that the period of greatest danger has already begun.

2. By their support of the Chinese intervention in Korea, the Soviet Government have shown that they are willing to run the risk of a third world war. In such a war the Soviet Union would have, initially, and probably over the next two years, a preponderance of land and air forces in the conventional methods of warfare. Also they would probably have a small stockpile of atomic weapons.

3. In addition, the events of the last few weeks have sharply revealed the danger that, even if a third world war can be avoided for the time being, the forces of Soviet imperialism throughout the world may be able to seize so many additional areas in Asia and Europe that the position of North America will eventually become very serious indeed.

4. Although we have differed with the United States on a number of issues on Far Eastern policy, there is agreement between the Canadian and United States Governments that :

(a) peace is now in jeopardy;

(b) the expansion of Soviet imperialism must be opposed;

(c) the principle of collective resistance to aggression must be maintained; and,

(d) the main front which must be defended is Western Europe.

Our disagreements arise only in deciding how our agreement on these basic points should be translated into immediate policy and action, taking into account the present military strength of the Soviet Union and their friends and satellites and the present military weakness of the free world.

5. This relative weakness is the most dangerous in Western Europe. This is where the initial Soviet attack would probably be made in the event of a general war. Europe is open to Soviet attack whenever the U.S.S.R. is prepared to run the risk of atomic bombardment of its cities and industries. It is estimated that under present conditions the Red Army could occupy Western Europe to the Pyrenees within three months.

6. The present military weakness of Western Europe is one of the basic reasons why we have contended that all possible steps should be taken to avoid becoming embroiled in a war with Communist China. In such a war a decision would be almost impossible to secure. Even the atomic bomb would probably not be decisive since suitable targets are few, life is cheap and manpower virtually inexhaustible. Meanwhile, every day such a war lasted would be wasting inadequate Western resources of trained manpower and military equipment.

7. Assuming that a major war with China can be avoided, it must, nevertheless, be recognized that the defeat which the United Nations have suffered in Korea makes more likely Communist attacks on other parts of Asia, the Middle East and Eastern Europe. A full-scale attack on Indo-China, in particular, must be regarded as an early possibility. And, if Indo-China is lost, the whole of South-East Asia, including Burma, Malaya and Indonesia with their important natural resources might well fall under Communist control. The position of India and Pakistan, in these events, would become precarious. This, incidentally, is an aspect of the situation which emphasizes the political importance of outside financial assistance for the economic development of these countries to strengthen their will and capacity to assist in the struggle against Communist imperialism.

8. Persia and the Middle East are also vulnerable. The governments of these countries and the rivalries between them are such that there is little ground for hoping that, with the exception of Turkey, they would offer much effective opposition to armed aggression. Another potential ally of substantial strength which is immediately threatened is Yugoslavia whose power to resist has been seriously weakened by present economic difficulties.

9. In short, recent Communist successes disclose the stark possibility that, either in the course of a general war or as a result of piece-meal attrition, the whole of Asia and Europe, apart from the United Kingdom, Spain and Portugal, might fall rapidly under Soviet domination. The position of North America would then be worse than in 1940. If the Soviet Union were in control of all the productive resources of Europe and Asia, it would have at its disposal steel and oil production comparable to that of North America. Its supplies of raw materials and skilled manpower would be greater and more varied.

10. Because of their lack of forces in being the North Atlantic Treaty countries are obliged to go as far as they can to gain time. That is one of the purposes of the present negotiations for a cease-fire in Korea. It must not be lost sight of, however, that action by Communist China or by the Soviet Union may at any time precipitate a general war.

11. The employment by the Western countries of their present great economic superiority and resources of skilled manpower in such a way that the prospect of eventual victory over them is slender remains the greatest deterrent to war. This has been their purpose especially since the North Atlantic Treaty came into effect. But the danger has increased more rapidly than our combined efforts to meet it.

12. The new defence programmes which the North Atlantic Treaty countries undertook in August of this year have not yet brought about any substantial and immediately effective net increase in their military strength. A substantial part of the defensive strength which has been added has been diverted to Korea.

13. Last week the North Atlantic Council appointed a Supreme Commander for Western Europe and agreed upon a scheme for the establishment of an "integrated force". The representatives of the NATO countries pledged themselves to step up their defence programmes. They also agreed upon proposals for the participation of Western Germany in the joint defence.

14. The gravity of the situation has been recognized in all the North Atlantic Treaty Nations, but none more than in the United States.

On December 16, President Truman adopted the unprecedented course of declaring a national emergency in peacetime. In this he said; "Recent events in Korea and elsewhere constitute a grave threat to the peace of the world ... world conquest by Communist imperialism is the goal of the forces of aggression that have been loosed upon the world ... ... the increasing menace of the forces of Communist aggression requires that the national defence of the United States be strengthened as speedily as possible."

Since the attack on Korea on June 25, the United States has sharply increased its defence appropriations and preparations. Both directly and through NATO the United States has urged the other free nations to adopt similar action. The action taken in other countries has naturally been referred to in Congress and comparisons have been made both there and in the various agencies of NATO between the defence expenditures of various countries.

15. The defence of the West depends on continued and increased participation and assistance by the United States and this will be more likely to be forthcoming if Congress and the American people believe that their effort is being matched by a comparable effort in other countries.

Further, increased fear of Russia will combine with any trend towards isolation on this continent to focus more attention on home defence against direct attack. Only if the home front is felt to be secure will public opinion support the employment of the forces in Europe on the scale necessary to deter aggression.

16. The U.S.S.R. may be tempted to wage war in the near future in order to prevent the free world attaining the position where it could check Soviet imperialism by the threat of effective force. Also the action taken by NATO at Brussels with respect to Western Germany involves some immediate risk of Russian reaction.

17. It seems essential that, in common with other countries of the North Atlantic, we should re-examine our defence programme in the light of these sombre developments. We will all require to press forward at a much accelerated speed if we are to attain the goal of security which is set by the North Atlantic Treaty.

18. The position of the Canadian Government, in the new emergency, was referred to in instructions sent to the Canadian representative at the Brussels meeting and then made the subject of a statement by him. Copies of this statement have been circulated to Ministers.

EXPANSION OF DEFENCE PROGRAMME

1. The Minister of National Defence stated that, in the course of making preparations for Parliament, he had been re-examining the defence programme. In this connection, the Secretary of State for External Affairs had taken the initiative in reviewing the world situation and they had subsequently agreed on a memorandum giving their appreciation of the serious international situation. Unfortunately, time would not permit consideration of this paper prior to the Cabinet meeting that was to follow in the afternoon.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Ministers' memorandum, "The International Situation", December 28, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 312-50).

2. Mr. Claxton indicated that there had been prepared further papers, one of which outlined additional Canadian defence measures that appeared desirable in the light of the increased dangers of the world situation. While this document included views of the Chiefs of Staff, he had prepared it himself and it represented his own views on expansion of the defence programme.

Comparisons of national defence appropriations were being made in North Atlantic Treaty Organization and elsewhere. A table that had been prepared gave a comparison of the current defence expenditures of North Atlantic Treaty countries. Further substantial increases in their defence expenditures could be expected. It was estimated that in the fiscal year ending July 1, 1951 (for which it had appropriated $40 billion), the United States would actually spend $22.5 billion, representing 9.5% of the national income, 47.2% of government expenditures and $148 per capita. Comparable figures for Canada in the year ending March 31, 1951, would be $700 million; 5.7%; 29.6%; and $51.4. During the year ending July 1, 1952, it was expected that the United States would spend some $42 billion. In 1951 its armed forces would be increased from 2.5 to 3.5 millions, with 23 of every 1000 of the population under arms. In Canada, there were 62,000, or 4.5 per 1000 of the population, in the active forces, and 52,000 in the reserve forces. The United States was conscripting 160,000 a month for two years' service and had also placed large reserve forces on active service. Short of adopting a total war economy, it was doing everything possible to deter aggression and prepare against an attack in 1951-52.

Even if fears of an early war were exaggerated, the likelihood of war in the next 18 months was now much greater than estimated six months ago and, as the creation of forces in Europe sufficiently strong to prove an effective deterrent was unlikely within 18 months, there would be increased risks in that period. The greatly expanded U.S. defence measures would make Canada's position increasingly difficult to justify. In the circumstances, the Government's two-fold aim should be to prepare Canada against conditions of total war and to continue to assist in providing deterrent forces in the hope that time remained to make them effective.

To this end, everything possible should be done:

(a) to provide for Canadian defence against likely forms of attack, including the acceptance of North American naval and air force "force tabs" as targets when settled with the United States;

(b) to continue present support of the action in Korea, including the leaving of part of the Special Force at Fort Lewis as reinforcements if necessary;

(c) to contribute assistance under the North Atlantic Treaty, including

(i) assignment to the Integrated Force of a Brigade Group when available from the Special Force, possibly in April; and

(ii) indication to the Supreme Commander that the fighter squadron proceeding to the United Kingdom might be considered as available for the Integrated Force and that others would follow, the number to depend on Canada-U.S. agreement on North American regional requirements; and

(d) to maintain and expand the organization and training establishments and industrial capacity for the speediest development of a total effort.

The foregoing would involve for the fiscal year 1951-52, apart from the authorized programme costing $800-$900 million, implementation of "Programme B" costing some $140 million. It would also involve the following additional measures, not all to be completed in 1951-52, concerning which details had still to be prepared:

Navy: the re-purchase, re-fitting and re-arming of 23 ships (frigates and Bangors); the construction, within the limits of steel, labour and yards, of 11 ships (destroyer escorts and patrol craft);

Army: accelerated conversion to U.S.-type equipment; the manufacture in Canada of U.S.-type armament and ammunition; the adoption of U.S.-type A/A guns, 100 of which might be available shortly, allowing the transfer to NATO of Canadian 3.7's which it might not be possible to modernize; increasing the strength of reserve A/A regiments for which 20,000 men and women would be required;

Air Force: the acceleration of Orenda engine production to the limit of plant capacity and continued exploration of additional engine production capacity; the acceleration of F-86 production to 50 a month; the establishment at existing sites of three schools for training an additional 1,100 NATO (mainly U.K.) aircrew; the preparation of clothing, quarters, etc. for 7,500 women to be recruited from July 1, 1951; the acceleration of the Canada-U.S. radar plan and maritime defences; and,

Defence Research Board: some expansion of research and development facilities and continued planning of the use of scientific and technical manpower.

Present recruiting was adequate for the current authorized programme, except in the case of Air Force ground crew where industry was highly competitive. The manpower implications of the proposed expanded programme were serious but it might be possible to meet the stated requirements — except those of the A/A regiments — if the recruitment rate of the past six months were maintained and some women were enlisted. The holding of men after completion of their terms of engagement would have to be considered.

To increase the effectiveness of the reserve forces, it appeared desirable to extend the training period to 30 days a year, with extra time for certain categories; to pay bonuses for completion of training and re-engagement; and to exempt pay and allowances from income tax.

Additional non-military measures were also required, including the acceleration of preparations for industrial production for Canadian and NATO use; the study of measures to be taken at various stages to meet manpower requirements; increased preparations for civil defence; and measures to prevent sabotage.

It would be helpful to have from Cabinet Defence Committee, and later that day from Cabinet, a general indiction of their views on these proposals for an expanded programme. Detailed estimates would then be prepared for their consideration.

Explanatory memoranda were circulated.

(JIB memorandum, "The Defence Expenditures of the NATO countries for 1950" and attached table, Dec. 28, 1950; Minister's memoranda, "Comparison of U.S. and other Defence Appropriations" and "Expansion of Defence Programme", Dec. 27, 1950; and "Summary Estimates: 1950-53" with attached table, "Summary of Service Requirements 1951-52", Nov. 29, 1950).†

3. Mr. Claxton said, with reference to the proposed assignment of a Brigade Group to the Integrated Force, that the Chief of Staff, U.S. Army, had stated that the Americans did not want to send any further U.S. forces to Korea if it could be avoided and that it seemed probable that they would not want additional Canadian troops in Korea apart from any necessary reinforcements for the Second Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. The press had not understood that the elements of the advance party now returning from Korea were merely personnel belonging to units of the Special Force which had not proceeded to Korea.

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs hoped that it was not intended to take an immediate, firm decision, that no further Canadian army units would proceed to Korea. The question of whether more Canadian troops were required there seemed to be a matter for United Nations rather than United States decision. The State Department had said that, while it was not intended to send additional U.S. troops, it was desired to have as many contingents as possible from other countries in order to emphasize the U.N. character of the action in Korea.

5. The Prime Minister said that the matter depended partly on the question of accommodation at bases in Korea, where the United States was providing facilities for the Canadian troops. Available accommodation was quite limited.

6. Mr. Claxton suggested that the Special Force would, of course, remain available for despatch to Korea if that course appeared desirable when it was ready. Parliamentary authority would have to be sought for the despatch to Europe of a Brigade Group and Fighter squadrons.

7. The Chief of the General Staff stated that, for planning purposes, he would welcome an expression of views on arrangements for tours of duty for such Canadian units as might be assigned to the Integrated Force. The United States considered that the separation of troops from their families for long periods was prejudicial to family relations. Additional forces had to be available at home as replacements if men were rotated to Europe without families. As a result, the United States was contemplating the provision of married quarters for its troops in Germany. On balance, he was inclined to recommend the rotation of Canadian troops to the Integrated Force, without families, for 18-month periods.

8. Mr. Claxton said that at present it would not be possible to consider establishing families of Canadian troops in Europe. There would be an evacuation problem in any emergency if Canadian families were moved to Europe. It would be necessary to have the troops rotated to Europe for 18-month or shorter periods.

9. Mr. St-Laurent suggested that an arrangement for rotation of troops be accepted as an experiment. It could be modified, if necessary, in the light of experience.

10. Mr. Claxton said that the proposed implementation of Programme "B" would involve making a start on measures which would have to be carried out in the long run in any case. To a large extent the suggested expanded programme entailed the removal of numerical limits from production so that the development of the armed forces could be undertaken as rapidly as equipment could be made available.

11. As regards the proposed additional naval construction, authorizations should be in step with production capabilities. It was encouraging that the U.S. Navy was much impressed with the potentialities of the new destroyer-escort design and was considering obtaining three destroyer-escorts for test purposes. This might possibly lead to further U.S. orders for this type of ship.

12. General Foulkes considered it important to reach a decision on the proposal to purchase one hundred 90 mm. A/A guns from the United States. These could be made available on very favourable terms. Their purchase would, moreover, justify Canadian manufacture of U.S.-type ammunition, permitting standardization in this field in North America. Canadian 3.7" A/A guns could be offered to other NATO countries, who were most anxious to have them, as they were replaced by 90 mm. guns. A long period would elapse before completion of developmental work on the use of the 3.7" gun in conjunction with the U.S. T-33 gun-laying radar and, in the meantime, it would not even be known whether they could be used together satisfactorily. Conversion of the 3.7's might be more expensive than purchase of the 90 mm. guns. In any event, it was unlikely that the cost of purchasing one hundred 90 mm. guns would be much, if any, higher than the cost of converting that number of 3.7's. Purchase of the U.S. guns would mean possession of efficient guns by early 1952.

13. Mr. St-Laurent said that purchase of the U.S. guns could also effect a saving in manpower.

14. The Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Finance were of the opinion that the proposed purchase of one hundred 90 mm. guns would be a sensible transaction.

15. Mr. Claxton said that there was a very serious world-wide shortage of jet engines. Acceleration of Orenda production would not entail sizeable additional expenditures in the near future as developmental difficulties stood in the way of early production of an appreciable number of engines.

16. Mr. Howe said that the plant capacity of AVRO would be 100 Orenda engines a month.

17. The Chief of the Air Staff thought that it might take 18 to 24 months to reach that level of output. Also, if additional orders for CF 100's were placed now, production of this aircraft (complete with Orenda engines) could probably not be raised to 25 a month before the autumn of 1952.

18. Mr. Claxton explained that the proposed acceleration of F-86 production to a rate of 50 a month would represent a substantial increase in the presently-planned rate of production. It was proposed partly because other NATO countries required this aircraft as the only available fighter that could deal with the Soviet MIG-15. The United Kingdom was anxious to obtain 392 F-86's. This, he thought, should be done with the United States making available, at no cost to Canada, the necessary government-furnished property, including engines, provided NATO recommended such allocation of Canadian aircraft. The proposal was that provision of these aircraft be charged against the $300 million vote provided under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950.

19. Mr. Howe said that it was clear that Canadair had the means to produce F-86's at an increased rate and that it appeared sensible to put these facilities to work.

20. Air Marshal Curtis said that the R.A.F. had been asked to look into the question of aircraft required for the schools proposed for training additional NATO aircrew. Dual jet-type training aircraft, such as Vampires or T.F.-80's were the principal requirement of this project which Canada could not meet. The United Kingdom would have to provide these or obtain them under the U.S. mutual aid programme. Canada still had some reserves of Harvard aircraft. No Harvards had been sold from reserve holdings for three years. As Canada had the necessary jigs for this aircraft, resumption of its production would be relatively simple. The setting up of a production line could probably be accomplished in less than one year. The United States had decided to use for its basic training a type of aircraft that was essentially a Harvard with a number of refinements.

21. Mr. Howe suggested that, if it were decided to set up a production line, it would be desirable to produce an up-to-date Harvard in view of the possibility of the United States placing orders in Canada for this aircraft.

22. Air Marshal Curtis said that approval in principle of the proposed additional air training programme for NATO countries would be helpful as it would take about six months to prepare the schools and it was desired to have the courses begin in August.

23. Mr. Claxton explained that the enquiry as to the possibility of training more aircrew had come from the United Kingdom. If it were decided to increase training further, it was proposed that NATO recommend the allocation of vacancies at the training schools.

24. Mr. Abbott thought that this training programme could be charged against the $300 million vote — or a new vote, as the $300 million vote was now almost fully committed — if the programme were recommended by NATO.

25. Mr. Claxton said that the manpower required for the air training project could not be found through recruitment of men. Further, the R.C.A.F. felt that a start should be made on the training of women in order to free for other duties men presently serving as clerks and communications and radar operators.

26. Air Marshal Curtis explained that women were temperamentally suited to a number of R.C.A.F. tasks.

27. Mr. Claxton said that it would be possible to begin recruiting women some six months after it was decided that they should be recruited. The intervening period would be needed to make up clothing and prepare quarters. Cabinet had already authorized the purchase of clothing for women's uniforms, which had since been ordered, on the understanding that he would again raise the question when the need seemed urgent.

28. Canada was building nine new aircraft control and warning stations which had increased range and could handle several interceptions simultaneously. The proposed acceleration of the Canada-U.S. radar plan was still under discussion with the Americans who were being asked to consider assuming the major share of the expense of various stations that might be required in Canada, in view of their importance to the United States.

29. Mr. Abbott thought that the proposed exemption from income tax of the pay and allowances of the reserve forces would present difficulties.

30. Mr. Claxton said that, in proposing a study of means to be taken to meet manpower requirements, including possible preparation for registration for various purposes, he hoped that a small interdepartmental group might be set up to investigate the possibility of applying the forthcoming census to the problem or dealing with this by other means.

31. Mr. Howe thought that arrangements could be made to advance the date of the census so that it would begin in the spring.

32. Mr. St-Laurent enquired whether the re-organization of the top structure of NATO was proceeding as fast as possible. He understood that steps were being taken to organize the Defence Production Board so that it could get down to work quickly.

33. Mr. Claxton said that these matters were being dealt with as rapidly as possible.

34. Mr. St-Laurent said that it was easier, in the case of Canada, to implement measures that were part of an overall NATO plan than to carry out measures merely requested by individual NATO countries. The top NATO defence and supply organizations should recommend any proposed allocations of Canadian production to Western Europe, and all Canadian contributions to NATO should be represented in their true light as going into a common pool benefiting all NATO countries.

35. General Foulkes said that it was now standard practice in Ottawa to suggest allocations to NATO countries subject to appropriate recommendations from the top NATO bodies.

36. Mr. Claxton said, on the question of how far his proposals for an expanded defence programme would go towards meeting the Canadian portion of the NATO

Medium Term Plans, that the expanded programme would enable the Canadian forces to meet the present plans. The Army would be able to meet the plans fully at once, subject only to A/A defence which was purely a Canadian problem. The Navy would be able to meet about 75% of what was expected of it by D-Day, and 100% less than six months later which would be in accord with the plans. The Air Force would be able to meet its requirements, as regards aircraft and men, for the Integrated Force. Also, it would be complete at home, 10 of the 19 squadrons called for being auxiliary squadrons.

37. The Chief of the General Staff said that to satisfy the medium term "force tabs" for the Integrated Force would involve Canadian acceptance as a commitment of eleven squadrons, requiring 203 aircraft, which had not yet been authorized.

38. Mr. Pearson pointed out that this would involve doing what NATO had asked of Canada.

39. Mr. Claxton said that the Medium Term Plans expressed requirements as of July, 1954. At the recent North Atlantic Treaty Council meetings in Brussels, however, a resolution had been adopted requesting Governments to give urgent consideration to means of rapidly effecting completion of their contributions to the Integrated Force. This would be feasible in the case of Canadian ground troops but would be difficult in the case of Canadian air squadrons. Under the resolution countries were also asked to indicate what additional contributions they could make.

40. General Foulkes said that Canada, like the other NATO countries, had been asked to indicate by January 10th the force commitments in the Medium Term Plans for the Integrated Force and the North Atlantic Ocean region that it was prepared to accept.

41. Mr. St-Laurent enquired, in view of the appointment of a Supreme Commander in Europe, about the relationship to one another of General Eisenhower, the Standing Group and the Defence Production Board.

42. General Foulkes said that the Standing Group was still the highest NATO military authority and was responsible for giving directives to General Eisenhower, who was in the position of a theatre commander. The Defence Production Board was, on the production side, parallel to the Standing Group. On requirements for supplies in Western European countries, the Standing Group would consult General Eisenhower before making its views known to the Defence Production Board. The latter would then examine production possibilities in the NATO countries.

43. Mr. St-Laurent enquired whether the Standing Group undertook to represent the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

44. Mr. Claxton said that the Standing Group was intended to represent and act for all twelve countries but in fact its members represented and acted for the three governments. At Brussels it had been agreed to set up a Committee of Military representatives which would meet regularly with the Standing Group. The Chairman of the Standing Group would also be Chairman of the Military Representatives Committee. This arrangement was better in that Canada would now have regular consultations with the Standing Group.

45. Mr. St-Laurent said that it was important that the Standing Group have, in effect, a commission from all the NATO governments. It was not desirable that the United States, the United Kingdom and France be charged with the responsibility for administration and that Canada be a mere outside helper. Directives to General Eisenhower from the Standing Group should represent the desires of all the NATO nations.

46. Mr. Claxton said that he hoped that it would be possible to indicate by January 10th, or very shortly thereafter, what forces Canada was prepared to make available to the Integrated Force. By so doing, Canada would be undertaking to do its share of the joint effort and would be in step with the other NATO countries. It was a question of sending a Brigade Group as soon as available from the Special Force, and one or two squadrons in the near future, with an indication that other squadrons would follow. Such commitments would be subject to Parliamentary authority.

46. Mr. Abbott considered that there was no harm in agreeing to the Army commitment which was expected by the public.

48. Mr. Pearson agreed with this view, but pointed out that to say now that Canada would contribute a squadron, with an indication that others would follow, was more complex in its implications.

49. Mr. St-Laurent said that Canadian contributions to the Integrated Force should be represented as resulting from decisions of a group in which Canada participated. Canada had already committed itself in principle as a partner in the build-up of NATO. Decisions on the volume of contributions of particular types would depend on what appeared most effective at any given time. There were various ways in which $900 million could be spent. It appeared at this time that a contribution of some forces to defences in Europe would be most effective and the Government could so recommend to Parliament.

50. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) agreed in principle that, if the remainder of the Canadian Army Special Force were not required in Korea, a Brigade Group should, subject to Parliamentary authority, be made available to General Eisenhower for the NATO Integrated Force;

(b) agreed in principle that one R.C.A.F. fighter squadron should, subject to Parliamentary authority, be made available to the Integrated Force (subject, however, to the arrangements worked out with the United Kingdom), with an indication that further squadrons would follow, the number to be dependent on a decision regarding North American regional requirements;

(c) agreed that any Canadian Service units made available to the Integrated Force should be assigned to that Force on a rotational basis, without families, for 18-month or shorter periods; this arrangement to be considered experimental and subject to modification, if necessary, in the light of experience;

(d) agreed to the purchase of 100 U.S. 90 mm. A/A guns to be charged against the $300 million provided under the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950;

(e) agreed that, if the 100 U.S. A/A guns could be purchased, an equivalent number of 3.7" A/A guns be offered to NATO;

(f) agreed to steps being taken to accelerate Orenda production to the limit of physical capacity of plant, and also to accelerate F-86 production to a rate of 50 aircraft a month;

(g) agreed that the proposal that 392 F-86's be manufactured for the R.A.F. and financed from the $300 million vote (if NATO recommended such allocation and the United States provided, without cost to Canada, necessary government-furnished property, including engines) should be further explored;

(h) agreed in principle to the establishment at existing sites of three schools for training an additional 1,100 NATO aircrew, subject to NATO recommending the allocation of vacancies at these facilities; this project to be charged to the $300 million vote;

(i) agreed to steps being taken by the R.C.A.F. to stockpile women's clothing;

(j) noted the other proposals of the Minister of National Defence for the expansion of the defence programme and his intention to submit detailed estimates of requirements and costs later;

(k) agreed to report the foregoing conclusions to Cabinet;

(l) noted the suggestions of the Prime Minister regarding procedures for Canadian contributions to NATO and the position of the Standing Group.[90]

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 12, 1950

RE HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT WITH ICAO

On December 1, 1949, the Department sent to ICAO a sixth draft of a proposed Headquarters Agreement between the Government of Canada and that organization. In a letter to you dated April 14, 1950,† Dr. Warner, President of the Council of ICAO, informed you that the Council, after considering the terms of the draft Agreement, proposed further amendments for the government's consideration. The majority of these amendments were of a minor nature and have now been approved by all the departments concerned. You will recall that in his interview with you on June 27 of this year, Dr. Warner made it clear that what ICAO really wanted boiled down to two things:

(a) that representatives of member states and senior officials of the organization be granted the status of diplomatic envoys and,

(b) that the federal government effectively support ICAO in its approach to Quebec to obtain certain privileges and exemptions from that province.

2. This memorandum deals only with Dr. Warner's first problem. I intend to deal with the steps that the Department might take to assist ICAO's negotiations with the Province of Quebec in a later memorandum to you because this matter does not seem as urgent as the need to inform ICAO of the government's views with respect to the recent proposed amendments to the Headquarters Agreement.

3. Dr. Warner has frequently mentioned the importance he attaches to Council members and senior officials of the organization having the status of diplomatic envoys but neither he nor the Council have advanced any valid reasons for such a request. It seems that the matter of prestige alone is the underlying motive. In my view the government's offer of privileges, immunities and facilities, contained in our draft Agreement, is very generous and in fact includes most of the privileges and immunities now enjoyed by foreign diplomats in Canada. Certainly what the government is offering is adequate to safeguard the independent exercise of the functions of ICAO in Canada. I have come to the conclusion that it would not be appropriate at this time for the federal government to grant diplomatic status to representatives of members of an international organization, even though it be a specialized agency of the United Nations. The following are the principal reasons for this conclusion:

(a) International law, at the present time, does not provide for the granting of diplomatic privileges and immunities to representatives of members of international organizations. Some diplomatic privileges and immunities come within provincial jurisdiction, but because they are provided for in international law, the federal government can guarantee them in view of the fact that the provinces recognize themselves to be bound by international law. It is most unlikely that Quebec would co-operate in according exemption from the normal jurisdiction of its authorities and courts, if such exemption was not founded upon international law;

I might explain that the Department of Justice has expressed the opinion that the Governor-in-Council has the authority under the Privileges and Immunities (United Nations) Act to grant diplomatic privileges and immunities to representatives and senior officials of specialized agencies of the United Nations. It is doubtful whether this would be within federal competence and the question could be decided definitely only by our courts. It is most likely that if an unfortunate incident, involving an official of ICAO, occurred in Quebec and diplomatic immunity was pleaded in court, the Province would challenge the validity of our legislation. If the court decided it was ultra vires, it would be an unfortunate precedent;

(b) The United Kingdom does not grant diplomatic privileges and immunities to representatives of members of international organizations including specialized agencies of the United Nations. The United Kingdom Government draws a distinct line between privileges and immunities granted to diplomats and those extended to representatives of members of international organizations. The United Kingdom Government has passed what is known as the International Organizations (Immunities and Privileges) Act, 1950, which itemizes the specific privileges and immunities that may be given to representatives of members and "high officers" of international organizations by order-in-council;

(c) The United States, in practice, does not grant diplomatic privileges and immunities to members of international organizations, as such. Article V, Section 15 (3) and (4) of the Headquarters Agreement between the United States and the United Nations provides for the granting of diplomatic privileges and immunities to:

(1) the principal resident representative of a member if he has the rank of Ambassador or Minister Plenipotentiary, and

(2) other principal resident representatives and their staffs, if a three-party agreement is reached between the Principal Executive Officer of the organization, the United States Government and the government of the member country concerned.

The State Department has informed us that in practice no privileges and immunities under the above mentioned sub-sections have been or will likely be granted because,

(1) in most cases the representative on the specialized agency is his country's Ambassador or Minister to the United States. He is, therefore, already entitled to full diplomatic status, and

(2) in the case of other principal resident representatives and their staffs no three-party agreement has been or will likely be concluded because of the reluctance of the State Department to implement this part of the Agreement;

On the other hand, the granting of privileges and immunities to principal resident representatives of members of specialized agencies and their staff in the United States, is governed by the provisions of "International Organizations Immunities Act" (Public Law 291) under which law "... no person shall, by reason of the provisions of this title be considered as receiving diplomatic status or as receiving any of the privileges incident thereto other than such as are specifically set forth herein". (Section 8 (c)).

(d) According to Oppenheim, Hill[1] and other authorities on international law, the present tendency in the United Nations, contrary to what was done in the League of Nations, is not to make any general grant of diplomatic privileges and immunities, but rather to limit and define the facilities which are necessary for the independent exercise of the functions of international organizations. Article 105 of the Charter of the United Nations and Section 14 of the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations clearly provide that privileges and immunities are accorded to the representatives of members not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves but in order to safeguard the independent exercise of the functions of the organization;

(e) In his letter to you dated June 27, 1950,† the Minister of Transport, referring to the diplomatic privileges and immunities that ICAO was requesting stated: "I do not think that we should alter our position". In other words, Mr. Chevrier felt as I do that these privileges and immunities should not be granted;

(f) Fifty-six countries are members of ICAO. If each country decided to send one or more representatives and diplomatic privileges and immunities were granted to each representative and his family, the total enjoying this status would be greater than the number in the diplomatic corps in Ottawa. Judging from press reaction to incidents involving diplomats in Canada during the last few years, it is doubtful whether public opinion would favour an extension of diplomatic privileges and immunities to such a large group;

[1] Voir/See Lassa Oppenheim, International Law: A Treatise, London and New York: Longmans, Green and Company, 1944 and 1947; Martin Hill, Immunities and Privileges of International Officials: The Experience of the League of Nations, Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1947.

(g) A diplomatic "carte blanche" to representatives on ICAO would likely lead to similar requests by other international organizations in Canada, now and in the future. Moreover, such a precedent might be one which other governments would not appreciate;

(h) If it becomes the universal custom to grant diplomatic privileges and immunities to representatives on international organizations, which are increasing in number, it would tend to detract from the importance and dignity which governments and the public attach to persons who are now entitled to enjoy these privileges and immunities.

4. Before deciding to refuse a general grant of diplomatic privileges and immunities the following factors should be taken into consideration:

(a) Agreements concluded between Switzerland and ILO and WHO provide that the Directors-General of these organizations, as well as officials designated by them and agreed to by the Swiss Government, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities granted to diplomatic envoys in Switzerland. Such privileges are not granted to representatives of member states, as such;

(b) An agreement between France and UNESCO provides that senior officials of that organization shall have the same privileges and immunities as those enjoyed by diplomatic envoys in France. In its agreement with ICAO, France extends these same privileges and immunities to representatives of member states in that organization. A similar provision is contained in an agreement between Peru and ICAO;

(c) It is likely that another proposal will be made at the 1951 session of the Assembly of ICAO to have the organization's headquarters moved from Canada. Some members have indicated informally that they will insist on this. A Headquarters Agreement which is satisfactory to the members will be a strong factor influencing the outcome of such a proposal;

(d) Early in 1947, the Department informed ICAO that the Canadian Government granted, as an interim measure and on a de facto basis, to senior officials of ICAO "the privileges, immunities, exemptions, facilities and courtesies provided by federal law for diplomatic envoys". Such a provision could now be incorporated in the Headquarters Agreement, but it would be a formal admission, at least by implication, on the part of the federal government that its jurisdiction in this field was limited. For obvious reasons I do not think this is desirable.

5. If you agree that full diplomatic privileges and immunities should not be extended at the present time to representatives of ICAO, I have attached for your signature a letter to Dr. Warner† enclosing the government's commentary on the amendments recently proposed by ICAO and our seventh draft Headquarters Agreement which has been approved by the other departments concerned and which the Government would be prepared to sign.

HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT WITH ICAO
NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

You will recall from my memorandum of September 12 that one of the principal problems involved in the negotiations of this agreement is the effective support that the Federal Government might give to ICAO to obtain certain privileges and immunities from the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Booth, the Canadian representative on the Council of ICAO, informed the Department on October 12 by telephone that he was received by the Premier of Quebec on October 3 to discuss informally the problem; he was accompanied by Mr. Wilfrid Bovey of the Quebec Legislative Council. I should emphasize that Mr. Booth went to Quebec on his own behalf and without any instructions from the Department.

Mr. Booth informed us that the interview was satisfactory and that Mr. Duplessis gave his assurance that he will look into the matter personally. It seemed to Mr. Booth that the Premier was not completely aware of the question; in particular, the Premier thought that the Federal Government was not willing to grant any privileges and immunities to ICAO because the Federal Government refused to give it full diplomatic privileges and immunities. Mr. Booth intends to send Mr. Duplessis a comprehensive memorandum on the question, copy of which he will forward to us.†

I suggest, therefore, that we let things take their course without any attempt at an official approach until we receive a letter from Mr. Booth.

President of Council, International Civil Aviation Organization, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

REF. A. 11/2 Montreal, November 24, 1950

Dear Mr. Secretary,

I have the honour to inform you that the Council has examined very carefully the new draft Headquarters Agreement, together with comments which you sent to me on 12 September 1950.†

The Council took note of the explanations contained in your letter and commentary; however, I have been directed to ask you whether it would be possible for the Canadian Government to reconsider the two following points:

1. During the discussions in Council the attention of that body was called to the deletion, in Section 12(d) of the new draft, of the words "and relatives" after the word "spouses". It is true these words do not appear in the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of Specialized Agencies; but the Sixth Commission of the United Nations Assembly (November 1947) recognized and noted in its Report to the Assembly (para. 45) that, having regard to the analogy of the position of the permanent Representatives of Members accredited to the United Nations, who are dealt with in the Headquarters Agreement with United States and not in the general Convention, the status of the Council of ICAO was a matter which should be dealt with under Section 39 of the standard clauses, i.e. within a Headquarters Agreement. The Representatives of States on the Council are, in effect, in permanent residence at the Headquarters and most of them have brought their families to Montreal.

2. The Council also noted the special cases of the President of the Council and the Secretary General. It noted that the General Assembly of the United Nations, in approving, at its Second Session (November 1947), the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of Specialized Agencies, agreed that the Chief Executive of a Specialized Agency (Article 11 of the Convention) should have diplomatic status and that, in the case of ICAO that status extend both to the Secretary General and to the President of the Council (Annex III to the Convention). The Assembly of ICAO, at its Second Session, accepted the provisions of the Convention and approved Annex III thereto. In view of the special position in which these two offices have thus been placed, the Council has directed that I ask that the Canadian Government give further consideration to according diplomatic status in those cases. It may be noted also that Mr. St. Laurent's letter dated 30 April 1947 granted to these offices the same treatment as is given to diplomatic envoys.

Upon the resolution of these two points, I hope we shall be able to proceed to the signature of the Headquarters Agreement.

Sincerely,

EDWARD WARNER

Cher monsieur Rivard,

Vous vous rappelez qu'au mois de mai dernier M. Saint-Laurent discuta avec vous le projet d'un accord entre l'Organisation de l'Aviation civile internationale et le Gouvernement canadien relatif au siège de l'Organisation. À ce temps-là, je comprends que le premier ministre, se référant en particulier à la demande de l'Organisation d'accorder le statut d'envoyé diplomatique aux représentants des états membres et aux fonctionnaires supérieurs, vous a demandé de bien vouloir aborder la question avec le gouvernement de la Province de Québec.

Comme vous le savez, une personne jouissant du statut diplomatique a droit à certains privilèges et immunités dont quelques-uns intéressent votre gouvernement en particulier, tels que l'exemption des taxes provinciales. Avant de donner pareil statut en cet accord, nous désirerions avoir la confirmation que votre gouvernement n'y voit pas d'objections.

Le Président de l'Organisation de l'Aviation civile internationale nous informe que l'Organisation serait satisfaite de voir accorder les privilèges et immunités diplomatiques seulement au Président du Conseil et au Secrétaire général. L'Organisation n'insiste plus pour que le statut diplomatique soit étendu aux représentants des états membres et à tous les fonctionnaires supérieurs.

Le Gouvernement est désireux de conclure cet accord et je suis sûr que vous réalisez les avantages pour la province de Québec d'avoir le siège de cette Organisation à Montréal. Je serais très heureux si vous pouviez me laisser savoir les vues de votre gouvernement sur ce sujet.

Veuillez agréer, cher monsieur Rivard, les assurances de ma haute considération.

Ottawa, December 20, 1950

In confirmation of our telephone conversation of Monday, I wish to advise that Mr. St. Laurent phoned me to say that he had discussed with Mr. Rivard while in Quebec City last weekend the problem of the ICAO Headquarters Agreement. Mr. Rivard undertook to have a word with Mr. Duplessis on the subject of the granting of full diplomatic privileges to the Secretary General and President of ICAO.

Yesterday Mr. Rivard called the Prime Minister to say that Mr. Duplessis was quite prepared to grant such privileges to these two gentlemen. Mr. St. Laurent told me that it would now be in order for us to proceed with signature of the Agreement and to draft the necessary Order-in-Council authorizing diplomatic privileges for the [incumbents] of the two positions in ICAO.

22. Mr. Burbridge. The President of ICAO recently informed the Department that the Organization would probably sign the latest draft Headquarters Agreement if two further amendments were made. One of these amendments included the granting of diplomatic privileges and immunities to the President and the Secretary-General of ICAO. We now have the assurance of the Premier of Quebec that his Government is prepared to co-operate and extend to these two individuals any privileges and immunities that might be within the competence of the provincial government.

23. The Government is now in a position to agree to what is hoped will be the last two amendments, the second of which includes immigration facilities to dependent relatives of representatives of members. The Agreement should be signed and come into force some time early in the new year.[2] (Confidential)

AIR AGREEMENT WITH FRANCE

In 1945 it was indicated informally to the government of France that Canada would be prepared to enter into a bilateral air agreement with France based upon an exchange of third and fourth freedom rights, i.e. limited to carriage of traffic between Canada and France but not including carriage of traffic to and from third countries, with the terminals of operation to be Paris and Montreal.

The French government did not pursue the matter at that time indicating, among other reasons, that it wished fifth freedom rights as well, i.e. the right to carry traffic between Canada and third countries and especially between Montreal and Chicago.

The government of France has now expressed a desire to enter into a bilateral agreement for air service between Montreal and Paris, limited to third and fourth freedom rights, subject to a reservation that the exclusion of fifth freedom rights is without prejudice to any fifth freedom rights which may have been received by France from other countries under other bilateral agreements.

From the point of view only of air service much less justification now exists for a bilateral agreement with France than in 1945. At that time no rights had been granted to foreign airlines between Canada and Europe while at present service is provided not only by T.C.A. but by seven foreign airlines, one British, one Netherlands, one Belgian, one Scandinavian and three U.S. companies. In fact there is more capacity available on the North Atlantic between Canada and Europe than is required by the available traffic and any additional service will to some extent reduce the amount available to all, and particularly to T.C.A. which does the largest single business between Canada and Europe on the north Atlantic. T.C.A. has reported that it is not at present interested in extending service to France and the benefits of any agreement with France would, in these circumstances, be one-sided since only a French line would be operating under the agreement (this is equally true of our agreement with Belgium, the Netherlands and Scandinavia). Under the policy approved by Cabinet on April 6, 1949, in regard to bilateral air agreements no case can be made for an agreement with France in the absence of any intention that T.C.A. should serve Paris.

On the other hand, considering the direction of flow of Canadian traffic it is true that next to the United Kingdom, the largest volume of air movement between Canada and Europe is to and from France. In addition it is assumed that considerations of general external policy vis-à-vis France would have a bearing on the decision to be taken.

The question also arises as to the traffic rights that could be made available. Additional trans-Atlantic air service to Montreal, would represent a serious competitive aspect as far as T.C.A. is concerned. Moreover union with Newfoundland has made it desirable to utilize Gander as the major traffic terminal and over recent months new traffic rights have been granted at Gander rather than Montreal. It is normal practice in the interests of national aviation to designate as major terminal a coastal airport such as Gander rather than one far inland such as Montreal. On this basis the three U.S. operators and the Belgian airline were all held to Gander rather than Montreal, while the Scandinavian line which had previously been granted rights in Montreal was persuaded to shift to Gander. Opening of Montreal to another foreign airline might cause complaints from those governments who have been held to Gander rather than Montreal.

The granting of traffic rights at Gander would solely from the point of view of aviation and protection of T.C.A. be preferable to traffic rights at Montreal. It would probably be possible as well to grant France fifth freedom rights at Gander as well as third and fourth freedom since this has been done in the case of the other carriers operating there (excluding however, Canada-United Kingdom traffic). The granting of fifth freedom rights at Montreal would be undesirable and has been refused already to both the United Kingdom and United States. It is understood however that the French may be interested only in Montreal and it is quite possible that they will not be interested in proceeding with an agreement unless granted third and fourth freedom rights there although they have not been sounded out fully on this score.

Decision is required as to whether negotiations with a view to agreement with France should be initiated and if so what traffic rights Canada would be prepared to grant.[3]

Le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au président des lignes aériennes Trans-Canada

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to President, Trans-Canada Air lines

Ottawa, May 6, 1950

Dear Mr. [G.R.] McGregor,

As you are aware, our Department has been instructed by Cabinet to negotiate a Bilateral Air Agreement with the French Government which would permit direct air services to be operated between Montreal and Paris. We held a meeting yesterday with a group of French representatives which included members of their Embassy staff in Ottawa together with Mr. Lesieur, the General Manager for Air France of the North Atlantic and Caribbean regions.

2. The French Government had previously forwarded to us a draft Bilateral Agreement which they suggested might form a basis for negotiations. I understand the Air Transport Board discussed this draft with you. The authorities here in Ottawa felt the French draft departed substantially from the form of Agreement we normally concluded, and the document appeared to be quite loosely constructed and awkwardly worded. At our meeting yesterday I naturally had to be very discreet in any criticism of the French Agreement based on the latter score. I did suggest that we had some preference for proceeding on the basis of the Canadian standard Bilateral draft. The French representative took away copies of this draft to study it, and I am quite optimistic that they will probably accept it as at least a basis for negotiation.

3. At Mr. Chevrier's suggestion I emphasized one point very strongly in our discussions. Although there was no intention on the part of the Canadian Government to in any way impede these negotiations or delay the final signature of a Bilateral Agreement, Air France should not anticipate that they would be granted immediate permission to operate services to Canada. I explained that it was the Government's intention to designate TCA to operate reciprocal services. In these circumstances I admitted I felt that TCA would make the strongest representations to the Government that both countries should inaugurate their services at approximately the same time. The decision in this respect would of course be taken by the Ministers. I stated that it was my own personal view that the Government would give very sympathetic consideration to any such representations, and that Air France would likely have to delay the commencement of their services until at least the late summer which has been mentioned as the earliest possible date for the commencement of TCA's services to France.

4. Mr. Lesieur was obviously disappointed by this news. However, he did state that up until this time he had refrained from any direct contact with Trans-Canada Air Lines on the question of Canada-France services because he did not wish in any way to prejudice matters which were being discussed at an intergovernmental level. He did inquire if there would be any objection to his approaching TCA with a view to discussing the operational aspects of the commencement of services between Canada and France. I naturally replied that we would have no objection if he wished to do this.

5. In the event that Mr. Lesieur should approach you on this matter I thought it would be useful if you were aware of what was said at our meeting yesterday.

Yours sincerely,
H.O. MORAN

PROPOSED BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT WITH FRANCE

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a memorandum for Cabinet submitting for its approval the French and English texts of a Bilateral Air Agreement with France.

2. This memorandum to Cabinet is a revision of the one submitted to you last week. The revisions are on page 3[4] where it is recommended that signature and implementation of the Agreement should proceed without delay unless the commercial considerations affecting TCA are paramount. When Cabinet directed us to negotiate an agreement with France the predominant considerations were political in that we had already concluded a number of similar agreements with other North Atlantic states. I believe it would defeat the original purpose if, after having signified our intention to give them an agreement, we presented the French with a number of unprecedented delays in either signature or implementation.

PROPOSED BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT WITH FRANCE

At its meeting of March 31, the Cabinet authorized the opening of negotiations with the Government of France for an Air Agreement based on the carriage of traffic between Canada and France, but not including traffic to and from third countries.

2. Negotiations were held recently between the representatives of Canada and France and agreement was reached on a draft of an "Agreement for air services between and beyond the respective territories of the two countries", the English and French texts† of which are forwarded with this memorandum.

3. The proposed agreement provides for the reciprocal exchange of third and fourth freedoms and will permit the direct carriage of traffic between Canada and France. Montreal is named as the terminal in Canada which will be served by the airline designated by the Government of France. The Agreement is based on a standard text and similar agreements have been concluded with several countries since the end of the war.

4. The main problem to be resolved in connection with this Agreement is the date of implementation:

On the one hand, Air France is prepared to commence operations at once and is anxious to do so in order to tap the lucrative summer traffic. Consequently, the French Government is pressing us to have the Agreement approved. As negotiations have now been completed at the official level, obvious political and diplomatic difficulties would arise if approval of the Agreement were postponed.

On the other hand, Trans-Canada Airlines are not prepared to inaugurate a service to France before the Spring of 1951 and are strongly opposed to the authorization of a French airline on this route before they can begin operations. TCA feel that Air France would have a considerable competitive advantage over them by next Spring.

5. If the Agreement is signed now, it will, under the provisions of Article 12, come into force on the date of signature. Signature in the first half of July would probably enable Air France to begin operations in August.

6. If it is decided to delay the implementation of the Agreement, there are two alternative ways of doing so:

1) to postpone signature of the Agreement;

2) to change Article 12 so as to arrange that the Agreement shall come into force at some future date.

Either of these alternatives would represent an unprecedented procedure in our bilateral air negotiations. It would also mean that we were granting less favourable treatment to France than to other West European countries with whom we have bilateral air agreements. Air Transport Board state that they would not be able to withhold or substantially delay the authorization for Air France after the Agreement comes into force. The French negotiators were informed that there would be no undue delay in granting the authorization.

7. The undersigned has the honour to submit the attached Agreement for approval and to recommend that in view of the political and diplomatic considerations involved the Agreement be signed and implemented without delay unless the commercial considerations are paramount.[5]

PROPOSED BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT WITH NORWAY

Discussions have been held recently between representatives of Norway and Canada with a view to concluding an agreement for air services between the respective territories of the two countries. A draft agreement,† as attached to this memorandum, has now been agreed upon in these negotiations subject to the final approval of both Governments.

2. This proposed air agreement provides for the reciprocal exchange of the Third and Fourth Freedoms and will permit the direct carriage of traffic between Canada and the Scandinavian countries. Gander, Newfoundland, is designated as the terminal in Canada which will be served by the airline designated by Norway. This agreement is similar to the agreement which Canada signed with Sweden on June 27, 1947, and with Denmark on December 13, 1949.

BACKGROUND OF DISCUSSION IN CABINET

Following the signature of the Bilateral Air Agreement last June, a number of reports were submitted to Cabinet from time to time concerning the implementation of this Agreement. However, at a meeting of the Cabinet on November 18th,

[6] Approuvé par le cabinet le 17 janvier 1950. L'accord a été signé à Ottawa le 14 février 1950. Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1950, N° 1.

the first reference was made to the possibility of the Air Transport Board taking direct action against Colonial Air Lines. The Prime Minister, Mr. Howe and Mr. Claxton were present at this meeting when Mr. Pearson reported that the United States District Court had voted two to one against the Colonial test case, but that the latter proposed to appeal this decision to the Supreme Court. He suggested that two courses of action were possible: One would involve suspension of the licences granted at Gander, and the other would be to take direct action against Colonial Airlines with respect to their licence granted by the Air Transport Board to operate between Montreal and New York.

2. On November 23rd, with the Prime Minister and Mr. Claxton present, but with Mr. Pearson absent, Mr. Howe as Acting Minister of Transport, reported that the Air Transport Board had asked for direction concerning the advisability of issuing a show-cause order to Colonial Airlines. The Cabinet after consideration decided that there would be no objection to the issuance of a show-cause order by the Air Transport Board should the Board feel it desirable. Accordingly, on November 30th, following the decision in the United States to continue the injunction which prevented the Civil Aeronautics Board from licensing T.C.A., Mr. Howe authorized the Air Transport Board to issue the show-cause order.

3. Following the issuance of this show-cause order, and at the request of the United States Government, discussions were held in Ottawa between representatives of the two governments.

4. At a meeting of the Cabinet on December 21st, at which the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe and Mr. Claxton were present, Mr. Pearson reported on the preliminary results of these discussions. He suggested one solution might be for the Air Transport Board to withhold suspension in return for certain concessions which might be offered by the United States. The Cabinet agreed that the policy in this respect should be decided by the Secretary of State in consultation with the Minister of Transport.

5. Discussions were reconvened with the United States representatives on January 10th in Ottawa. Prior to this on January 5th, Cabinet discussed this again. The Prime Minister, Mr. Howe and Mr. Claxton were all present. When Mr. Chevrier reported further on the results of these civil aviation discussions with the United States representatives, he pointed out at that stage it was hoped that the United States Supreme Court might be able to lift the injunction against the Civil Aeronautics Board. This was the first meeting at which Mr. Chevrier had been present during the past month and a half when this question was discussed in Cabinet. Cabinet noted Mr. Chevrier's report but took no action.

AIR AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES; DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING COLONIAL AIRLINES

6. The Minister of National Defence as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 5th, reported that, after consultation between Canadian and U.S. representatives, it had been agreed that:

(a) the U.S. Government would not designate a U.S. carrier on the direct New York-Toronto route until they were in a position to license a Canadian carrier on the New York-Montreal route;

(b) the U.S. Government would not seek a permit for U.S. carrier on the Edmonton-Grand Falls route until a decision on the Colonial case had been made by the U.S. Supreme Court;

(c) the U.S. Government would make immediate application for a speedy hearing of the Colonial case by the Supreme Court. Such application had already been made and the Chief Justice had agreed that the hearing begin on February 17th.

The above points of agreement had been announced publicly. It had also been agreed, but not announced, that after the Supreme Court hearing (if the Court decision upheld the validity of the Air Agreement), the Civil Aeronautics Board would handle the Trans-Canada Air Lines application with the greatest expedition. If the Agreement was not upheld, the decision would affect a great many other U.S. agreements and would result in an extremely confused situation.

The Air Transport Board had indicated that, in view of developments arising out of the intergovernmental discussions, it would not take action against Colonial Airlines.

So far as the Air Agreement was concerned, it was clear that there was a fundamental difference of interpretation between the United States and the Canadian authorities. Discussions on the interpretation would be necessary but probably would not begin until after the Supreme Court decision.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning discussions with the United States on the Air Agreement, particularly in relation to Colonial Airlines.

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to President, Trans-Canada Airlines

Ottawa, February 6, 1950

Dear Gordon [McGregor],

Last night's press release announcing that Colonial Airlines would drop their court case was no doubt welcome news to you. As a matter of fact this whole affair has gone quite satisfactorily. I know that on your side you were not entirely happy following the inter-Governmental discussions but actually they accomplished a great deal. In the first place they moved ahead the hearing of the Colonial lawsuit to February 17 which represented an advance of anywhere from five months to one year. Secondly, it impressed on Colonial Airlines that the Canadian authorities held extremely strong views about the Company's conduct since the signing of the Bilateral Agreement on June 4, 1949. Thirdly, it enabled us to impress the United States representatives with our case in equity even though we were without a case in law and this will be helpful to us in future similar cases.

My personal opinion is that Colonial Airlines have pulled down their flag only because they recognize that they could not succeed before the United States Supreme Court. They are also aware that their relationship with the Civil Aeronautics Board was becoming more strained each week and that they had lost in Canada whatever good will toward them ever existed. Their objective was obviously to prevent as long as possible the operation of your Company on the Montreal-New York route. If the date of the hearing had not been moved forward I am certain that Colonial Airlines would have reserved this "magnanimous gesture" until shortly before the actual date of the hearing.

However, the real purpose of this letter is to say that Colonial Airlines will undoubtedly seize upon any technicality which may enable them to prevent your operations on the New York-Montreal route. I would suggest, therefore, that if you have not already done so you arrange for your lawyers to examine carefully United States air regulations to ensure that you are complying with them in every regard. In other words, as the date approaches when you will be in a position to fly this route, it would be advisable for TCA to examine its fences and make certain that they are in a state of good repair. No doubt this has already been done but I felt I should mention to you that although Colonial has abandoned its present lawsuit it is my opinion that they will continue to look for bona fide methods of preventing or delaying your Company's operations.

Yours sincerely,
H.O. MORAN

TELEGRAM 131 London, January 21, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following received today from Canadian Delegation, Colombo, Begins: January 17th. Immediate. Secret.

Following from Mr. Pearson for Heeney, Begins: On the economic side the main work of the Colombo Conference has been to try to create a context in which it might be possible to solve the problem of the sterling balances.

2. The meetings of officials disclosed strong resentment on the part of the Indians and Pakistanis that this problem was being discussed behind their backs in the continuing tripartite conversations in Washington. These feelings were so strong that they explain in large measure the hesitancy the British have shown in Washington to do more than present factual material. Until they had removed some of the sting of the resentments felt in India and Pakistan, they clearly thought that it would be unsafe for them to proceed much further in discussing this subject with the Americans and ourselves. Considerable progress was made in this regard at Colombo. The Indians and Pakistanis will continue to be suspicious of the tripartite conversations, but at least some of the nettles in their mind have been plucked out by Wilson Smith's tactful handling of a very prickly subject.

3. In the Foreign Ministers' meetings Bevin was able to pick up and turn to account suggestions made by Spender of Australia and (in a somewhat different form) by [Jayawardene] of Ceylon at an early stage in the Conference that the Commonwealth should extend economic assistance to the under-developed countries of South and South-East Asia. Although the British did not arrive with any settled tactical intentions, they hoped that in the course of the Conference action could be initiated which would make it easier for the United States later to participate in some kind of economic assistance plan for Asia. This would have the result not only of strengthening the economies of the recipient countries and so of helping them to combat the spread of Communism, but also of supplying the sterling area as a whole with a flow of dollars which might be expected to continue after the end of the European Recovery Programme. It would also provide a framework in which attempts to scale down the sterling accumulations, or at least severely restrict drawings on them, would have a greater chance of success.

4. My immediately following telegram contains the text of the Conference recommendations on this subject. Since it may be difficult to gather from this rather general document what action is contemplated, it may be useful to describe briefly the various stages by which it is intended that the circle of economic co-operation centered on South and South-East Asia may be progressively widened.

5. As a first step the Australian Government would extend invitations to all other Commonwealth Governments to participate in the new Consultative Committee, the establishment of which has been recommended in the Conference resolution. Although we, like other Commonwealth Governments, would receive an invitation, it would cause no surprise to any of the Governments more directly concerned if we were to decline on the grounds that we have heavy commitments in other areas. My provisional view is that our proper course would be to suggest that we be represented on the Consultative Committee by an observer. The United Kingdom would almost certainly accept an invitation at this first stage. But Bevin made it clear in the Conference that the financial assistance which the United Kingdom could contribute would be severely limited because of the substantial financial contributions which it has made, and is currently making, in this area.

6. In the first instance, then, the Consultative Committee would be a purely Commonwealth body. It would include Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and the United Kingdom. This nuclear group of countries would hold its first meeting in Canberra and would examine the possibilities of self-help and mutual aid. As the next step invitations would be issued to other countries in the area, i.e. Burma, Malaya, India, Indonesia, Indo-China, and Thailand.

7. When such an expanded Committee had become a reality, the hope is that the United States would agree to collaborate and to underwrite the initiative with new financial aid. If this hope were fulfilled and United States dollars were granted in some form to India, for example, it should be possible to curtail much more rigorously India's drawings on its accumulated balances, even if the Indian Government still could not be induced to agree to partial cancellation.

8. The manoeuvre which is developing is still vague and shadowy, as you will see; and there are many possible contingencies which could falsify the cautious hopes which are entertained for it here. But it is a promising move, I think, and deserves at least our sympathy. Ends.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following received today from the Canadian Delegation Colombo, Begins: January 17th.
Following from Mr. Pearson for Heeney, Begins: Following is the text of the resolution referred to in my immediately preceding telegram, Begins:

A. The Conference of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers recommends that the participating Governments should:

(I) Examine the possibility of making financial assistance available for essential productive purposes in South and South East Asia, taking into account their existing commitments.

(II) Support as high a priority as possible for projects presented to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development which would contribute to the economic well being of the area and would be in accordance with the Bank's objectives.

(III) Contribute to the technical assistance work of the United Nations and its specialized agencies, and to support in these organizations as high a priority as possible for the needs of South and South East Asia.

(IV) Examine the possibility of making supplementary bilateral arrangements in appropriate cases for the provision of direct technical and other assistance.

(V) Generally, consider proposals for the economic development of the area, keeping in view the possibilities of mutual assistance.

B. With a view to the implementation of these recommendations the Conference further recommends the establishment of a Consultative Committee, membership of which will be open to all Commonwealth Governments which wish to participate, with the following terms of reference:

(1) To receive from Governments an indication of the action which they consider it feasible to take in response to the recommendations in Section A.

(2) To approach the Governments of countries outside the Commonwealth interested in the area with a view to enlisting their collaboration;

(3) To examine the methods of co-ordinating development activities in South and South East Asia, in association with international and regional organizations concerned with the object of raising the level of production and the standard of living in the area.

(4) To examine the desirability of promoting international commodity agreements for basic products, which would benefit the area and could be recommended for consideration under the Havana Charter;

(5) To consider whether the economic development of under-developed countries of the area would be assisted by the drawing up of a co-ordinated plan of development and by the establishment of special machinery;

(6) To make recommendations to Governments.

C. If these recommendations are accepted the Australian Government would be pleased to accept the responsibility of convening the first meeting of the Consultative Committee in Australia. Ends.

Following received today from the Canadian delegation, Colombo, Begins: January 17th. Secret.
Following from Pearson for Heeney, Begins: The following are some preliminary impressions of the Colombo meeting. The delegation will of course be submitting a comprehensive written report† on its return to Ottawa and I shall make a report† to Cabinet on my return. This telegram should be read along with my accompanying telegram on the economic side of the discussions and the supplementary telegram on the proposed loan of seven and a half million pounds to Burma.

2. On the whole I would characterize the Conference as a success. In general it accomplished what I had considered to be its main objective — providing the non-Asian members of the Commonwealth with an opportunity to gain a better understanding of the points of view of the Asian members on some of the main questions of foreign policy, especially those relating to South-East Asia.

3. The discussions were conducted in conversational and friendly tones. There were no displays of anger or even of bad feeling. For the most part nothing was said at the meetings which could not have been said in public and, of course, none of the controversial intra-Commonwealth questions were touched upon in the formal meetings — such questions as Kashmir, the economic dispute between India and Pakistan, the treatment of Indians in South Africa or defence questions.

4. The two leading participants in the discussions were Bevin and Nehru. Bevin was extremely tired and unwell at the beginning of the Conference but his health and spirits seemed to improve as the week went on. I would think, however, that it is very improbable that he will continue long as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs even if the Labour Government should be returned. He is really a pretty sick man.

5. Nehru spoke with studied moderation at all the meetings and demonstrated that he is a master of the traditional diplomatic language of understatement. When he differed with the United Kingdom policy as over the proposed recognition of the Bao Dai regime in Indo-China, he expressed his differences of opinion firmly but politely.

6. The discussion of the various items on the agenda was uneven, partly because some of the items were expressed very vaguely, including such items as "the general international situation" and "Europe", and partly because the Prime Minister of Ceylon, though a genial and popular Chairman, was inexperienced and not very effective in guiding discussion.

7. There was a good discussion about the recognition of China. Australia and New Zealand were disturbed because the United Kingdom granted recognition a day or two before the meeting. The United Kingdom did not make a good case for recognizing immediately before the meeting. It did, however, demonstrate that there had been adequate consultation and I took the opportunity to make clear that not only did we believe there had been adequate consultation but that every Commonwealth Government had complete freedom of action to act as it considered best in any matter of foreign policy. I was myself greatly impressed by the arguments put forward by both the United Kingdom and India for recognition of the Communist Government of China and I am sending a separate telegram on this question.[1] Mr. Nehru advocated with support from Mr. Bevin that recognition should be followed by adoption of a cautious but not unfriendly policy which would have the best chance of encouraging the new Government to pursue a policy independent of the Soviet Union.

8. The discussion of Indo-China was a disappointment for the United Kingdom. They had apparently given France to understand that they would shortly give de facto recognition to the regime of Bao Dai. Though the United Kingdom case was given by Bevin and backed by Malcolm MacDonald, it did not seem to make any converts among the Asian states to whom the remarks were principally addressed. Nehru, perhaps partly because of irritation with France over Pondicherry and partly because he is not satisfied that France is willing to give real self-Government to Indo-China, was firmly opposed to any kind of recognition of the Bao Dai regime in the Asian states. When asked by us at one meeting what advice he would give the French he said that he would be inclined to urge them to try to bring about a rapprochement between Bao Dai and Ho Chi Minh on the basis of arranging for free elections with a view to the appointment of a Constituent Assembly which might devise means of establishing a new single Government. (I have learned today that United Kingdom will probably give de facto recognition to the Bao Dai regime in about a week's time.)

9. The discussion on the Japanese Peace Treaty revealed a wide divergence of views between Australia and New Zealand on the one hand and the Asian members of the Commonwealth on the other. Australia and New Zealand spoke again of the bitterness their people felt towards Japan and of their concern that Japan should not again threaten their security. The Asian representatives emphasized that an intelligent, hardworking and proud people such as the Japanese could not for long be kept under the domination of other Powers; in this they were in general supported by the representatives of South Africa, the United Kingdom and by myself. It was agreed to recommend that a working group of officials of Commonwealth countries should meet to study the details of the Japanese peace settlement.[2] No definite decision was made on where the meeting should take place but it is probable that most Commonwealth countries will be in favour of a meeting in London under the direction of the High Commissioners there.

10. In addition to discussion for the loan to Burma there was some discussion of the complex political situation there with general agreement that some means should be found to secure an agreement between the Government and the Karens.

11. An interesting point brought out in the meetings was that Pakistan more than India and Ceylon has a two-front foreign policy which is as interested in the political and economic problems of the Middle East as in South East Asia.

12. As the official communiqué states,[3] the greater part of the time of the meeting was given to a review of problems of South East Asia and South Asia (India, Pakistan and Ceylon). In my accompanying telegram on the economic side of the discussions I deal with the recommendation on this subject. The establishment of the proposed Consultative Committee is, of course, merely a first step but if this first step is followed by other necessary steps in the right direction, a great deal may be done not only to solve the problem of the sterling balances but also to shore up our defences in this area against the tide of Soviet expansionism. There is danger, of course, that too great hopes may be aroused by the Colombo meeting's recommendations on this subject and it would certainly be dangerous and misleading at this time to speak of a "Marshall Plan" for Asia. However, the action of the Colombo meeting may have an immediately good psychological effect in South and South East Asia by demonstrating that the non-Asian members of the Commonwealth recognize the importance of strengthening the economies of the Asian members and of South East Asia.

13. One useful purpose which the meeting served was to provide an intensive course in the realities of present Commonwealth relations for the new Australian and New Zealand Ministers of External Affairs. Their parties have been out of office during a period in which there have been very great changes in the nature of the Commonwealth and the new Ministers might, therefore, have been expected to have a rather out-of-date view of Commonwealth relations. The New Zealand representative, Doidge, at the beginning of the Conference, was talking about New Zealand being "a daughter in her mother's house but mistress of her own." I think he now realizes that this view of the Commonwealth is not held by any of the other Commonwealth External Affairs Ministers.

14. At meetings of Commonwealth Ministers hitherto the order of speaking has been the order of seniority of Commonwealth countries — the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, etc. At this meeting, perhaps because of a suggestion we made informally, the order of speaking differed according to the item which was being discussed, and the usual order was either the United Kingdom or India to begin with, then the other two Asian members, and then Australia and New Zealand. Canada and South Africa, as being the two countries least directly concerned in Asian questions usually spoke at the end. I think that this break with tradition was healthy and reflects the realities of the present Commonwealth.

15. The only question on which I thought it appropriate to make a fairly formal and detailed statement of policy towards the beginning of the discussion was on the subject of the United Kingdom association with plans for closer Western European Union. The text of my statement is given in my immediately following telegram. You might wish to send this to our missions in the United States and Western Europe for their information. Indeed there seems to be no reason why they should not pass it on to the Governments to which they are accredited.

16. There was unfortunately no discussion of the vexatious and sterile question of "improving" Commonwealth machinery for consultation nor was there any discussion of such questions as the designation of High Commissioners or the Royal Style and Titles. The former question was on the agenda for a while but it was quietly dropped. The reason for this was that the South African representative had received instructions to support strongly the dropping of the term High Commissioner and to urge that the title of representatives exchanged between Commonwealth countries should be a matter for bilateral agreement between the two countries concerned. This would enable South Africa to accept Ambassadors from the white Commonwealth countries but not from Asian countries. This information was given to us in confidence. It was clear, therefore, that a discussion of this subject at this meeting would be bound to cause bad feelings. Ends.

Following received from the Canadian Delegation, Colombo, Begins: January 13, 1950. Commonwealth Foreign Ministers' Conference, Colombo. Statement by Mr. Pearson.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

For our part we welcome the prospect of closer economic co-operation among the countries of Western Europe. Such a development might be expected to contribute to the military strength of the democratic countries concerned and also, by eliminating uneconomic production and encouraging competitive efficiency, to hasten the day when they would no longer require extraordinary financial assistance from abroad. It would also restore to countries occupied and ravaged during the war that sense of hope which they need now more than they need United States dollars. Western Europe could once again look forward to playing in the world the great role for which its history and the resourceful intelligence of its people qualify it.

It is impossible for us to conceive of effective economic co-operation in Western Europe without the participation of Germany. Yet there is always the danger that, unless Germany can be articulated into a large and powerful grouping of democratic States, Germany may once again threaten the peace of Europe. For this and other reasons we feel that in some way the United Kingdom must be associated in plans for closer economic and indeed political co-operation within the European Continent.

The difficulties in the way of such association are formidable. The United Kingdom has responsibilities to the countries now joined in the North Atlantic Treaty, to the sterling area and to the Commonwealth as a whole. It is of great importance that none of those valuable links should be broken. In a meeting of this sort it is not necessary for a Canadian to emphasize how much we in Canada value the Commonwealth association. It may be more necessary for me to make clear that we also recognize the importance of the economic links which bind members of the sterling area together. We often in Ottawa worry about some of the policies of the sterling area, especially when they seem to hurt us severely in reducing imports from Canada and when they sometimes give us the feeling that the sterling area is regarded as an end in itself and not merely a means to an end, yet in some ways the sterling area is a counterpart in the economic sphere to the political link between Eastern and Western countries which is furnished by the Commonwealth. In addition it provides a large though of course limited area in which multilateral trade is possible.

As we see it, the problem is to devise means whereby the United Kingdom can feel free to play an increasingly intimate part in European co-operation without causing serious rupture to the many world-wide connections that pass through her hands. To find a solution for such a problem can never be easy. I do not believe it is impossible, however.

During the past few months a great number of proposals for closer economic co-operation in Europe have been put forward. Some of them are perhaps as frivolous as the names they bear. Others, however, are more solidly based and deserve careful examination.

In examining them I would suggest that two tests should be applied. First of all, it should be determined whether the plan has substantial content or is merely a gesture. Does it take account of present-day economic realities in Western Europe and the rest of the world? Is it likely to further the ends which it purports to serve? Secondly, each plan should be tested against the criterion of whether or not it will lead to a progressively wider co-operation in trade and other economic matters between all the countries in the free world.

I do not intend to examine individually the various proposals which have recently been made or to pronounce judgement on which of them seem to us to emerge from these tests with credit. Some of them seem to my Government to be as likely to encourage the development of new high-cost industries and increased high-cost agricultural production in Europe as to lead to the objectives of greater efficiency and lower costs and prices at which they purport to be aiming. What must be avoided is the creation of a closed, high-cost, inflationary economic bloc, whether a sterling bloc, a Commonwealth bloc, a European bloc, or a North American bloc, which would make progress toward a wider multilateral system of trade and payments more difficult. I have said that we recognize, at least under present conditions, the advantages to world trade of the sterling area. We have always contended, however, that the sterling area as we know it today should be regarded as a transitional stage on the way to a trading system where currencies will be convertible and where exchange controls and quantitative restrictions will be drastically reduced. In the same way I would argue that any new economic bloc which might be set up in Europe should be so designed as to facilitate rather than retard progress towards this goal.

It is often said in Canada that, in the short run at least, such a bloc might do some damage to Canadian trade. I would hope that it would not be serious. Nevertheless, it would be better for us in Canada to suffer some temporary disadvantages rather than to see the prospect of closer economic co-operation which we believe to be necessary in Western Europe made impossible because the United Kingdom is unable to participate. We naturally reserve the right to study the details of any plans which may be advanced and to urge that they should be framed in such a way as to reduce the possible damage to our own legitimate commercial interests to a minimum. The United Kingdom will, of course, examine them in the same way. In particular, the United Kingdom will require assurances that any such plan will have the result merely of adjusting, rather than of breaking its existing ties with the Commonwealth, the sterling area and the countries of the North Atlantic community. But we would not like the United Kingdom to be embarrassed or inhibited in examining these European proposals, some of which originate in the United States, on their merits because of fears that Canada as a member of the Commonwealth would unreasonably object. On a great number of occasions Mr. Bevin has shown high courage and a lively sense that it is often necessary to go forward even though there are a lot of difficulties in the way, some of them obscure ones. We in Canada would not like him to be prevented from making another such act of faith because of the feeling that Canada as a member of the Commonwealth is unreasonably frightened of the unknown. Ends.

Draft Telegram from High Commissioner in United Kingdom to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [London], January 26, 1950

From Pearson for Heeney.

Discussion at Colombo of a proposed Loan to Burma of £7 1/2 million from Commonwealth countries. This proposal, which I gather was broached some months ago by the United Kingdom Government to the governments of other Commonwealth countries within the sterling area, contemplates primarily the transference of sterling into the No. 2 (blocked) account in London of the Burmese Currency Board in order to provide additional backing for the Burmese currency. The money would remain in London and could not be used for the purchase of goods overseas. The Burmese could, however, either issue more notes for internal finance or substitute the money lent to them for their own money which they had put into the Currency Board for currency backing and thus obtain extra sterling for overseas expenditures.

2. At Colombo Bevin promised a United Kingdom contribution of £3 3/4 million. Nehru undertook to provide £1 million, subject to parliamentary sanction in New Delhi. Spender of Australia and Ghulam[4] of Pakistan both agreed to recommend to their governments that they contribute £500,000 each. I reserved our position, and made it clear that it would be wrong for me to hold out any expectation of a Canadian contribution. I did, however, say that I would bring the proposed loan to the attention of the Canadian Government.

3. Under this scheme sterling-area countries can assist in supporting the Burmese Government with a minimum of sacrifice or risk. Any contribution from Canada, on the other hand, would impose some genuine strain on our overall exchange position. I have not gone into great detail, because I think this is a subject which might well await my return to Ottawa. It could then be considered in the light of the discussion at Colombo and of the suggestion made by Acheson to Wrong last

Note du chef du Comité interministériel sur la politique du commerce extérieur pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Chairman, Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy, to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 73-50 [Ottawa], March 8, 1950

RE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE PROPOSED CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE FOR SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA

1. At the meeting of Cabinet of February 14th, the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Colombo Conference had approved a resolution for the establishment of a Commonwealth Consultative Committee to investigate the possibilities of cooperation in the economic development of South and South-east Asia. The Cabinet directed that the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy consider the proposal and report back.

2. The resolution of the Colombo Conference on the Consultative Committee was as follows:

"A. The Conference of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers recommends that the participating Governments should:

(i) examine the possibility of making financial assistance available for essential productive purposes in South and South-East Asia, taking into account their existing commitments;

(ii) support as high a priority as possible for projects presented to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development which would contribute to the economic well-being of the area and would be in accordance with the Bank's objectives;

(iii) contribute to the technical assistance work of the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies, and to support in these organizations as high a priority as possible for the needs of South and South-East Asia;

(iv) examine the possibility of making supplementary bilateral arrangements in appropriate cases for the provision of direct technical and other assistance;

(v) generally, consider proposals for the economic development of the area, keeping in view the possibilities of mutual assistance;

B. With a view to the implementation of these recommendations the Conference further recommends the establishment of a Consultative Committee, membership of which will be open to all Commonwealth Governments which wish to participate, with the following terms of reference:

(i) to receive from Governments an indication of the action which they consider it feasible to take in response to the recommendations in Section A;

(ii) to approach the Governments of countries outside the Commonwealth interested in the area with a view to enlisting their collaboration;

(iii) to examine the methods of co-ordinating development activities in South and South-East Asia, in association with international and regional organizations concerned with the object of raising the level of production and the standard of living in the area;

(iv) to examine the desirability of promoting international commodity agreements for basic products, which would benefit the area and could be recommended for consideration under the Havana Charter;

(v) to consider whether the economic development of under-developed countries of the area would be assisted by the drawing up of a co-ordinated plan of development and by the establishment of special machinery;

(vi) to make recommendations to Governments.

C. If these recommendations are accepted the Australian Government would be pleased to accept the responsibility of convening the first meeting of the Consultative Committee in Australia."

3. The Interdepartmental Committee were of the view that it would not be realistic to expect that Canada could accept the recommendations and become a full member of the Consultative Committee without assuming thereby some degree of financial commitment in view of recommendation A(i). At the same time, it was felt that any financial obligation might be quite modest and that it did not constitute an adequate reason for not accepting the resolution.

4. It is apparent that the Australian Government have interpreted the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons as meaning that Canada would accept the resolution and become a full member in the Consultative Committee.[5] In view of this impression and of the misinterpretation that might be placed upon any action by Canada either to remain outside the Committee or to be represented only by an observer, the Interdepartmental Committee are of the view that Canada should agree to accept full membership.

5. The Interdepartmental Committee was particularly concerned at possible implications of recommendation A(ii). It was felt that it tended to weaken the position that Canada had on the Board of Directors of the Bank as a disinterested party. It was thought, moreover, that the interpretation of our obligation under the recommendation might be quite difficult in respect of any particular proposal that might arise. Finally, it was considered that the recommendation could be interpreted as amounting to the establishment of a Commonwealth pressure group for certain purposes. This is a departure from normal Commonwealth practice and to some extent also it involves an infringement on the usual Canadian policy of refraining from committing Canadian action in advance in respect of any matters in the United Nations or other international organizations.

6. For these reasons, the Committee was of the view that Cabinet might wish to consider whether a communication should be sent to the other participating governments in the Consultative Committee pointing out the possible difficulties that are seen in connection with recommendation A(ii) and suggesting that an agreed interpretation of the recommendation be arrived at or other action be taken to reduce the possibility of embarrassing the governments concerned.[6]

RE COMMONWEALTH LOAN TO BURMA

1. At the meeting of February 14th, the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, at the Colombo Conference, Mr. Bevin had invited contributions from Commonwealth governments to a proposed loan of £7,500,000 to the Government of Burma. The Cabinet directed that the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy consider the proposal and report.

2. It is understood that undertakings were made at the Colombo Conference by other Commonwealth governments as follows: India - £1,000,000; Australia - £500,000; Pakistan - £500,000; Ceylon - £250,000. The representatives of South

In agreeing to Canadian membership on the Consultative Committee at its meeting of March 10, 1950, Cabinet did not consider it necessary to question the wording of recommendation A(ii).

Africa and New Zealand indicated that it was not likely that their governments could make any contribution.

3. The proposed loan would result in the transference of sterling into a blocked account in London of the Burmese Currency Board, in order to provide additional backing for Burmese currency or to allow the release of other sterling for overseas expenditures. Unless some special procedure could be arrived at, Canadian participation would amount to a small additional dollar credit to the sterling area. It might also be necessary to have some arrangement with the United Kingdom for re-conversion of our sterling contribution into Canadian dollars if the Government of Burma fell and the advance were returned.

4. The Interdepartmental Committee felt that there was not as substantial an obligation on Canada as there would have been if Burma were a Commonwealth country or if Canada has been involved in the discussions relating to the loan from the beginning. The Committee felt, moreover, that the Canadian public would find it difficult to understand the transaction particularly as Burma must in the present circumstances be regarded as an especially bad risk. The Committee accordingly recommend that Canada should not participate in the proposed loan to Burma.[7]

MEETING OF THE CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE FOR SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA, CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

1. Establishment of a Commonwealth Consultative Committee to investigate the possibilities of cooperation in the economic development of South and South-east Asia was recommended by the Colombo Conference. It was hoped that the Committee could devise a programme for economic development not only of the Commonwealth countries now participating in the Committee, but also for other countries of South and South-east Asia that might be asked to join in the work of the Committee. It was also hoped that the United States might join at a later date. The programme would be designed both to strengthen the economies of the countries in the area and to help combat the spread of Communism. The recommendation was approved by the Cabinet on March 10. It was agreed that Canada should accept full membership on the Committee and should be represented at the first meeting to be held in Sydney, Australia.

[7] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 10 mars 1950./Approved by Cabinet, March 10, 1950.

2. The meeting in Sydney will open on May 15. It has already been announced that Mr. Mayhew will represent the government. It is recommended that the delegation be as follows:

Delegate: Mr. Mayhew
Alternate Delegate: Maj. Gen. L.R. LaFleche, Canadian High Commissioner in Australia
Principal Adviser: Mr. D.V. LePan, External Affairs
Advisers: Mr. Neil Perry, Finance,
Mr. B.I. Rankin, Trade and Commerce,
Mr. G.K. Bouey, Bank of Canada
Secretary: A member of the staff of the High Commissioner's Office in Canberra.

3. The agenda for the meeting is currently under discussion among the governments concerned, and a telegram has been sent by External Affairs asking that it should not be finally settled until there has been an opportunity for discussion after the arrival of the delegation. It is proposed to urge that the agenda have first consideration given to what can be done by the countries of South and South-east Asia themselves to assist the economic development of the area. An effort will also be made to have discussion directed to the desirability of securing the further interest and cooperation of the specialized agencies of the United Nations in the development of South and South-east Asia.

4. Draft instructions for the guidance of the delegation have been prepared after consultation among the departments concerned. They are attached herewith for approval.

5. It is proposed that an announcement should be made shortly concerning the purposes of the Sydney meeting and giving the composition of the Canadian delegation.[8]

SECRET [Ottawa, May 2, 1950]

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE MEETING OF THE COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA TO BE HELD AT SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, THE 15TH OF MAY, 1950

General

1. The Delegation should express the concern of the Canadian Government over conditions in South and South-East Asia. The Government are aware of the urgency of at least making a start in improving the standard of living in such countries as India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Burma, Malaya, Indo-China, Indonesia and Thailand if the spread of Communism is to be prevented. The establishment of political stability and internal security is fundamental to the achievement of improved conditions. The attainment of higher standards of living and development in South and South-East Asia must inevitably depend very largely upon the efforts of the peoples and governments themselves. The role of outside assistance can, at most, be one which is directed to the provision of "missing components" which may be most helpful in the carrying out of comprehensive domestic programmes.

[8] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 2 mai 1950./Approved by Cabinet, May 2, 1950.

Financial Assistance

2. The Delegation should carefully avoid at this stage committing the Canadian Government in any way, either directly or by inference, to extending financial assistance to the countries of South and South-East Asia. It should be stressed that the Canadian Government cannot even consider this question until the basic elements of the problem have been carefully examined, until the possibilities of self-help, maximum utilization of local resources, and mutual aid among the underdeveloped countries themselves have been thoroughly explored and until procedures have been suggested to ensure that whatever external financial aid may be available will be put to effective use. The Canadian delegation should discourage any tendency to elaborate programmes designed to establish the overall need for outside assistance in terms of large balance of payments gaps on the example of the Marshall Plan.

3. The Delegation should resist any attempts that may be made to oversimplify the problem of raising the standard of living in these countries by expressing it in exclusively financial terms without regard to the social conditions which stand in the way of increasing agricultural and other production. They should also look with scepticism at overly grandiose schemes of development. Ordinary hand-pumps may be more suited to some regions than vast irrigation works; and ploughs may be more needed than tractors.

Technical Assistance

4. The Delegation should state that the Canadian Government are prepared to cooperate in well conceived plans for providing technical assistance in the area by appropriating monies to finance both the despatch of technical experts from Canada and also the training in this country of students and technicians. In general, it should be suggested that such plans should be concerted through the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, to which the Canadian Government intend to contribute. If it is urged at the Conference that additional technical assistance is required by the countries of South and South-East Asia over and above what they may legitimately expect to receive through the United Nations scheme, the Delegation may indicate that the Canadian Government will be prepared to consider additional proposals which may be put forward, where it is considered that Canada is in a special position to be helpful.

Cooperation with United Nations Agencies

5. The Delegation should urge on the Committee the importance of making full use of the resources of the United Nations and its specialized agencies in the field of technical assistance and the necessity of not duplicating their efforts. Any special Commonwealth or bilateral schemes which may be proposed should be designed to supplement, and not to compete with, what is being done through the United Nations. The under-developed countries in the area should be advised to make their needs clearly known to the various specialized agencies. And close cooperation should be arranged between the Commonwealth Consultative Committee and the specialized agencies as soon as such cooperation is likely to be fruitful. On the other hand, no undertaking should be given by the Delegation that the Canadian representatives in the specialized agencies will support the granting of a higher priority to the applications of countries in the area than an objective examination of the claims of competing countries would warrant. In particular, care should be taken not to compromise the position of the Canadian representatives on the Bank and Fund nor the independent position of the International Bank and its reputation for disinterested dealing.

Sterling Balances

6. The Delegation should take the position that this meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee would not be an appropriate forum in which to discuss the question of the sterling balances.

Le ministre des Affaires extérieures de l'Australie au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Minister for External Affairs of Australia to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 12 Canberra, May 3, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Addressed Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, London, No. 106. Repeat to Governments of Canada No. 12; Ceylon No. 11; India No. 16; New Zealand No. 64; Pakistan No. 12.

1. It is the hope of the Australian Government that the Consultative Committee meeting in Sydney will reach agreement on

(a) Objectives of a long term development program for South and South East Asia and on arrangements to begin immediately to prepare such a program on the assumption that international financial assistance will be forthcoming

(b) Immediate, although much more limited measures to be taken by Commonwealth countries collectively to provide assistance to the area

(c) Method of approach to the United States and possibly France and the Netherlands to associate them with these immediate measures pending the evolution of long term plans on a more comprehensive scale.

2. In connection with 1(b), Commonwealth countries have already made contributions to assist the area. The Australian Government believes however that a greater effort is possible and that if this effort is made as a collective organized program it will in itself not only satisfy urgent requirements but also contribute towards success in 1(a) — that of organizing a more comprehensive and consistent program on an international basis. It will be demonstrated to the United States —

(a) That initiative is being taken in the area itself involving some degree of self help.

(b) That Governments other than the United States, including countries in the region, are prepared to share the burdens.

3. The Australian Government proposes that Commonwealth Governments agree at Sydney to establish a Commonwealth fund for three purposes —

(a) Provision over three years of technical assistance in all its forms (e.g. training facilities, personnel, supplies) which should aim to train in all about 3,000 Asians and provide up to 1,000 technical experts, instructors, etc., and equipment costing in all 8 M. sterling.

(b) Provision of emergency relief in the form of medical supplies and food over the course of three years (a sum not exceeding 4,000,000 pounds sterling is envisaged for this purpose).

(c) Stipulation of an agreed sum up to which Commonwealth Governments individually, or where appropriate collectively, would consider negotiation of credit arrangements with particular countries in South and South East Asia urgently needing such assistance for the provision of high-priority imports. It is suggested that the amount pledged by the Governments for this purpose might be available over a two year period.

4. The Australian Government would suggest that contributions should not be tied to expenditure in the contributing country but should be available for use in soft currency areas. It would be desirable to endeavour to make arrangements with Governments of Europe and other countries with facilities available for the provision of services at the expense of the fund.

5. The Governments would create a Commonwealth Council of all contributing Governments to administer the fund and a Secretariat and small staff of seconded technical officers, the functions of which would include —

(a) Consultation with potential recipients of aid with a view to working out a program in consultation with other international organizations and the United States and other Governments for implementation by the contributing Governments.

(b) Establishment of conditions, where appropriate, for the provision and supervision of aid.

(c) Provision of a core of experts available to assist Governments in the area to prepare long term development plans upon a uniform basis.

(d) Circulation to Commonwealth Governments of economic information about the area.

6. The Australian Government believes that a fund of 8,000,000 pounds sterling would be sufficient for the technical assistance part of the program. So far as concerns the sums stipulated as available for the credit negotiations with countries in the area, the Australian Government does not wish to suggest a precise figure at this stage but hopes this question will be the subject of discussion at the Sydney meeting. Clearly it can only be a limited figure designed to provide first bid of utmost importance to the recipient Governments.

7. The Australian Government is anxious to avoid the creation of unnecessary machinery. But it is our judgment that establishment of limited machinery additional to the normal channels of Commonwealth consultation would be a necessary adjunct to the practical aid program envisaged in order to provide the basis from which to work to a wider system of cooperation with other Governments which might later be brought to join as contributors. Moreover, the Commonwealth Secretariat working with potential recipients on behalf of the Commonwealth Governments collectively could more effectively negotiate coordinated arrangements for assistance by individual Commonwealth contributors, taking account of all other current sources of aid.

8. It would be appropriate and desirable for the fund to include any existing bilateral arrangements under which technical or other aid is afforded by individual Commonwealth countries to other countries in the area. Provision should be made within the machinery to maintain whatever degree of individual control over such existing arrangements as might appear to be appropriate to the countries involved. The figures tentatively suggested in paragraph 3 above are of course intended to provide for a net addition to such arrangements.

9. The technical staff of the proposed Council would provide one of the essential requirements for organizing the presentation of a practical and coordinated longer term plan of development of the area. Its relationship with ECAFE in this respect would require careful consideration.

10. The Australian delegation will be glad to offer the Sydney meeting an elaboration of the proposal outlined in this telegram.

TELEGRAM 67 Ottawa, May 8, 1950

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

I have received a telegram from the Minister for External Affairs of Australia (No. 12 of May 3) in which he sets out a number of proposals on which he hopes that the Consultative Committee meeting in Sydney will reach agreement. Please convey to him immediately the text of the following reply. Please convey it also to our delegation, flying to Sydney, who already possess the incoming message mentioned above. Text begins:

1. The proposals put forward in your telegram No. 12 of May 3 for adoption at the forthcoming meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee have been considered here. We welcome the opportunity you have given us to consider your views in advance of the conference itself, particularly because our thinking has followed a rather different line.

2. We fully agree with you on the desirability of the Commonwealth Governments, individually and collectively, taking initiative in exploring ways to promote the development of the under-developed countries of South and South-East Asia. It was in this spirit that the Canadian Government approved the recommendations of the Colombo Conference.

3. Those recommendations, however, recognize that other countries outside the Commonwealth should be brought into whatever plans are to be laid for the future and we had hoped that consideration of this matter would be given a very high priority on the agenda at Sydney. This point was also in our minds when we sent you our telegram No. 2 of May 3† suggesting that the question of financial assistance (presumably to be discussed under Item 3 of your draft agenda) should be placed at the end of the agenda.

4. While the Canadian Government agrees on the desirability of Commonwealth initiative we would not agree, at any rate at this stage, that this implies the desirability of a special Commonwealth fund, or of special Commonwealth machinery. We have in mind both the role to be played by existing United Nations machinery and also the need for collaboration with non-Commonwealth countries; we believe that the consideration of purely Commonwealth machinery and purely Commonwealth finance would be premature until the fullest examination had been given to these matters, and it will clearly be impossible to explore them fully at the Sydney meeting because of the limited representation and the short period available. We have regarded the Sydney meeting as an essential step, but only as a first step.

5. A continuing working party composed of representatives of countries in South-East Asia and of countries directly interested in South-East Asia might be a useful means of bringing into focus and perspective the economic problems and possibilities of that area. Development plans should be appraised from a more objective point of view than each country may be able to adopt by itself. The approach in such a group should, of course, be as broad as possible, and not confined merely to statistical appraisals of balances of payments. The members of such a group should, I assume, be drawn in part from outside the Commonwealth.

6. At several points the text of your telegram seems to suggest that the meeting in Sydney will reach "agreements". According to our understanding this is a "consultative" committee and the only type of agreements that members of the Committee could reach would be agreements to refer certain recommendations back to their Governments for approval. This is clearly envisaged in Section B(vi) of the Terms of Reference of the Committee as approved in Colombo.

7. You will appreciate that these points, like your own suggestions, are put forward in advance of the Conference in the hope that they will help to make the Conference itself more productive. I would like to add a word of personal good wishes for its success. Text Ends. Telegram Ends.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE

Reference your telegram No. 67 of May 8th, Consultative Committee.
Following for Pearson from Spender, Begins: Thank you for your observations on proposals we put forward in respect to Consultative Committee. The reason why we put them forward in advance was to avoid the kind of difference in thinking which has been revealed by our proposals and your reply.

In point of fact careful examination of our proposals and your comments demonstrates that our objectives are the same and that our different viewpoint is in respect of means of achieving these objectives.

Your first concern, as indicated in paragraph 3 of your message, is that early consideration be given to the way in which other countries outside the Commonwealth might be brought into whatever plans are laid for the future. This is uppermost in our mind and, in fact, it is for this reason that we have put forward our proposals involving a special Commonwealth fund and special Commonwealth machinery. We are led to believe that participation by other Governments, and, in particular, the United States of America, cannot be counted on unless there is an effective organization and agreement to pursue immediate objectives. If this initiative is taken by countries of this area, then there is fair prospect of active United States participation. If, on the other hand, nothing is done except to explore the position and the problems and the possibilities of the area prior to an approach to other Governments, we are led to believe that approach will not be successful.

With regard to the role to be played by existing United Nations machinery referred to in your paragraph 4, we are again in complete agreement and the chart we have now drawn up provides for the greatest possible use of all United Nations agencies in the area and smallest practicable Commonwealth organization, which we envisage would cease to function as such at an early date when participation by other countries was achieved.

It is for these reasons that we do not approach the Conference in the way suggested in your paragraph 5, that is, that some continual working party might be set up with a view to exploring the possibilities of the area. On the contrary, we regard it as imperative that there should be agreement reached at the Sydney Conference, or, if not actually at it, almost immediately after the delegates return.

You will see, therefore, that our approach is based on the assumption that only by the Commonwealth taking the initiative in positive and practicable way, thereby showing its determination to tackle pressing problems of this area, will the interest of and cooperation with other Governments be achieved. There is a second reason why we believe that our approach is the one which must be adopted at the Sydney Conference. The Ceylon recommendation arose out of an examination of current political situation in South East Asia and emphasis there was upon immediate action to meet a situation which day by day was becoming more serious for democratic countries. In our view, and press of United States, the United Kingdom, as well as our own, demonstrates this, public opinion expects results from Conference and not merely a promise further to examine the problem. Unless there can be some practical results along the lines we suggest, we would consider the Conference a failure in context of situation in which it was convened and might be forced to admit as much.

This approach to the problem in our area is "Atlantic Pact" of Asia. Clearly it is not possible to imitate Atlantic Pact in circumstances so different but this is a first step in tackling the problem, and we hope you will approach it with the same sense of urgency as you approached the Atlantic Pact.

We will be communicating with your representative here within the next day or so our proposals in greater detail and you will see emphasis which we have placed upon cooperation of non-Commonwealth countries and with existing United Nations machinery. We earnestly hope you will be able to examine these proposals when they are received with a view to enabling your delegation to join us in demonstrating that Commonwealth countries mean business in relation to pressing problems of this area. Ends.

2. It has been indicated that Mr. Spender may follow up this message with a telephone call to Mr. Pearson on May 11th or May 12th. Message ends.

SECRET

Following from Canadian Delegation to meeting of Commonwealth Consultative Committee for South and South East Asia, Begins: The first two meetings of officials were held today and on the whole proved less acrimonious than we had feared. The argument was conducted chiefly between Australian and United Kingdom representatives who as you will realize were urging quite dissimilar approaches to problem of economic development in the area, but who were both obviously disposed to avoid anything like an open breach.

2. After brief discussion of administrative details and procedural questions it was suggested by Dr. [John Wear] Burton, Australian Secretary for External Affairs, who was in the Chair, that the best method for officials to prepare way for Ministerial Meeting would be for them to deliver a succession of informal statements on what they believed view of their Governments to be on proper objectives for present conference in Sydney. Such comment would obviously include an expression of opinion on merits of proposals which were made in advance of Conference by Australian and United Kingdom Governments. This suggestion was accepted and led to what was described by Chairman as a "second reading" debate on proposed agenda for Commonwealth Consultative Committee.

3. The Australian case in support of a Commonwealth fund for economic development in South and South East Asia and a Commonwealth Council to administer it was developed by Tange[9] who succeeded Burton in the Chair. His exposition showed that, at least on the surface, the Australians had not been budged from their position by the receipt of your message of May 8th. Tange declared categorically that in the view of the Australian Government it would be necessary to consider the Conference a failure if it did no more than set on foot action to produce a programme for economic development in the area. In view of urgency of political situation and also of expectations which had been roused in public mind, it was essential that agreement should be reached at Sydney on at least some concrete measure of assistance to be begun at once.

4. It is perhaps not necessary, however, to take this obduracy quite at its face value. Mr. Mayhew had an interview with Mr. Spender this afternoon and received impression that he had been considerably shaken by your message and was not prepared to push his proposal for a Commonwealth fund and a Commonwealth Council to the uttermost. It may be assumed that he will be even less likely to be thoroughly intransigent after he has been informed of attitudes expressed at meeting this afternoon. All under-developed countries represented at meeting, i.e., India, Pakistan and Ceylon declared that they found Australian proposal attractive. On the other hand, the New Zealand representative made it clear that his Government was not convinced that there should be a Commonwealth fund or that formal machinery was necessary. He was followed by "Otto" Clarke for United Kingdom who in a very vigorous and effective statement campaigned for approach which is outlined in memorandum† left with you by Clutterbuck on 28th April. The United Kingdom's experience in extending piecemeal assistance to countries in South and South East Asia had convinced them, he explained, of necessity of a large scale and imaginative approach to the problem of economic assistance to that area. Such an approach could be successful only with the help of the United States. The central problem was to produce by this autumn a well articulated plan for economic development which might have a chance of commending itself to the United States administration when consideration was being given early next year to alternative method of bridging the dollar gap as Marshall Aid came to an end. There was no necessity to set up new machinery to administer such stop gap aid as might still be necessary in the area or even to assist in drawing up the long term programme.

[9] Arthur H. Tange, conseiller auprès de la direction des Nations Unies du ministère des Affaires extérieures de l'Australie; membre de la délégation de l'Australie à la Conférence du Comité consultatif du Commonwealth à Sydney.
Arthur H. Tange, Counsellor, United Nations Division of Department of External Affairs, Australia; Member, Delegation of Australia to Conference of Commonwealth Consultative Committee, Sydney.

5. In the discussion which followed it appeared that the Indians and other possible beneficiaries of Australians' institutional bounty would probably be willing to rally behind the United Kingdom's proposal if they could be convinced that it held out greater promise of enlisting substantial United States aid. Clarke made considerable progress in convincing them that this would in fact be the case, and at close of the meeting the Australian band wagon seemed considerably less crowded than it had been earlier in the afternoon.

6. At such an early stage in the Conference it is risky to hazard a prediction of what the outcome will likely be. The Australian telegram of 3rd May, however, was so disturbing that you might welcome our first thoughts on what may emerge from Conference even if they are falsified in the event. It now seems likely that when dust has cleared away the Australians will not insist on agreed decisions to be taken by Consultative Committee but will reluctantly accept a series of recommendations to Governments. These recommendations will probably include almost the whole of the United Kingdom's suggestion for a concerted programme of economic development in the area to be prepared by September or October. The proposal for a Commonwealth fund and Commonwealth Council will in all probability be greatly watered down. All that will be left of short term measures proposed by Australian Government may be a recommendation for some immediate technical assistance to be afforded by Commonwealth countries in addition to that provided through United Nations. If, in fact, that is the outcome of Conference, we assume you would not be too perturbed.

7. Pleading that our interests in South and South East Asia were not so great as those of other participating Governments, we succeeded in deferring our general statement until tomorrow morning. It will be, of course, within the four corners of our original instructions as supplemented by your message to Mr. Spender of May 8th.

8. Immediately after arriving in Sydney, LePan had a private talk with "Otto" Clarke, in which he explained some of the difficulties of Canada's participation in the work of the Committee and canvassed possibility of so modifying Australian proposals that they might prove generally acceptable without in the process causing a rupture with the Australians. What Clarke had to say in private and what he confirmed in his public statement today was reassuring. He has always been noted for his frankness, however, and you should know at once that he admitted that the time table which United Kingdom delegation were recommending might present Canadian Government with a difficult dilemma. It was the hope of the United Kingdom delegation that the Commonwealth Governments, including Canada, would be willing to decide what financial contributions they might be able to make toward economic development in areas as soon as concerted programme had been drawn up this fall. This decision would, therefore, according to United Kingdom's projected time table, be prior to formal presentation of programme to United States administration and to a formal request for United States financial assistance.

SECRET

Following from the Canadian Delegation to meeting of Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and Southeast Asia, Begins: The preliminary meetings of officials have now concluded. As result, in large measure of Canadian efforts, the draft agenda which was circulated by the Australian Government before the Conference has been scrapped and replaced by the following simplified list of items:

(a) Election of Chairman and opening address;

(b) General statements by delegations on the attitudes of their respective Governments to Colombo recommendations as a whole;

(c) Technical assistance;

(d) Planning the development for South and Southeast Asia;

(e) Priority economic requirements of the countries in area;

(f) Future activities of the Committee.

2. This arrangement of topics is derived from the division of labour followed by three Working Parties of officials which have met during the past four days. The first Working Party under the Chairmanship of "Otto" Clarke prepared in short order report recommending main outline of procedure suggested in United Kingdom memorandum for drawing up a programme for economic development. The second Working Party, with a New Zealander in the Chair, had more difficulty in wrestling with complexities of technical assistance, but nevertheless accomplished useful work. The toughest battle of all was fought out inconclusively in Third Working Party, which had been established to consider the suggestions in paragraph 3 of Australian memorandum for emergency relief and credit arrangements.

3. We have learned informally what the Australians have in mind under latter head is a Commonwealth loan to Indonesia. The Australians feel Indonesia is the only country in the area which requires an immediate credit since India, Pakistan and Ceylon have large sterling balances, since Thailand is well supplied with both dollars and sterling and since Burma has already received a Commonwealth loan. Spender has told United Kingdom delegation if Commonwealth countries are unwilling to join Australia in extending a loan to Indonesia, Australia will act alone. His eagerness, however, to induce Commonwealth countries to act collectively is probably based on an awareness that it would be easier in this way to secure public approval in Australia for financial assistance to Indonesia.

4. The support for Australian proposals for a Commonwealth fund and a Commonwealth Council has weakened perceptibly during meeting of officials, even among under-developed countries. For the time being, Pakistan is now only reliable Australian satellite. Both India and Ceylon are increasingly wary of becoming identified with Australian position. Although they are both naturally willing to accept any aid which might come to them immediately and without strings, they clearly distrust attempts which are being made by Australia to assert its leadership among Commonwealth countries in the area. This distrust has been increased by rough and even brutal tactics which Spender has been pursuing. It sometimes seems as though spirit of Dr. Evatt had passed by transmigration to his successor.

5. In the case of India, there would appear to be two additional reasons to explain their caution in accepting Australian proposals. They are obviously genuinely impressed by the argument which has been urged by the United Kingdom that a plan for economic development, drawn up on as sound basis as urgency of situation and short time available will permit, would be more likely to enlist United States assistance than any other action which Sydney Conference could take. In addition, they seem to be holding in reserve intention to approach the United States directly at a later stage for substantial financial aid. Although participation in coordinated programme for economic development in South and Southeast Asia might, up to a point, strengthen their hand in such a bilateral approach they do not want to become too bound and fettered by Commonwealth machinery.

6. The majority of the countries represented here are generally favourable to United Kingdom proposals and view Australian recommendations with considerable scepticism. Two misgivings, however, disturb any temptation which this majority might have to complacency. Spender has been busily engaged in nailing his colours to the mast with breathtaking recklessness and in whipping on his officials to last-ditch stand so that if an ugly split in the Conference is to be avoided it may be necessary at some point to devise a face saving compromise. The other misgiving, which is being tirelessly insinuated by the Australians, is that some more immediate action may be necessary in order to attract United States aid than is foreshadowed in United Kingdom's proposals. Lord MacDonald,[10] leader of United Kingdom Delegation, has told us that this latter misgiving is even entertained to some extent by Malcolm MacDonald.

7. At present, however, there does not seem to be any danger that instructions to United Kingdom delegation, which are set up in adamantine terms against any immediate additional financial commitment will be altered. This would be possibility only if discomfiture, in which Australian delegation have been placed by their own rashness and ineptitude, should become so sharp as to threaten good relations within the Commonwealth. Already tempers are badly frayed and situation may become worse. This problem of Commonwealth relations will be dealt with in a separate and later message. Ends.

TELEGRAM 77 Canberra, May 16, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Canadian Delegation to meeting of Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South-East Asia, Begins: No. 5. Something very close to a crisis in Commonwealth relations within the Conference has been precipitated by tactics which Spender has been pursuing.

2. The first rumblings of discord were created by Australian circular telegram of May 3rd which apparently offended susceptibilities in more capitals than Ottawa. Ill-will was then increased by sharp controversy which broke out over opening public meeting. As soon as the delegation arrived, Spender made it clear that he was very anxious to begin the Conference with a session open to the press. Many delegates were reluctant to agree to this proposal but we all finally gave our consent as a result of a clear understanding that Spender's statement would be submitted to us for our comments in advance and would contain nothing controversial. When it was circulated to us, however, day before Conference opened it proved to contain almost all points which had been made in Australian memorandum. I was so concerned that Spender might persist in opening the Conference in this way (in which case it would have been necessary for me to outline divergent Canadian view) that I felt compelled to send him at once a fairly stiff letter† listing passages to which I had objections and asking for their deletion. The delegates of the United Kingdom, India and Ceylon also protested vigorously. As a result of these separate initiatives Spender was persuaded at the last moment to make very extensive revisions.

3. When meeting of Ministers opened yesterday morning there was already very considerable irritation between delegations. This was whipped into a crescendo by statement which Spender delivered as soon as the Conference had gone into secret session. In the course of very intemperate series of remarks he attacked the United Kingdom for failure to honour commitments it had entered into at Colombo; abused officials for attempting to usurp functions of Ministers; and threatened unless the Conference accepted Australian proposal for stop-gap aid to go before the House of Representatives in Canberra and explain what he considered to be the reason for the failure of the Conference. Today a campaign has been unleashed in the press here, obviously inspired by Australian authorities, charging that go-slow tactics of the United Kingdom and other delegations were already imperilling success of the Conference.

4. Spender's rodomontade at this first private session was met by an admirable display of passive resistance. The Ceylonese delegate (whose position remains somewhat equivocal) delivered very lucid and even tempered exposition of problems which Ceylon is facing in its plans for economic development. Doidge, of New Zealand, said quite flatly his Government could not find funds which would be required by Australian proposals. Lord MacDonald for the United Kingdom without referring in any way to Spender's tirade, developed case for United Kingdom suggestion. I made clear Canadian Government could not be expected to take any decision until it had before it a much more complete set of facts. Finally, Mudaliar[11] of India virtually gave coup de grace to Australian proposal by insisting plans for economic developments must be soundly based and must proceed step by step. Spender is clearly attempting to isolate the United Kingdom in the belief that the present Government in Whitehall, dependent as it is on a very slender majority, would be particularly vulnerable to charges put about in the press that its obstinacy was leading to disruption of a Commonwealth Conference. One of the few reasonable remarks in Spender's statement was that he realized Canada's ability to extend assistance to countries of South and South East Asia was sharply limited by its commitments in North Atlantic area. LePan has discussed with Malcolm MacDonald possibility that United Kingdom Cabinet might feel obliged to give way before this attack. MacDonald feels its effect, if anything, will be to stiffen attitude of his Government.

5. At the moment the lines are holding firm with Australia and Pakistan on the one side and all other countries, with possible exception of Ceylon, on the other. It is difficult to see how Australia will be able to hold out against mounting opposition to its proposals, particularly from Asian countries. But it is equally difficult to see how Spender can retreat from extreme position he has taken up. Ends.

SECRET. EMERGENCY.

Please pass following to External Ottawa.
Following from the Canadian Delegation to the meeting of Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South East Asia. No. 6. Begins: The abscess of ill feeling in the Conference was broken this morning by the introduction of a new Australian proposal replacing that circulated to participating Commonwealth Governments on 3rd May.

---

[11] Sir Arcot Ramaswami Mudaliar, Dewan of Mysor; chef de la délégation de l'Inde à la Conférence du Comité consultatif du Commonwealth à Sydney.
Sir Arcot Ramaswami Mudaliar, Dewan of Mysore; Head, Delegation of India to Commonwealth Consultative Committee, Sydney.

2. In the new proposal the Australian Government drops its suggestions for immediate provision of emergency relief supplies to countries in the area and also for emergency credit arrangements. The idea of a Commonwealth fund is sharply modified and the name is dropped. All that is left of the original Australian proposals is a scheme for financing technical assistance over and above that to be provided through the United Nations expanded programme.

3. Under this new scheme a recommendation would be made to participating governments that they should undertake to provide their share of the financing necessary in order to extend over a three year period an additional amount of technical assistance up to a maximum of £8,000,000 sterling as and when the Consultative Committee or some subordinate body to be established approves specific requests. It was suggested by Australian Government that the percentages for each participating country might be determined at the present Conference. Spender said that Australia would be prepared to assume responsibility for about 35% of total and suggested that United Kingdom should assume an equal responsibility.

4. Mudaliar of India welcoming the new Australian proposals introduced two significant changes

(a) He recommended that contributions should be expressed in terms of amounts and not of percentages

(b) He thought that the arrangements for technical assistance which would be negotiated within the ambit of this scheme should be on a bilateral basis.

No objection was raised to these alternatives and they will probably be accepted.

5. I reserved our position but said that I would communicate with Canadian Government at once. All the other delegates indicated that they would recommend that their governments should contribute to the scheme. Mudaliar announced that he would recommend that India contribute up to a maximum of £750,000 over the three year period. Jayawardene of Ceylon said that he would recommend that Ceylon make a contribution. We have learned informally that Doidge of New Zealand suggested to his government a contribution of approximately 10% of the total.

6. It will be seen that the maximum annual amount over the three year period which might be expected from Canada would be some 10% of total or perhaps dollars 830,000 Canadian. In my view an annual contribution of $500,000 might be reasonable.

7. A number of delegates including Lord MacDonald stressed that whatever resolution is passed by the Conference on this subject must be put in the form of a recommendation to Governments. There are therefore four possible courses which are open to me

(a) To announce that I will recommend to Canadian Government that it make a contribution possible even mentioning a particular sum.

(b) To allow the Conference to make a recommendation on this subject without placing a Canadian reservation on the record.

(c) To reserve our position.

(d) To announce that Canada cannot contribute.

8. I should very much like to receive instructions as to which of these courses I should follow at earliest possible moment. I do not feel in a position to advise as to which of these alternatives should be chosen but I hope you will not feel it necessary to instruct me to take the last of the possible courses which I have listed. Your instructions must be in my hands by 10 o'clock on Friday morning at the latest since it is intended to hold the last closed session of the Conference that morning. I would suggest that you might consider sending me a brief message by way of Earnscliffe and United Kingdom Delegation here since that appears to be only method of rapid communication. Ends.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

19. The Minister of National Defence as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of May 2nd, 1950 reported that the Canadian delegation in Sydney had requested instructions in connection with proposals put forward by the Australian delegation. These proposals involved establishment of a fund of £8 million to be contributed to by the Commonwealth countries and to be used to provide technical assistance to Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries in South and Southeast Asia. It was proposed that this should be over and above whatever amounts the Commonwealth countries might contribute to technical assistance through the United Nations. The proposed contributions by other countries left a residue of £850,000. If Canada were to contribute this amount to complete the programme it would amount to about $2.5 million over a period of three years.

20. Mr. Claxton said that a specific commitment would appear to be unwise at present. No serious attempt seemed to have been made to assess needs or to ascertain what assistance might be forthcoming from other sources, including the U.N. In addition, a number of points relating to the programme, including the position of the United Kingdom, were not yet clear.

It was expected that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs returned from London, proposals for a contribution to technical assistance through U.N. would be placed before Cabinet. It would be desirable to have the Commonwealth proposals considered at the same time.

21. The Minister of Finance suggested that we should not give any firm commitment until there was a clear indication how the programme would fit in with the U.N. scheme, to what specific purposes the money was going to be devoted and what organization would decide on expenditures.

22. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed that the delegation to the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and Southeast Asia be instructed that:

(a) if the U.K. delegation qualified its willingness to contribute to a Commonwealth fund for technical assistance to Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries in South and Southeast Asia, or declined to contribute at all at this time, our delegate should do the same;

(b) if the U.K. delegation was prepared to recommend a contribution by their Government, our delegation should state that they would recommend a contribution by the Canadian Government, without referring to any specific sum or percentage; and,

(c) it be made clear that before considering any contribution the Government would wish to have information concerning the way the programme would fit in with U.N. technical assistance, the specific purposes to which the money would be devoted and how decision was to be taken as to expenditures from the fund.

Following from the Canadian delegation to the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on Economic Aid to South and South East Asia, Begins: No. 8. Conference concluded a few minutes after midnight last night, but not before we had had another sharp brush with the Australians. I reported in my telegram No. 6 that on Wednesday, finding himself faced by very substantial opposition, Spender gave way and dropped the Australian proposals concerning relief supplies and stop-gap credit arrangements. Late that same evening he circulated to the delegation a new memorandum in which a brazen attempt was made to reinstate proposal for emergency credits. This volte-face provoked very angry reaction, not only because it had been everywhere understood from what Spender had said that he was dropping his proposal in this field, but also because this had been made quite explicit in new memorandum which he had circulated Wednesday morning on technical assistance.

2. One paragraph of that memorandum reads as follows: "Our original proposal was that there should be established now a separate fund administered by a Commonwealth Secretariat and Council to provide technical assistance, relief and short term credit. I am prepared to modify that proposal to provide that Commonwealth countries should, at this stage, do no more than undertake to meet requirements for technical assistance as and when need has been adequately demonstrated to Consultative Committee or a Council established for the purpose".

3. Indignation simmered during Thursday. Late that evening Lord MacDonald bearded Spender privately and pressed United Kingdom's objection to new memorandum on emergency credits arrangements. However, since ministerial meeting had been suspended on Thursday in order to give officials a chance to make progress in draft report, the issue did not come out into the open until plenary meeting on Friday morning. Spender then introduced still another paper on emergency credit arrangement which had been drafted to take account of what Lord MacDonald had said. This revision was less objectionable to us than previous paper but it might still have been considered to imply Canadian Government was under some obligation, however slight, to extend emergency credit to countries of South and South East Asia. In any case, it was impossible to consider new memorandum with care it demanded since Spender was simultaneously pressing that Conference should conclude that night. He had also made our position more difficult by producing, without notice, a suggested passage for inclusion in report on the subject of emergency relief supplies.

4. After hurried consultation with members of delegation, I decided that this was an occasion for firmness. Without awaiting expression of views of other delegates I said I would find it very difficult even to consider these two new Australian papers. I had already communicated with my colleagues on basis of modified Australian proposal for technical assistance. It would be highly embarrassing if that basis were to be altered at eleventh hour. I also referred specifically to passage which I have quoted in paragraph 2 above. If it were desired to conclude the Conference according to schedule, the only proper course, in my view, would be defer consideration of these two subjects until the next meeting of the Consultative Committee in September.

5. This stand was supported by Doidge of New Zealand and Ahmed Khan of Pakistan.[12] I was somewhat disappointed Lord MacDonald did not oppose outright reintroduction of Australian proposals which had been dropped two days earlier. He may have felt, however, he had done his fair share in private talks he had had with Spender the previous evening.

6. Having been forced to recognize quite a few of us were not prepared to go awaltzing with Matilda, Spender again gave way and agreed that if a reference were made both to emergency relief supplies and to stop-gap credits in the report these two subjects might be deferred until next meeting of the Committee. So the matter was left. Although the Australian attempt to reintroduce their proposal was decisively and satisfactorily defeated, I have thought it necessary to outline sequence of events in some detail in view of reports which have appeared in Sydney papers this morning and which may be repeated in Canadian press to the effect that the conference had considered favourably Australian scheme to provide stopgap credits estimated at possibly 15 million pounds sterling over the next eighteen months. There is no, repeat no, foundation whatsoever for these stories.

7. We believe report of Conference, although of course it does not coincide exactly at every point with our own views, does not contain anything which might prove embarrassing to the Canadian Government. We also believe it represents a genuine if limited step towards promoting economic development of South and South East Asia.

8. At an early point in the Conference, Mudaliar referred to fermenting of new wine in Asia and to problem which it created. As you will have inferred from these telegrams, however, our chief problem arose rather from fermenting of new wine in the Australian Cabinet.

9. My immediately following telegram deals with your message of May 18th† on technical assistance. Ends.

Following from the Canadian delegation to the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on Economic Aid to South and South East Asia, Begins: No. 9. I am much obliged to you for the speed with which you returned an answer to my telegram No. 6 on technical assistance. Because of final turbulence in the Conference, which is described in my immediately preceding telegram, it was not necessary to say anything further about the Canadian position on technical assistance until late in the evening. The receipt of your message,† however, early in the morning made my task considerably easier during the somewhat confusing events of the day.

2. Lord MacDonald had stated on Wednesday that he would recommend to the United Kingdom Government that they should make a contribution to the new Commonwealth scheme of technical assistance to South and South East Asia. On Thursday he received authorization from Whitehall to announce that the United Kingdom would contribute 35 percent. Accordingly, he made an announcement to this effect late yesterday evening after the draft report had been approved. I then said I had been in communication with my colleagues on this subject and that, as a result, I was now in a position to state that I would recommend to the Canadian Government that they should contribute to the technical assistance scheme.

3. In view of the fact that my brief statement had to be made in the dying moments of the Conference, I did not think it appropriate to mention the three topics on which further information would be required in Ottawa before a decision could be taken as to the size and form of a possible Canadian contribution. In any case it would have been unnecessary to raise the question of who should make the final decision about expenditures. In paragraph four of my telegram No. 6 I reported that I thought the Conference would agree that arrangements for technical assistance to be negotiated within the ambit of the scheme should be on a bilateral basis. In the event this point was settled in one of the recommendations approved by the Conference. It reads as follows: "Assistance provided under the Commonwealth scheme will be arranged on a bilateral basis by agreement between applicant countries and contributing countries in respect of each application for assistance and terms and conditions upon which such assistance shall be afforded will in every case be solely a matter for Governments concerned".

4. The delegation is going to Canberra tomorrow and a full set of documents† of the Conference will be despatched to you from there by air bag on Thursday, May 25th. They will be accompanied by a despatch† drawing your attention to those documents which deal with technical assistance. If possible, some comments on them will also be included. Ends.

II. COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTH EAST ASIA; REPORT; INVITATION TO ASIAN COUNTRIES.

6. Mr. LePan said that Canada had participated in the Sydney Conference primarily for two reasons: because of our interest in the possibility of communist domination of the area and because the initiative taken in the Colombo resolution held forth some promise of bringing about a fresh injection of U.S. dollars into world trade. As the Conference developed, the tactics of the Australian government produced an atmosphere in which a reasoned consideration of the economic issues became extremely difficult. Certain parts of the Australian proposals were rejected or reduced and at the end there remained two principal recommendations: one for a programme for economic development (really based on a proposal by the United Kingdom) and one concerning a scheme for technical assistance. The circumstances of the Conference and its brevity had made full consideration impossible but, on the whole, the results were not unsatisfactory.

The plan for economic development involved the submission to governments in the area, which were participating or which decided to be associated, of questionnaires to be completed setting forth a programme of economic development for each country and indicating the extent to which the programme could be met by the countries themselves and the extent to which external assistance would be required. The programmes would be considered at a meeting to be held in London in the autumn and thereafter it would be for each Commonwealth country to determine to what extent it could contribute to their accomplishment. Once the overall plan had been consolidated, it would probably be communicated to the United States and it was contemplated that individual Commonwealth countries making a contribution might approach the United States to see whether any further assistance could be provided from there.

The plan for technical assistance called for a total contribution of £8 million over a period of three years. It was to be supplemental to the United Nations technical assistance programme. The figure of £8 million had been suggested by the Australian government and it was rather hard to know how it had been arrived at. The Australian and U.K. governments had each agreed to underwrite 35 per cent, New Zealand was contributing 10 per cent and India a fixed amount that came to approximately 11 per cent. No specific commitment had been made with regard to a Canadian contribution. As to the operation of the plan, there was no thought that funds would be placed at the disposal of a central bureau. The intention rather was that the individual countries would undertake to provide assistance services up to the maximum of the amount they had underwritten.

7. Mr. Deutsch said that a question for consideration was whether, in this matter, the Canadian position was not more nearly similar to that of the United States than of the other Commonwealth countries. In so far as the economic development programmes involved dollar aid our situation was analogous to that of the United States. A further question arose as to whether Canada, as an active partner in the origins of the programme, would be expected to do proportionately more in the contribution of dollar assistance than the United States. If so, it might be questioned how realistic such a possibility was in relation to our fiscal and budgetary position.

8. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the government was not committed to any specific action with regard to whatever programmes might emerge from the proposed London meeting in the autumn. We were, however, committed to participate in the general work of the Consultative Committee and it seemed clear that Canada should be associated with the invitation which the Government of Australia proposed to send to non-Commonwealth governments in South and South East Asia. So far as the technical assistance programme was concerned, a recommendation would be placed before the Cabinet to have an annual contribution of $500,000 authorized for each of the three years of operation. The method of providing technical assistance within this limit would be for subsequent determination.

9. The Committee, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted the report concerning the Sydney Conference and plans relating to the economic development programmes and scheme for technical assistance; and

(b) agreed that Canada be associated with the invitation to be extended by the Australian government to the governments of non-Commonwealth countries in South and South East Asia to participate in the programmes agreed on at the Sydney Conference.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA; TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, at the Sydney Conference in May, the Commonwealth Consultative Committee had agreed to recommend to their respective governments that a Commonwealth technical assistance scheme be organized to provide aid to meet the urgent needs of the countries of South and South-east Asia. It was recommended that assistance be provided up to a maximum value of £8 million sterling over a period of three years commencing

July 1st, 1950. Of this fund, the Governments of Australia and the United Kingdom had each agreed to provide 35 per cent. New Zealand was contributing 10 per cent and India approximately the same amount.

No commitment had been made by Canada, but it had been planned to recommend that $500,000 per year be contributed for each of the years of operation of the scheme. In view of the considerations already mentioned with regard to the United Nations technical assistance programme, it seemed desirable to reduce this sum to $400,000.[13]

12. The Prime Minister said that it was important to ensure that there be no duplication between the United Nations programme and the one agreed to at Sydney. The most satisfactory arrangement would be to have both handled through the same organization and Canadian efforts should be directed toward integrating the two programmes to as large an extent as possible.

13. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed

(a) that a contribution of $400,000 be made to the technical assistance programme recommended by the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South-east Asia for the 12 months beginning July 1st, 1950; and,

(b) that Canadian representatives endeavour to have measures taken to ensure that there be no duplication between the work of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee's technical assistance programme and that established by the United Nations, and that everything possible be done to merge the two schemes.

1. The Interdepartmental Committee approved, with one minor amendment, the draft instructions† to the Canadian delegation and these will now go forward for Cabinet approval. The amendment is in the last sentence of the first paragraph. The words "work of" are replaced by "problems confronted by".

2. The Committee was much concerned about the general trend of Commonwealth plans for assistance in South and Southeast Asia. These were laid many months ago under conditions very different from those of today. They depend heavily on the willingness of the United States to participate. Yet it is very doubtful how far Congress will go under present conditions to finance Asian development and doubly doubtful whether it will be willing to provide assistance to the area through machinery set up under Commonwealth auspices. The possibility of a continuation of the Marshall Plan raises new issues, particularly since the urgent need for direct United States assistance in the area was partly predicated on the termination of the existing plan, and the resulting inability of the United Kingdom and other European countries to continue their own assistance in the area. Further misgivings are aroused by accumulating evidence that the countries in the area are themselves reluctant to participate in the scheme.

3. There seems to be a real danger that the London meetings may end in failure and disillusionment. Under present conditions in Asia this might have very unfortunate and far reaching results.

4. The Interdepartmental Committee suggested that Mr. Pearson might take advantage of the North Atlantic Council Meeting in New York this month to discuss this situation with Mr. Acheson and Mr. Bevin. I understand from Mr. Pearson that he is willing to do so. The subject might also be discussed with Mr. Spender who, I understand, will be in New York for the United Nations General Assembly.

5. Meanwhile I would be grateful to have your comments and suggestions.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

My WA-2043 of September 7th.† United States attitude towards Commonwealth Consultative Committee.

1. Yesterday evening Matthews and Ignatieff had a talk with Labouisse, who said he had had further talks with Thorp, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, and McGhee, Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

2. Labouisse dealt with the South and South East Asian area in three divisions. (1) The Philippines and Indonesia, where he implied the United States planning was far advanced and these might well be regarded as the primary responsibility of the United States. (2) Burma, Indo-China and Thailand. The United States planning for this area is fairly detailed and insofar as the funds available this year are concerned a decision has been reached as to what should be made available to each country and what should be allocated to agriculture, health, education and transportation in each country. Mr. McGhee will be in London about the 15th of this month and intends to make available to the Commonwealth group the details of these plans. Labouisse said that it would be desirable to coordinate Commonwealth and United States planning in this area and that he felt United States plans should be the basis of that coordination.

3. The third area is India, Pakistan and Ceylon. Labouisse said that thinking had gone much further than he had previously realized concerning these areas. However, for this area no detailed planning has taken place, but it has been decided that substantial appropriations will be sought for aid, particularly to India, in the next fiscal year. The United States would welcome a Commonwealth assessment as to the type of aid required and the manner in which aid might best be used in this area, and Labouisse suggested that Commonwealth planning might well be the basis of coordination in this area. Labouisse said it would be unfortunate if the Commonwealth scheme were presented to the United States as a request for any definite sum of money. He added that the Commonwealth scheme should be drafted so that it stood on its own and was not conditional upon further aid coming from the United States. The Commonwealth plan would undoubtedly show a large gap between requirements and aid available and the United States could then consider meeting part of the deficiency.

4. Labouisse had had further talks with Acheson, who had told him it would be impossible in any presentation to Congress to tie in aid with any easing of the British position on sterling balances. He said, however, that if Congressional approval of appropriations to be requested were forthcoming it might be possible to tie the two in together administratively.

5. Labouisse went on to say that State Department were anxious to receive informal Canadian opinion as to the best manner in which the United States contribution to the South Asian (particularly India) problem might be made. He pointed out that in the United States Administration any suggestions coming from the United Kingdom or other members of the sterling area might be suspect owing to their direct self interest in the sterling balance problem, while on the other hand Canadian opinion would be most helpful. He discussed the desirability of some Canadian official who had been closely involved in the consideration of this problem, (perhaps Mr. Plumptre) coming to Washington in the fairly near future.

Reference your telegram No. 1305, September 7th. Commonwealth Consultative Committee.
Following for Heeney from Wilgress, Begins: I share your concern that failure to secure the cooperation of non-Commonwealth Governments in South East Asia is likely to have unfortunate implications for the work of the Consultative Committee on the development programme. Not only would the narrower Commonwealth approach no doubt prove less attractive to the United States, but it probably could be fairly effectively represented by Soviet propaganda simply as an endeavour of the Commonwealth and the United States further to extend their influence in this area. The danger from this point of view would, of course, be much less if Burma, Indonesia and Thailand, as well as the Associated States of Indo China, were willing partners in the venture. As you know, a renewed effort is being made to interest these Governments in the plan, and it is probably too early to rule out the possibility that they will be represented at the meetings projected for October 2nd to 7th. In this connection Otto Clark has told us that he understands that the United States representatives in the region have been instructed to suggest to the Governments concerned that they accept the invitation to come to London. This would seem to indicate a rather more active interest in the work of the Consultative Committee, at least in the State Department, than might have been assumed. In this regard you may be interested to know that the United Kingdom has had the Griffin report[14]

2. From what Otto Clark has said to Canada House officials, I judge that the United Kingdom is perhaps less concerned than the Canadian authorities about the possibility of an unfavourable United States reaction to the Commonwealth initiative. While recognizing that the conflict in Korea has substantially altered the situation existing at the time of the Colombo and Sydney meetings, they appear to think that the conflict may have given new emphasis to the importance of doing something positive to assist South and South East Asia. Whatever the progress of the United Nations campaign in Korea, the development of closer relations with friendly countries in that area, particularly India, will almost certainly have to be an important element in any United States or United Nations Far Eastern policy which will have a chance of succeeding. The report of the Consultative Committee will provide an early opportunity for improving such relations, in the view of United Kingdom officials, and is therefore likely to be welcomed by the United States.

3. Concerning the report itself, as you know, the introductory chapters are to be framed to highlight the problems of the area as a whole. It is not envisaged that the report itself would be designed only for United States consumption. It would be addressed to the world, and presumably would emphasize the needs of the area as a whole, although of course more detail would be given with respect to countries which had submitted programmes. If the report takes this form, it would not prejudice the question of whether or not an approach is to be made to the United States, nor would it preclude the possibility of any Commonwealth assistance being integrated with that being planned by the United States or by United Nations agencies.

4. The United Kingdom does not consider that a formal indication of United States willingness to receive and give favourable consideration to the report of the Consultative Committee should necessarily be a prerequisite to its publication. In their view, such a formal approach at this stage might result in an unconsidered refusal, or the suggestion of unnecessary modifications, which might prejudice the future position. Publication before or simultaneously with an approach to the United States might be of assistance through the mobilization of public opinion to those elements in the United States Administration in favour of some substantial assistance to the area. Meanwhile, it is of course intended that the United States will be kept informed on progress in the preparation of the report.

5. From a first review of the programme, it would appear that the amount of external [assistance?] requested is probably small in relation to the real needs of the area. The programmes appear to be realistic in relation to what the countries themselves could support by way of development at the end of the six year period. From what Otto Clark has said, I think that the United Kingdom feels that the programmes might have been somewhat larger if the primary objective had been to secure an immediate or substantial improvement in living conditions in the area, without so much regard for the ability of the countries concerned to sustain the level from their own resources at the end of the six years. It may be that the United States would prefer some more drastic approach to the problem, but my own view is that the degree of moderation shown in the programmes is likely to commend the report to those countries and agencies which may be asked to extend assistance.

6. In my own view, the most important problem at the moment is to secure the cooperation of the non-Commonwealth South East Asian countries. In the meantime, I think the preparation of the report as envisaged might go forward. The final chapters, which are of course the most important in relation to the possibility of an approach to the United States, could always be altered at the ministerial stage of the meetings at the end of the month, when we may have a clearer idea about the position of Burma, Thailand and Indonesia, and about the state of United States opinion. Ends.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA — INSTRUCTIONS FOR LONDON MEETINGS

I attach draft instructions to the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee for South and South-East Asia in London, September 25th to October 7th.

These instructions have been agreed by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy.

I recommend that they be accepted.[15]

Instructions provisoires à la délégation canadienne à la deuxième réunion du Comité consultatif sur le Commonwealth pour l'Asie du Sud et du Sud-Est, Londres, du 25 septembre au 7 octobre

Draft Instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the Second Meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee for South and South East Asia, London, September 25-October 7

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 11, 1950

General—The Delegation should indicate that the Canadian Government is keenly aware the world situation is very different today from what it was last May when the first meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee was held to consider economic development in South and South East Asia. The military action against aggression in Korea has, in the view of the Canadian Government, in no way diminished but, on the contrary, accentuated the need for improved economic, political and social conditions in Asia. In the view of the Canadian Government, therefore, the turn of events has made the problems confronted by the Commonwealth Consultative Committee more important than ever.

Guiding Principles—It appears probable that the discussions in London will centre around the implementation of the seven-year development programme for South and South East Asia recommended at Sydney. In this connection, special emphasis will no doubt be placed on the possible participation of the United States and careful attention given to the form of the Report on plans for economic development in the Area which is expected to emerge from the Conference and which may be used as a basis for a joint approach to the United States Government by the members of the Consultative Committee.

Four main considerations should guide the attitude adopted by the Canadian Delegation during the course of the London meeting. They are:

(a) The weakness of the Marshall Plan approach to the problem of economic development in Asia.

(b) The limited resources available within the Commonwealth for economic development in the Area.

(c) The importance of United States support and participation.

(d) The strength of the spirit of nationalism in Asia.

Each of these considerations is dealt with briefly below.

(a) The Weakness of the Marshall Plan Approach to the Problem of Economic Development in Asia — There is naturally a tendency to model an approach to the problem of economic development in Asia on the Marshall Plan. The circumstances, however, surrounding the growth of the European Recovery Programme are not repeated in the situation in Asia. A convenient yardstick was available in Western Europe to calculate the amount of outside assistance required to reach a clearly defined goal which was not beyond the bounds of possibility. By aiming at a standard of living approximating the pre-war level, a gap in the balance of payments could be arrived at, which it was hoped to eliminate (or at least reduce to manageable proportions) at the end of four years. There is no such yardstick available for economic development plans in Asia. In that area new ground must be broken. The goal is a much higher level of life in a vast and populous region than has ever before been achieved. Its attainment is essentially a matter of growth and the creation of a favourable environment which depends on many things including a suitable fiscal policy, conservation of resources for the most important uses and intelligent timing of the projects to be undertaken.

There are, however, certain aspects common to recovery in Europe and economic development in Asia. In both cases self help and mutual assistance are of great importance. In addition any external financial assistance extended in Asia will of course be reflected in the balance of payments of the countries concerned. The essential distinction is that, in the presentation of the Marshall Plan, the goal to be achieved indicated the amount of aid required. A parallel approach in Asia is obviously impossible. Indeed in that Area circumstances impose the opposite approach; plans for economic development must be cut to fit the amount of outside assistance available. The Canadian Delegation should therefore emphasize the view of the Canadian Government that the need for external assistance, vital though it is, should be viewed in clearer perspective than is afforded by expressing the problem of economic development in terms of a gap in balance of payments. In taking this position the Delegation will of course make it clear that the Canadian Government fully recognizes the urgent need for economic development in Asia and the essential part of external financial assistance in meeting that need.

(b) The Limited Resources Available within the Commonwealth for Economic Development in the Area — In approaching the problem of economic development in Asia the Canadian Delegation should bear in mind that the resources available within the Commonwealth are very limited in relation to the proportions of the task. It is the view of the Canadian Government that it would be the part of wisdom for members of the Consultative Committee to face this fact realistically in order to avoid risking the real dangers of subsequent disappointment and disillusionment. The Canadian Delegation should indicate that in view of budgetary considerations, the fact that there is no substantial surplus in our current account balance of payments, the necessity for increased defence expenditures and our general obligations in the North Atlantic area, the Canadian Government is unable, at this time, to undertake definite commitments with respect to economic development in Asia. But the Canadian Government recognizes the importance of healthy and stable conditions in the countries of Asia and it would be prepared, if it appeared likely that the United States Government would participate in a general development plan for the Area, to give sympathetic and earnest consideration to the question of participation.

(c) The Importance of United States Support and Participation — In view of the limited resources available within the Commonwealth, the participation of the United States in any plan is obviously of paramount importance. The Report of the Committee should therefore give credit to the United States for the action it is already taking in the fields of technical assistance and economic development in Indo-China, Burma, Malaya, Thailand and Indonesia. The Report should avoid any implication that the activities of the Consultative Committee constitute a lead which the United States might follow. On the contrary, the general approach should be calculated to promote the integration of all efforts towards economic development in the Area.

(d) The Strength of the Spirit of Nationalism in Asia — The Delegation should show a sympathetic understanding of the spirit of independence which is taking a highly nationalistic turn in present-day Asia. In this respect the Canadian Delegation should be in a preferred position: free from the shadow of the past and patently motivated by a disinterested desire to see the countries of Asia work out their own destinies in peace and freedom. The Delegation should bear in mind that the memory and fear of colonialism is even now a stronger force in Asia than opposition to Communism. The Delegation should not hesitate, if the opportunity occurs, to attempt to remove any obstacles to agreement which may arise from suspicion of latent colonialism from the West.

Form and Purpose of the Proposed Report — The considerations above lead to certain conclusions about the position that the Delegation should adopt with regard to the form and purpose of this Report which is expected to emerge from the Conference. In this connection there appear to be two basic alternatives:

(a) the Report could be primarily designed to attract the participation of the United States Government in the development programme described therein; or

(b) the Report could take the form of a record of the needs of the Area and the development plans of the countries concerned including information on specific projects, priorities etc. Some reference to the need for external aid in order to carry out the development programmes would logically be included but such a Report would be a straightforward document free of any of the coloring inherent under the first alternative.

The Canadian Government is concerned that if alternative (a) receives favourable consideration at London, the essential conditions for its success are assured as far as possible before a final decision is reached. In the view of the Canadian Government these essential conditions are:

(i) A clear indication that such a Report would be welcomed by the United States Government. It is apparently thought that if the Report is used as a basis of a joint approach, the United States Administration would then seek Congressional approval for United States participation in the development programme set out in the Report. Before the first step is taken in this direction the Canadian Government wishes to be as sure as possible that this method of approaching the problem of economic development in Asia is in accordance with the United States thinking and will be followed through if initiated. Preliminary informal enquiries in this connection are being made by the Canadian Embassy in Washington.

(ii) A clear indication of real support on the part of the Asian countries concerned for a Report in this form to be used as a basis of a joint approach to the United States.

(iii) A clear indication that the Asian members of the Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth countries in South and South East Asia would be prepared to enter into the kind of international programme envisaged with enthusiasm, determination and realism.

If all these components are assured, the Canadian Delegation should accept alternative (a) and seek to influence the form and content of the Report accordingly.

If, however, any of the above constituents is lacking the Canadian Delegation should press for a factual Report under alternative (b). In the event this alternative is pursued, the Committee might find it valuable to consider the economic development of Asia through the use of existing machinery. In this connection, the possibility of channelling external assistance through such agencies as the International Bank, Food and Agricultural Organization and Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East might be explored.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH EAST ASIA

The Ministerial meetings will begin on Monday morning with a public session, the proceedings of which will be broadcast. All the Ministerial representatives are to speak. The agenda for the Ministers is as follows: consideration of the draft report prepared by officials on the economic development of South East Asia, consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Technical Assistance, position of the non-Commonwealth Governments in the area, the nature of the continuing organization, and priority economic requirements (Spender's proposals for immediate short term economic assistance).

2. The drafting of the report on economic development has been completed and it will be available to Ministers at the opening of the meetings. The report itself is very largely factual and contains no recommendations. It is not addressed specifically to the United States, but to the world in general. The report is also so framed as not to imply the endorsement of individual country programmes by other members of the Commonwealth. However, it is intended that, towards the end of the Conference, Ministers will be expected to agree to recommend to their Governments that they should approve the report as a whole. This will mean that Commonwealth Governments will subscribe to its broad findings. Ministers are being asked in particular to consider the following matters which so far have been left open in the report:

"Individual Country Programmes. It was decided at the Commonwealth Consultative Committee meeting at Sydney that there should be no "screening" of country programmes by the Consultative Committee, except to ensure consistency as between the various facts and figures in the report. Nor did the preliminary meeting of officials preparing the draft report concern themselves with the assessment of priorities as between projects in individual country programmes or the relative magnitudes of the programmes themselves.

Financial Assistance from Commonwealth Sources. The preliminary meeting of officials decided that the question of the extent of the financial assistance to be provided by Commonwealth countries under the plan was a matter to be reserved for discussion by Ministers. Provision is made in the report for the insertion of the conclusion which may be reached on the matter.

Position of Non-Commonwealth Countries. The report refers in general terms to the similar position arising in the non-Commonwealth countries of Burma, Indonesia, Siam and Indo-China, although these countries have not so far provided information on the lines of the Commonwealth countries. It was felt that the report would be incomplete without some reference to the identical economic problems of all countries in the area. The report also refers to the possibility of non-Commonwealth countries cooperating in the programme in the future. Since important policy questions are raised by the problem of associating non-Commonwealth countries with the report and the future programme which it outlines, a separate paper on this matter has been put up to Ministers. (See paragraph 4 below).

Title of Report. This will be of some importance if the report is published, and it should be acceptable to the countries in South and South-East Asia including non-Commonwealth countries. It is important, bearing these countries in mind, that the title should not emphasize the "Commonwealth" aspect and should be suitable for presentation in the United States. The following titles are suggested for consideration:

The Colombo Plan for South and South-East Asia
Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia
A Plan for Economic Advance in South and South-East Asia.

Publication of the Report. Officials decided that the question of publication of the report was an important one which must be reserved for Ministers. But the report was drafted on the assumption that Governments might decide to publish it."

3. With respect to the report of the Standing Committee on Technical Assistance, Ministers will be asked to consider and approve the draft constitution of the Bureau drawn up at Colombo. We will attempt to have the Constitution altered in accordance with suggestions made by Mr. Johnson, but we are doubtful that we will be successful.

4. Concerning the position of non-Commonwealth Governments in the area, officials have made the following suggestions for consideration by Ministers in connection with the meeting with non-Commonwealth representatives scheduled for October 2nd.

"Commonwealth Ministers

(a) Should make every effort to obtain as large a degree as possible of endorsement of the report by the non-Commonwealth Governments; for this purpose the possibility should remain open for a full discussion of the report as prepared by the Commonwealth countries of the area.

(b) Should this course become impracticable, inform non-Commonwealth representatives in general terms of the scope and nature of the Commonwealth proposals and provide them with copies of the report for transmission to their Governments, pointing out that there are general references throughout the report to the economic position of the non-Commonwealth countries, the insertion of which was inevitable in order to give a picture of the area as a whole.

(c) and request them;

(i) to recommend to their Governments approval of the aims and objects of the report, as well as of the references in it to the non-Commonwealth countries;

(ii) to urge notification by their Governments, if they see merit in the plan, of their approval of the report by, say, October 20th so that there shall be the least possible delay in the preparatory work required for implementation of the plan;

(iii) to suggest to their Governments that representatives of the latter should meet with representatives of the Commonwealth Governments at a date to be fixed later to discuss further advancement of the plan in respect of their own development needs on the basis of material already submitted or which might subsequently be submitted;

(iv) to suggest to their Governments that they should agree to participate forthwith in the technical assistance scheme without prejudice to their decision to participate in the six-year development plan".

5. The subject of the nature of the continuing organization is entirely open and has not yet even been thoroughly considered by officials.

6. On the question of the priority of economic requirements you will recall that following the Sydney Conference this item was to have a high place on the agenda of the London meeting. However, in the meantime, it appears that the enthusiasm of the Australians, at least at the official level, has waned very considerably. The Australian officials do not know, however, whether or not Mr. Spender will have any specific proposals to make. At any rate, the matter is to be placed far down on the agenda.

7. Conversations with the American liaison officer here have elicited the information that the United States prefer not to have too much publicity for the report at this stage owing to the multiplicity of other projects before Congress at this time.

TELEGRAM 1837 London, September 25, 1950

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

My telegram No. 1835 of September 23rd: Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South East Asia.

The United States Government have now transmitted to the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington their comments on the revised synopsis which was submitted to them by the United Kingdom as a result of agreement with other members of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee. The United States authorities would welcome a report along these lines and say that it would be useful to them in developing their ideas and plans for extending assistance to South and South East Asia.

2. They have added three particular comments:

(a) The report should not be cast in the form of a bill to be presented to the United States;

(b) Although in the view of the administration whatever grants are made to the area should be "untied", they would hope that the report would not insist on "untied" assistance as a condition of a satisfactory scheme. On the other hand, they would have no objection if the argument of the report were to point clearly in that direction.

(c) They are content that the case for financial assistance should be based both on the need for economic development in the countries in the area and on the importance of the area in attempts to restore a multilateral system; but they would prefer stress to be laid on the first argument rather than on the second. All of these points would seem to have been taken into account in drafting the report as it stands at present.

3. In speaking to Rowan,[16] Labouisse suggested that after the conference is over the report should not be communicated formally to the United States Government but should merely be handed to the United States Liaison Officer here in London. Within a few weeks Mr. Acheson would hope to make favourable mention of the report in public; and it might be published shortly after that.

4. In view of this renewed indication of sympathetic interest in Washington and of active prosecution there of plans for financial aid to South and South East Asia, there is a widespread feeling here that the Consultative Committee should try to go

[16] Sir (Thomas) Leslie Rowan, directeur exécutif du Royaume-Uni de la Banque internationale pour la reconstruction et le développement.
Sir (Thomas) Leslie Rowan, Executive Director for United Kingdom of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

at least a little distance towards deciding what type of organization would be best if and when the United States decides to participate. Opinion seems to be in favour of an organization on which donors and recipients would sit as equals tackling a common problem. This organization would of course have to be supplemented by bilateral agreements between the United States and recipient countries and also by United States missions in those countries, although if such missions could be camouflaged within United States Embassies that would seem to be desirable. The functions of the collective organization would be to provide a forum for the discussion of development problems in South and South East Asia, to review progress and draw up periodic reports. It is argued that this type of organization is to be preferred to the OEEC type because

(a) It would be more acceptable to Asian susceptibilities, and

(b) It would more easily permit participation by Commonwealth countries outside the area.

5. Obviously there is a danger that, if the Consultative Committee were to go very far in considering these questions of organization before it was clear that the United States aid would be forthcoming and if these discussions were to come to the ears of United States authorities (as they almost certainly would), the administration might be irritated that the Consultative Committee seemed to be jumping the gun. We have been somewhat worried on this score. On the other hand, the United Kingdom representatives have argued forcibly that they will certainly be approached by the United States on the question of organization as soon as the present meetings are over; and they would like to be in a position to indicate what form of organization would be most acceptable particularly to the Asian members of the Consultative Committee. The Indian representatives have also stated privately that they hope the Committee will discuss this subject, since that would be helpful to them in raising it with their own Government and in particular in pointing out that United States aid can hardly be expected unless India is prepared to accept some kind of scrutiny and supervision of the use made of whatever financial assistance may be provided. As a way out of the difficulty, it has been suggested that a paper on organization containing recommendations should be submitted by officials to Ministers at this meeting of the Consultative Committee. Ministers would discuss it, but would not come to any conclusion. However, at the end of the discussion the Chairman would state that in his view there seemed to be a consensus in favour of the recommendations made in the paper submitted by officials. Such a record in the minutes would not be binding on any Government but would be sufficient to serve the purpose of the United Kingdom and Indian delegations. It would therefore seem to be a satisfactory compromise.

6. If, as now seems likely, the United States administration makes use of the report in some form and goes forward with plans for financial aid to South and South East Asia, the next step will probably be a request by Washington for further information from the recipient countries. It is felt that the weaker brethren, particularly Pakistan and Ceylon, would not be able to cope effectively with such requests. For that reason thought is being given to how they might best be provided with technical advice. It has been suggested that the Standing Committee which met in Colombo this summer should be kept in existence for this purpose and, if need be, should meet towards the end of the year in one or other of the Asian capitals in order to help Pakistan and Ceylon in supplying whatever further information is requested by the United States. This would seem to be a sensible suggestion. If done unobtrusively, it would result in the countries concerned receiving the advice that they may need without arousing suspicions in Washington that an attempt is being made to maintain control from London.

7. In an informal conversation with the United States Liaison Officer, it was suggested to us that it would not be desirable to propose in the report that aid to South and South East Asia should be funnelled through a Commonwealth organization.

Reference Commonwealth Consultative Committee.

1. The Committee has been examining the draft report prepared by officials on economic development in South East Asia. No significant issues have arisen, but in the next day or two we will come up against the difficult question of what is to be said in the report regarding the financial assistance which Commonwealth Governments can make available. At every opportunity we have endeavoured to steer matters in such a way that the report would not say anything involving any commitment on the part of any Government. The draft report prepared by the officials contains no proposals, but simply draws the attention of the Ministers to the question.

2. The total external financial assistance required to carry out the development programmes covered in the report, namely, those for India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya and British Borneo, is calculated to be approximately one billion pounds sterling over the six year period. That of course does not include anything for the non-Commonwealth Governments whose programmes have not been received. The United Kingdom authorities have indicated to us that they now feel that it would be highly desirable if the Commonwealth countries who may be in a position to extend aid, namely, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Canada, could indicate in the report that they are prepared to supply a substantial part of the billion pounds. The United Kingdom authorities feel that the countries in South-East Asia would press very strongly for such an indication, and further, that if an indication were given it would help immensely in getting the remaining sizeable contribution required from the United States. The United Kingdom have informally discussed with us three possible alternative statements for inclusion in the report:

(a) An indication by each contributing Commonwealth Government, namely, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Canada, of the amount of financial assistance it is prepared to provide over the six year period;

(b) An indication of the proportion of the total amount of one billion pounds which the contributing Commonwealth Governments as a group would be prepared to undertake, say 50 percent, without any breakdown as between different contributing Governments; and

(c) An indication in general terms that the contributing Commonwealth Governments would be prepared to provide substantial assistance by way of releases from sterling balances, use of their subscription to the International Bank, loans raised in private capital markets, and possibly Government to Government loans, without stating any percentage of the total which this assistance might comprise and without reference to what individual Governments might be prepared to do.

3. In the informal discussions of this matter with the United Kingdom representatives we have made it very clear that the delegation is in no position to agree to any statement in the report which would recommend to the Canadian Government or in any way commit the Canadian Government by implication or otherwise to any financial assistance. We have made it very clear that this is a matter which the Canadian Government would have to consider in the light of the report which it has not yet seen, and in the light of many other important factors, including of course any concrete action taken by the United States. The United Kingdom apparently has in mind a figure regarding its contribution which it would be prepared to make (mainly sterling balance releases). It has in mind also figures which it would hope it could persuade Australia and New Zealand to agree to. They have not yet, however, had any concrete indication from the latter two countries. The United Kingdom it appears would be prepared to go at least as far as a statement along the lines of alternative (b) in the report. However, they have not yet come to a firm conclusion.

4. We are continuing to take the position that it is not desirable to attempt to say anything in the report regarding the measure of financial assistance which contributing Commonwealth Governments would be prepared to provide. It is possible, however, that every attempt will be made to get us to agree to go at least as far as a statement along the lines of alternative (c). If all the others agree on a proposal of this kind despite our arguments, we will be in a position of either having to fall in line or to ask for the insertion of a statement which specifically reserves the Canadian position. It is not yet clear whether such a situation will arise, since the discussion is still proceeding on an informal and behind the scenes basis. However, we would be grateful for further guidance at the earliest possible time.

Ministers discussed today question of what should be said in the report on economic development regarding the financial assistance available from Commonwealth countries. The United Kingdom circulated a draft proposal along the lines of alternative "C" outlined in our telegram under reference. Mr. Spender of Australia opened the discussion. It was apparent from his remarks that he preferred to say very little on this matter in the report at this stage. He wanted to have more time for consultation with his Government. Mr. Mayhew explained why it was not possible for us to agree to any statement in the report which can be taken to imply a commitment on the part of the Canadian Government in any shape or form. He argued that it would be desirable not to state anything in the report regarding what Commonwealth Governments might be able to do, for this is a matter which would clearly have to be considered by Governments. The Canadian position was supported by New Zealand. The representative of the Asian countries appeared to understand this position. Officials were then instructed to prepare a draft in the light of the Ministerial discussions.

2. The draft which has now been prepared by officials contains a description of the various possible sources of external finance, such as the use of sterling balances, International Bank, loans raised by Governments in private capital markets, borrowing by private enterprise from private investors, and Government loans to Governments, without stating possible amounts or involving any undertaking on the part of any Government. It then goes on to say:

"The Commonwealth Governments are considering to what extent the external finance requirements can be provided by their countries under the five headings above. But the task of providing this financial support for the development of South and South-East Asia is manifestly not one which can be tackled by the Commonwealth alone. The need to increase the standard of living in South and South-East Asia is a problem of concern to every country in the world, not only as an end in itself, but also because the political stability of the area and its economic progress are of vital concern to the world."

3. It is probable that this draft will be acceptable to the Consultative Committee. Ends.

COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH EAST ASIA

The meetings of the Committee were concluded today. The draft report on economic development has been approved by Ministers. It was decided that the report will be published, but not immediately. It is hoped, however, that publication may take place as soon as possible, perhaps in three or four weeks' time after Governments have had the chance to look at it and after there has been some opportunity of obtaining United States views regarding the exact timing which might be convenient from their standpoint. It was decided also to prepare a popular version of the report which will not be published, however, until after there has been an indication of whether or not the United States will participate in the scheme.

2. The discussions in the Committee proceeded throughout in a most friendly and constructive spirit. On every hand there was a desire to do a workmanlike job and no untoward or awkward incidents were encountered.

3. The paragraph in the report concerning the question of financial assistance available from Commonwealth Governments is identical with the quotation contained in paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 1875 of September 29th.

4. An agreed communiqué was drawn up at the conclusion of the meetings. The text is being forwarded in a following telegram.†

CONFIDENTIAL

(For consideration under Item 4 of the Agenda for October 20, 1950)

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE, LONDON, SEPT. 25-OCT. 4

The chief accomplishment of the meeting in London of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South and South-East Asia was the preparation of a draft report on a six-year plan of economic development in the area. A copy of this report is attached.† In the view of the Canadian delegation it is a good document. It will no doubt play a significant role in the organization of practical measures for the improvement of economic conditions in South and South-East Asia. The six-year economic development programmes of each of the Commonwealth countries in the area, outlined in the report, are sensible, moderate and realistic in their general conception.

2. The first meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee in Sydney was marked by confusion and acrimony. It is not possible to understand the harmony which prevailed at the meeting in London without recalling some of the developments which had occurred between the meeting in Sydney and the meeting in London, and which smoothed the way for the drafting of the report.

3. The attack in June on the Republic of Korea and the lively reaction which that provoked throughout the whole of the free world, had made much more visible than previously the importance of Asia to the West and the way in which Western countries could not escape becoming involved in the event of Communist aggression in the Far East. Moreover, the apathy of the South Koreans, at least in the early stages of the campaign, had emphasized the importance of securing the support of Asian opinion. As a result, there was general agreement in London that the West must take whatever steps were open to it to prevent any further large segments of the Eurasian landmass from falling under Communist domination; and there was also general agreement that this could be done only if the peoples of Asia were given some real hope of an improved standard of living, which would involve financial assistance from outside the area.

4. On the other hand, there had also been developments which might have been expected to weaken or deflect the initiative which was taken at the meeting of the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers in Colombo and which was rescued at Sydney from confusion and collapse. It had been hoped at those previous meetings that non-Commonwealth countries in South and South-East Asia would be willing to participate fully in drawing up plans for economic development in the area. Indeed, much of the attractiveness of the original conception was to be found in the hope it held out that a conspectus could be drawn up of the needs of the area as a whole. In the event, however, it proved impossible for Burma, Thailand, Indonesia and the Associated States of Indo China to present at the meetings in London six-year development programmes for their own countries as had been contemplated at Sydney. The reasons for this failure were various. In large part, they are to be found in the administrative weakness and inexperience of these countries, all of which, with the exception of Thailand, have recently achieved independence and either are or have been disabled by civil war. Moreover, on some of these countries the effect of the initial reverses suffered by United Nations forces in Korea had been to make them even less willing than previously to commit themselves to one side or the other in the struggle between the Communists and the free world. For these reasons when the conference opened no programmes had been received from any of the non-Commonwealth countries in the area, and only Thailand and the Associated States of Indo China had agreed to be fully represented at that stage of the meetings to which non-Commonwealth countries had been invited. Burma and Indonesia were represented by observers.

5. Following the disturbing and irresponsible attitude taken by the Australians at Sydney the United Kingdom decided to take the initiative. United Kingdom officials made themselves available to give assistance and general guidance to the countries concerned in the preparation of the six-year development programmes. This helped greatly to bring the project down to earth and to avoid the elaboration of impractical schemes and unrealistic hopes.

6. Meanwhile an important change had been taking place in New Delhi. At the Colombo conference, Mr. Nehru spoke at length about the need for industrialisation in Asia. He said little, if anything, about the need for improved agricultural methods. It was only Mr. Ghulam Mohammed, Minister of Finance for Pakistan, who attempted to redress the balance. The minutes of the second meeting in Colombo record him as having said that, "while he was all in favour of industrialization, the main problem in Asia was the modernization of agriculture; and what these countries needed most was agricultural machinery, fertilisers, better techniques and an extension of the agricultural cooperative movement. He would like to see more fertiliser factories established and more technical knowledge acquired by their people." The Indian Government has now come around to that view. This was made clear in a very impressive statement by Mr. Chintaman Deshmukh, when he was presenting the Indian programme to the Consultative Committee. At one point in his statement he spoke as follows:

> "Some time ago, it was India's aspiration to go forward with large-scale modernised industry but the present emphasis on agricultural development and rural industry is due to a change in outlook brought about by a more practical appreciation of the needs of the problem as well as the nature of available resources. This kind of planning is in accord with the generally accepted wishes of the people in general and the Congress Party in particular, and it is also the kind of programme which accords with the generally expressed wishes of the people in the industrialised countries as to the appropriate character of plans for development in predominantly agricultural countries whose potential resources have not been fully developed."

This represents a remarkable and decisive change of outlook when set beside the climate of opinion which has existed in India ever since independence was achieved, and which animated the ambitious Bombay Plan and other plans presented at the same period designed to further rapid industrialisation.

7. As a result of these shifts in opinion which had been taking place between the meetings in Sydney and in London, it was possible to prepare a report of a much more realistic character than many of the participants had expected. In the programmes submitted by all the Commonwealth countries in the area chief stress is laid upon improvements in agriculture. Highest priority is given to projects for irrigation, jungle clearance, anti-waterlogging, for better fertilisers, better seeds and more efficient animal husbandry. In the words of paragraph 13 of Chapter VIII of the report, "In all the countries (except Singapore where the problems are entirely different) the programmes concentrate upon agriculture, transport and communications and electric power. These are the basic development requirements related to the overriding need to increase production of food and agricultural raw materials. They account for over 70 per cent of the total of the programmes."

8. Not only are the country programmes generally focussed in the right direction; they are all comparatively modest. The six-year programmes do represent in most cases a severe curtailment of the governments' previous hopes. The Indian Government, for example, has reduced the number of projects which it had under consideration, so that the total cost of the projects included in the six-year programme will amount to Rs. 18,400 million, instead of Rs. 32,190 million (paragraph 5, Chapter IV). Some indication has been given throughout the report in general terms that reductions in the programmes were dictated essentially by an appraisal of the amount of external finance which might be forthcoming. And the influence which this limitation had on drawing up the country programmes was to be even more plainly seen in the remarks made by officials of the countries concerned during the course of the preliminary meetings.

9. The total amount of external finances which will be required if the programmes are to be carried out, comes to £1,056 million over the six-year period. Of this amount £819 mm is stated to be required by India, £115 mm by Pakistan, £60 mm by Ceylon and £62 mm by Malaya and British Borneo. The terms and the precise methods under which this external financial assistance is to be provided is not discussed in the report. Also, no attempt is made in the report to analyse the appropriate form of external assistance, namely to what extent it should be in the form of grants, or in the form of loans. It is understood throughout that the precise nature of the external financial assistance to be made available is a matter to be decided later, and in particular by bilateral arrangement between the creditor and the recipient. Although it was universally recognised that much of the assistance required would have to come from the United States, no attempt has been made to specify the proportion which might be sought from that source. In the words to be found at the end of Chapter I, "The conception of the Commonwealth countries' approach to the problem is that a fresh impetus should be given to economic development in South and South-East Asia in order to increase production, raise standards of living, and thus enlarge the volume of trade around the world from which all countries may benefit. It is because this is a world problem of the first magnitude and not a purely national or regional one, that the Commonwealth governments have framed this report for the world's consideration."

10. Although individual countries have previously elaborated plans for economic development, this is the first time that all the Commonwealth countries in the area have put forward plans on a comparable basis and plans which take fully into account the limitations both of external and of internal finance. This marks a notable advance. The country programmes have been collated and their financial implications elucidated. They have been accompanied in the final chapter with a general analysis of the problems of economic development in the area. No attempt has been made to present a bill to the United States or to suggest that it has a primary responsibility for extending financial aid. On the other hand, it is hoped that by presenting such solid and sober country programmes, and by relating them in a comprehensive plan of defined clarity, the report will appeal to United States opinion and, by its collective approach to the problem, will facilitate both the extension and the acceptance of financial assistance.

11. That is not to say, of course, that the report is without weaknesses. The statistical material it contains is sometimes shaky, although every attempt was made to make it as firm as possible. It must also be admitted that its impact is somewhat weakened by the inclusion of chapters on countries like Ceylon and Malaya which are at present in a much stronger economic position than India or Pakistan.

12. It may also be considered an important weakness that so little is said of the way in which the economic resources of those two countries are being drained by the dispute over Kashmir. The only passage dealing with this subject will be found in paragraph II of Chapter X. There it is pointed out that "defence expenditure in India and Pakistan, although it appears large in relation to their central budgets, is less so in relation to the total of central and provincial expenditure, and is in fact no more than 2-3 per cent of their national incomes. Defence there, as in all countries in the world, is a severe obligation, but nevertheless it is not a decisive element in the general consideration of the shortage of capital." This glosses rather too easily over the fact that both countries are now spending roughly 50 per cent of their central budgets on defence. After examining this passage, we had the feeling that the whitewash had been applied rather too liberally, and during the meetings of officials were able to have added to the final sentence an additional clause so that it now reads: "... although it must be a matter of continuing concern and should be reduced as soon as international conditions permit." During the Ministerial meetings Mr. Spender attempted to have this passage stiffened even further. He quickly found, however, as we had, that this is a question of such delicacy that he had to retreat without having introduced any further alteration in the text.

13. The chief reason for Mr. Spender's hasty retreat no doubt was his unwillingness to disturb the harmony which had prevailed between the Indian and Pakistani delegations at the conference, and indeed, between the representatives of all Commonwealth countries. This harmony persisted when the representatives of non-Commonwealth countries in the area joined the conference. There had been some doubt as to whether a meeting with the representatives of non-Commonwealth countries would be profitable. As it turned out, however, three meetings were held with the representatives of these countries, during which a valuable exchange of views took place. The questions which were asked by the representatives of these countries were, almost without exception, relevant and penetrating. And it appeared that the explanations which were offered by the representatives of Commonwealth countries around the table did much to remove the suspicions which had evidently been rife in Rangoon, Bangkok, Djkarta and Saigon. It should also be added that the United States Ambassadors in these capitals had urged the governments to be represented at the meetings of the Consultative Committee; and these representations had clearly produced a more amenable frame of mind.

14. If the governments of Burma, Indo China, Indonesia and Thailand were to participate fully in the work of drawing up a plan for economic development in South and South-East Asia, it would obviously be necessary to recast the name and character of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee. If, further, the United States were to provide capital on a substantial scale for the development programmes of individual countries, an even more radical reconstitution of the Committee would be required. The question of organization was discussed both by officials and by Ministers, and what appears on this subject is paragraph 36 of Chapter X of the report registers a compromise. On the other hand, the United Kingdom authorities wished to have, either in the report itself or in the minutes of the Ministerial meetings, some indication of what type of organization would be preferred by participating governments in case (as they fully expected) the United States Administration asked questions on this subject. They were supported by the Indian delegation who wished to be provided before leaving London with some reason for bringing the question of permanent organisation before Ministers in New Delhi. They were anxious that their own government should recognise the necessity of accepting some form of United States supervision of whatever United States financial assistance might be made available. On the other hand, both these delegations realised the force of the arguments which we advanced underlining how injudicious it would be to create the impression in Washington that the Consultative Committee was attempting to take decisions which could only properly be made when it was clear whether or not United States financial assistance would be forthcoming. Originally it was agreed between officials that it would be sufficient if the minutes of the Ministerial meetings were to record that, in the view of the Chairman, there was a consensus of opinion that the arrangements for the provision of financial assistance should be on a bilateral basis, but that in addition there should be a combined organisation on which representatives of countries providing capital and of those receiving it should sit on a basis of equality to discuss economic development in South and South-East Asia as a matter of common interest. Unfortunately in summing up this consensus of opinion Mr. Gaitskell went rather further and suggested that the passage in the report on this subject should be expanded to include these conclusions. At a later meeting of Ministers we attempted to reverse this decision and to restore the original draft passage in the report. In this attempt we were not completely successful; but those phrases which in our view might have caused offence in Washington have been omitted.

15. Throughout the conference the United States Government were kept informed of the proceedings through Mr. Ben Moore of the United States Embassy in London, who had been appointed as the official Liaison Officer. When it was possible to show him a draft of the report, he and his colleagues in the United States Embassy in London suggested a number of minor changes in the presentation of the report (most of which have been incorporated in a subsequent version), but expressed themselves as being very well pleased with it. Perhaps more important were the comments which were made at a somewhat earlier stage by the United States Government in Washington on the draft synopsis which had been submitted to them by the United Kingdom Embassy there in accordance with agreement reached with other members of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee. Mr. Labouisse told Sir Leslie Rowan that the United States authorities would welcome a report along these lines and added that it would be useful to them in developing their ideas and plans for extending financial assistance to South and South-East Asia. Mr. Labouisse made three particular comments:

(a) He said that the report should not be cast in the form of a bill to be presented to the United States.

(b) Although in the view of the Administration whatever grants or loans might be made to the area should be untied, he said that he hoped the report would not insist on untied assistance as a condition of a satisfactory arrangement. On the other hand, the Administration would have no objection if the arguments of the report were to point clearly in that direction.

(c) Opinion in the Administration would be content if the case for financial assistance were based both on the need for economic development in the countries in the area, and on the importance of the area in attempts to restore a multilateral system of trade and payments; but they would prefer stress to be laid on the first argument rather than on the second.

All these points would seem to have been taken into account in drafting the attached report. Mr. Labouisse went on to suggest that, after the London meeting had been concluded, the report should not be communicated formally by the Commonwealth Consultative Committee to the United States government, but should merely be handed to the United States Liaison Officer in London. Within a few weeks Mr. Acheson would hope to make favourable mention of the report in public, and it might be published shortly after that.

16. On the question of what should be said in the report about the possibility of assistance from governments within the Commonwealth in providing external finance for the development programmes of countries in South and South-East Asia, there was also some difference of opinion. Mr. Gaitskell as the representative of the United Kingdom Government waivered somewhat. He thought that it would be an advantage if the report could show that Commonwealth governments were prepared to accept a substantial share of this responsibility. On the other hand, he himself pointed out that if the report were to indicate that Commonwealth governments were prepared to supply a specific percentage of the external finance which would be required, the gap to be filled by United States financing would have been made more precise; and it had universally been agreed that the report should not issue in a bill to be tendered to the United States. After waivering for some time between these two points of view he finally suggested that on balance it would be an advantage if the report were to contain some indication of what Commonwealth governments were prepared to do. One reason why he eventually took up this position was that the United Kingdom government had determined before the Ministerial meetings on the amount which they would be prepared to release from the sterling balances of Commonwealth countries in the area over the six-year period. He found little support, however. We made it perfectly clear that the Canadian Government was not yet in a position to take a decision on this matter. Fortunately, it turned out in the end that neither the Australian nor the New Zealand governments were any more prepared to say what financial assistance they might be able to extend. Nor was there much pressure from Commonwealth governments in Asia to hasten a decision, although at one point in the Ministerial meetings Mr. Ghulam Mohammed, the Finance Minister of Pakistan, said that financial assistance from Canada would be very welcome. The upshot of the discussion was the insertion in the report of paragraph 32 of Chapter X, which reads as follows:

> "The Commonwealth Governments are considering to what extent the external finance requirements can be provided by their countries through the five channels. But the task of providing this financial support for the development of South and South-East Asia is manifestly not one which can be tackled by the Commonwealth alone. The need to raise the standard of living in South and South-East Asia is a problem of concern to every country in the world, not only as an end in itself, but also because the political stability of the area and its economic progress are of vital concern to the world."

It should also be noticed that, according to the final sentence of the Communiqué, "The extent to which, and the means by which Commonwealth countries outside the area can contribute towards the solution of the problem will now become the subject of consideration by their Governments."

17. Little was said during the conference on the subject of technical assistance. This subject had been covered in detail during the meetings at Sydney, and what remained to be done was of a comparatively routine nature. The recommendations of the Standing Committee which met in Colombo during July and August for the constitution of the Bureau for Technical Cooperation were considered briefly, and it was unanimously agreed to recommend the draft constitution to governments for their approval. After the conference had concluded, an informal meeting of officials was held to discuss the action which should be taken if governments approved the constitution and agreed to its establishment. The next step which will be required is the appointment of the director. There was general agreement that it would be useful if Commonwealth governments could consult between themselves through the usual channels during the next few weeks in order to put forward any suggestions which they have in mind, and to allow consideration to be given to their nominations, so that a director may be appointed with all possible despatch after the Bureau has been established and the directing Council has met in Colombo.

18. Finally, it might be useful to list the action which it is hoped participating governments will take as a result of this meeting of the Consultative Committee:

(a) To consider whether or not they can approve the draft report on economic development in South and South-East Asia. (It is hoped that the approval of all Governments may be secured by the first of November at the latest). Approval of the report would not entail "approval" of the individual country development programmes which are the responsibility of the governments concerned.

(b) To consider whether they can approve the draft constitution for the Bureau on Technical Cooperation, which is to be established at Colombo.

(c) To consider what financial assistance they may be able to provide towards the fulfilment of the programmes of economic development outlined in the report. It is hoped that at least some general indication can be given on this matter fairly soon after the publication of the report.

IV. COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA; REPORT ON LONDON MEETING

23. Mr. Deutsch submitted a report on the meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee in London. Copies of the report and of the document setting forth "The Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia" had been circulated.

(I.C.E.T.P. Document No. 83 and attachments†).

24. The Chairman suggested that, as the documents were lengthy and as there had not been adequate time for careful examination, it might be desirable to defer consideration until a subsequent meeting.

25. Mr. Deutsch mentioned that an enquiry had been received from the C.R.O. as to whether the Canadian Government would be able to give approval to the report in time to permit publication about November 10th. Possibly some consideration might be given to this enquiry.

Approval of the report for this purpose would not entail or imply approval of the individual development programmes. In substance it would mean that the government was of the view that the scheme in the report, in general, was desirable, that the proposals were feasible and that the plan was necessary for the economic health of the area. It would further mean that the government felt it would be possible for the plans to be carried out over a six year period with outside financial assistance to the amount of approximately £1 billion as proposed.

In arriving at the over-all programme, the method had been for each of the Commonwealth countries in the area of South and South-East Asia to prepare a plan of development for a six year period. The cost of each plan had been totalled up without regard to the source of materials and labour, whether internal or external. An assessment had then been made of the degree to which each country could finance such a programme itself, taking into account taxation and budgetary policy and other factors. This amount had been deducted from the total cost, and the residue was the amount that would have to be provided by external finance. Assuming that the various countries were otherwise in balance on their external account, this item also represented the estimated deficit in their balance of payments over the six year period. In actual fact, the £1 billion did not cover anything very greatly in excess of what was going on at the present time or was projected for the future in various development plans. It did not by any means represent a net addition of new projects. Thus far, the development operations were being financed in part by the drawing down of sterling balances, partly through assistance from the International Monetary Fund, and, in the residue, through resort to inflationary methods. In understanding the figures arrived at, the discrepancies between the amount of external finance required and the amount of goods and equipment for actual projects, it had to be understood that part of the outside finance would be to cover consumer goods. To a substantial extent, it would be a policy of importing consumer goods and using local labour to produce capital goods.

As to the basis on which external financial assistance might be forthcoming, a teletype from Washington (WA-2503 of October 12†) outlined a suggestion by the United Kingdom for a three-way split: the United Kingdom and colonies to contribute 1/3; the Commonwealth countries capable of making net contributions (Canada, Australia and New Zealand) plus the International Development Bank 1/3; the remaining 1/3 to be provided by the United States.

In discussions in London, a suggestion by the United Kingdom had been that the Commonwealth should put up about 45 to 50%, of which the United Kingdom might provide £330 million through the release of sterling balances, Australia £60 million and New Zealand £10 million. This made a total of £400 million leaving an apparent suggestion that the Canadian contribution might be around £100 million. Mr. Deutsch had told the U.K. representatives that any figure of this order was much too high and that the Canadian government would have very much in mind the level of U.S. contribution when it was assessing what Canada could do. It had to be recalled that the present programme did not include non-Commonwealth countries in South and South-East Asia. Their plans might raise the over-all total from £1 billion to about £1.4 or £1.5 billion.

26. The Secretary said that the matter had been briefly touched on at the last meeting of the Cabinet and that it had been indicated that the Canadian contribution to the programme for South and South-East Asia should be considered at the same time and in relation to the contribution to the programme for reconstruction and rehabilitation in Korea.

27. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said that, on the whole, the report appeared to be modest and it was difficult to see how any of the participants could take a very discouraging line. The difficulties between India and Pakistan had been pretty lightly glossed over in the report, and it seemed probable that the United States might have something to say concerning them when the time came for an American contribution.

28. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that the report on the meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee, together with the report on the Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development, be deferred for further consideration at the next meeting.

II. COLOMBO PLAN FOR COOPERATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA

3. The Chairman read a draft memorandum† to the Cabinet concerning the plan for cooperative economic development in South and South-East Asia. The memorandum, after summarizing the essential elements of the report and of the programme which it contemplated, would recommend that the Cabinet: approve the report and agree to its publication early in November; agree to the constitution of the Council for Technical Cooperation; and defer decision on the provision of financial assistance by Canada until the relationship of the United States to the Colombo Plan had been thoroughly explored with officials of the U.S. government. Copies of the memorandum were circulated.

4. The Deputy Minister of Finance referred to the first paragraph of the Foreword to the document setting forth the "Colombo Plan" in which it was stated that "the report has now been approved" by the various Commonwealth governments. It would be very much preferable if some means could be found by which agreement could be given to publication of the report and indication made that it was accepted as a basis for consideration of policy in relation to the economic development of the areas concerned without stating definitely that the report was "approved". There appeared to be two serious weaknesses in the report. The most important was the way the India-Pakistan trouble was glossed over in paragraph 11 on page 52. The suggestion in the paragraph was that the military expenditures arising out of the Kashmir dispute were not a serious drain on the countries concerned or a serious factor in relation to the development programme. In actual fact charges related to the trouble there were causing a drain which would, over six years, amount to approximately the same total as the development programme itself. Moreover, the paragraph gave the implication that the expenditures arose out of the usual obligations for defence which were common to the various participating countries. This was not at all the case. Altogether the paragraph was misleading and misrepresented the great importance of the quarrel between India and Pakistan in its effects on the prospects for economic improvement.

The second weakness in the report was the failure to give greater weight to the population problem. Its treatment on pages 9 and 10 very much minimized the difficulties and its relation to hopes for economic betterment.

5. Mr. Deutsch agreed that the defects were real. The broad character of the report had to be appreciated in order to understand the difficulties that had been encountered in efforts, which had been made by the Canadian and other delegations to have a more realistic presentation given, especially to the importance of the Kashmir trouble. In effect, the programme represented a reconciliation of views between the Asian and western parties. The Asian countries had started with a much grander conception. Under urging as to the difficulties of implementation they had gone a long way in modifying their programmes, particularly when the comparative modesty of the present plans was considered in relation to the political problems of the countries at home and to their ambitions. It had early become clear that any attempt to say more on the India-Pakistan problem would not succeed and that pressure would make any agreement at all quite difficult. So far as the population problem was concerned, the Asian countries recognized the situation. They said, however, that it was not a matter about which anything could be done in the next two or three years. They thought it was something about which action might be possible over an extended period in the context that would be created if the development programmes could be put into effect.

The Asian countries, having made what they thought to be quite extensive concessions in the programmes to the western countries' point of view, would expect some recognition that they had made a real contribution toward the ultimate plan. It had also to be recognized that the programme was, to a large extent, not an economic but a political exercise. Approval of it and participation by western countries would represent to the Asians willingness to participate in solving the problems of the area. There were political considerations of a high order involved and certain elements of weakness on the economic side had to be accepted.

6. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that recent developments in the United Nations had widened rather than narrowed the gap between India and the western countries. In the circumstances it would be desirable not to raise points that would cause further difficulty if they could be avoided. It might be feasible to modify the formula of approval to a statement that Canada "approves the general conclusions of the report as a basis for cooperative economic development in South and South-East Asia". There might be difficulty in securing modification in the Foreword itself without raising undue fears that Canada might not participate in the programme. If so, perhaps an adequate procedure might be simply to use the above language in communicating our approval to the U.K. government and in statements issued domestically. We could allow the present wording of the Foreword to stand with our actual language indicating the character of the "approval" we were extending.

7. The Deputy Minister of Finance thought that a formula such as the one suggested might be satisfactory with slight revision. Possibly the U.K. government could be asked what it thought of a proposal to modify the Foreword to state that "these governments have not expressed general agreement with the conclusions of the Report and have approved its publication". The word "recommendations" might be better than "conclusions".

8. The Chairman said that it would be desirable to include in the memorandum for the Cabinet a brief discussion of the possible order of magnitude of Canadian participation in the programme even though decision was to be deferred. In connection with this, the Department of External Affairs had prepared a summary of the wartime and postwar financial aid extended by Canada to foreign countries and a comparison of assistance by Canada and by the United States in relation to national income. Copies of the summary were circulated. The Cabinet would have much in mind the extent of U.S. participation. For fair and complete comparison it would be desirable to add a table on U.S. and Canadian defence expenditures.

9. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said that it appeared undesirable to attempt any decision as to the extent of Canadian participation until that of the United States was clear. Present proposals suggested something of the order of $150 million per year as the U.S. contribution. If this were divided by, say 18, to get a figure in approximately the same relation to Canadian national income the resultant amount was undoubtedly too small for the Canadian contribution. It had to be recognized that the United States was doing more in defence and also that U.S. assistance was being given under many programmes, such as E.R.P., in which Canada did not participate. It did not seem wise to split up the relatively modest contribution that Canada could make in too many directions and perhaps the Colombo Programme was one into which we should concentrate a fairly substantial share. In any event, as long as we did not participate in all the programmes the United States was in we could hardly apply the national income formula too rigidly to the ones we did decide to share. It might be that a reasonable Canadian participation would amount to something of the order of $20 million per year.

10. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that, in discussions with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Gaitskell had indicated that the United Kingdom were now thinking in terms of a rather smaller Canadian participation than they appeared to have had in mind in London. He spoke of a contribution of $25 to $35 million per year. So far as the provision of assistance was concerned it had to be realized that limitations might be not entirely financial. If our contribution was to be in any way tied, supply considerations could be a limiting factor.

11. The Committee, after considerable discussion, agreed:

(a) that the memorandum to the Cabinet concerning the Colombo Plan for Economic Development in South and South-East Asia be revised in accordance with the discussion and submitted; and

(b) that the High Commissioner in London be informed of the considerations which it was felt made it desirable to modify paragraph 1 of the Foreword to the "Colombo Plan" and asked to acquaint the U.K. government with them with a request for their views on the desirability of proposing some amendment along the lines suggested.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 243-50 [Ottawa], October 24, 1950

THE COLOMBO PLAN FOR CO-OPERATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH AND SOUTH EAST ASIA

A draft report (short title, "The Colombo Plan") is now in the hands of the seven Governments which took part in the Meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee in London last September. This report comprises a six-year plan for economic development of the Commonwealth countries of South and South East Asia (India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya, Singapore, Borneo and Sarawak) and also refers to development needs in other countries in the area (Indonesia, Burma, Thailand and Indo-China).

The Colombo Plan is summarized in the attached report of the Canadian delegation to the London meeting.[17]

ACTION CALLED FOR

(a) Approval of the Report. The Report of the Colombo Plan (60 pages of text and 30 pages of tables and statistics) is submitted for approval by the Governments of Australia, Ceylon, India, New Zealand, Pakistan and the United Kingdom, in addition to that of Canada. If approved it will be published. The United States Government, whose cooperation is essential to the success of the programme, has agreed that the report should be published and has suggested a tentative date of November 10th. The United Kingdom is aiming to make November 13th the actual release date.

(b) Approval of a Draft Constitution for the "Council of Technical Co-operation". The 29-paragraph Constitution drawn up at Colombo in July and approved by the Delegations in London three weeks ago outlines the functions, organization and administration of the Council for Technical Co-operation. This Council, meeting in Colombo, will act through a Bureau to guide and supervise the £8 million technical assistance scheme over the three years. On June 12, 1950, Cabinet approved participation in this scheme in the amount of $400,000. This sum was subsequently voted by Parliament.

(c) Policy on Financial Assistance. On the assumption that the report is approved by all the governments concerned, the question of financial assistance from Canada will undoubtedly arise.

COMMENTS ON THE REPORT

The Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy agrees with the view of the Canadian Delegation that the draft report is, considering all the circumstances, a good document. The six-year development programmes of each of the seven Commonwealth countries in the area appear to be "sensible, moderate and realistic in their general assumption".

The report contains a description of the economic development programmes which each of the Commonwealth Governments in the area hopes to accomplish over a six-year period beginning July 1951. Each country's programme calls in the first instance for the maximum use of each country's own financial resources. However, these internal financial resources are not adequate, and the report states that external aid amounting to a total of £1,085,000,000 over the six-year period will be required to carry out the programmes.

The two most important countries are India and Pakistan. Their programmes call for 88 per cent of the total. In these two countries there are 430 million people. The national income per capita is $66 (in the United States it is $1,570, Canada $1,000, United Kingdom $650). The gross national product of the two countries at $18 billion is only little more than that of Canada at $17 billion.

During and after the war, Canada and the United States made great economic progress. Since the war, in large part owing to the billions of dollars of help from North America (roughly two billion from Canada and twenty billion from the United States), Europe has made a spectacular economic recovery, nearly all of it achieved during the past two and a half years. During the same period, India and Pakistan achieved independence. But economically they have barely kept from going under. The amount of food produced now is the same as pre-war, yet the population has increased by 10 per cent.

The basic economic problems, which would have been difficult enough to deal with in any circumstances, have been further aggravated by political conditions and the continuing tension between India and Pakistan. Unfortunately, there seems to be no prospect of an early end to this tension. One of the serious, but what proved to be unavoidable weaknesses of the report is the way it glosses over this subject. Because "approval" of the report might be interpreted as acquiescence in the suggestion that expenditures related to the Kashmir dispute are not a serious factor in relation to the position of India and Pakistan an enquiry is being sent to London to see whether some wording other than "approval" could be used without raising undue fears about Canadian participation in the programme.

In Western Europe, with its much higher standard of living, many billions of dollars were required to overcome economic difficulties and gain political stability. It is the considered hope of those who took part in drawing up the Colombo Plan that external assistance only one-seventh as great as the European countries originally requested in 1947 will produce very useful results. In countries like India and Pakistan, however, rapid progress is impossible; indeed the countries themselves do not expect quick results. Whatever progress they make will be slow and painful. They are, however, setting their sights in the right direction. The Governments in this area have abandoned earlier grandiose notions of economic development and industrialization. Highest priority is to be given to agriculture and transportation. These are the immediate necessities in order to prevent a further decline in the basic conditions of life and to offer some prospect of a modest improvement in the levels of nutrition.

In approving the Report, the Canadian Government would not be giving approval to the individual development programmes of specific countries. These are the responsibility of the governments concerned. Approval and publication of the Report, however, will inevitably lead to the question of extending financial assistance and the government, along with other governments, will, therefore, wish to look carefully at those sections of the Report which deal with sources of external finance.

Five channels of external finance are referred to:

(1) use of the countries' own external assets, e.g., sterling balances. (This will be almost the entire source of aid from the United Kingdom);

(2) from private investors overseas to private enterprise in the area;

(3) from private investors overseas to Governments in the area;

(4) international institutions, i.e., the International Bank to Governments in the area;

(5) from Governments overseas to Governments in the area.

Paragraph 32 of the Report reads:

> "The Commonwealth Governments are considering to what extent the external finance requirements can be provided by their countries through the five channels. But the task of providing this financial support for the development of South and South East Asia is manifestly not one which can be tackled by the Commonwealth alone. The need to raise the standard of living in South and South East Asia is a problem of concern to every country in the world, not only as an end in itself, but also because the political stability of the area and its economic progress are of vital concern to the world".

United Kingdom representatives have indicated informally that they had in mind something like the following apportionment of the external financial assistance required:

	6 year period £ mm	%
United States and International Bank	500	50
United Kingdom	330)
Australia	60)	50
New Zealand	10)
Canada	100)
	1,000

On this basis Canada's share would be of the order of $50 mm a year. It has been intimated to United Kingdom officials that on the basis of the relevant considerations in Canada's case, this figure is high. It would appear however, that should the United States support the programme to the extent which seems probable the Canadian participation which would be considered appropriate could hardly be less than of the order of $20 mm a year.

Recommendations:

It is recommended that:

(1) Canada approve the Report and agree to its publication early in November. In giving this approval it should be specifically noted that it does not carry with it the approval of the individual programmes of the countries.

(2) Approval be given to the Constitution of the Council for Technical Co-operation and that the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Colombo be appointed the Canadian member of the Council.

(3) A decision on the policy concerning the provision of financial assistance by Canada be deferred until the relationship of the United States to the Colombo Plan has been thoroughly explored with officials of the United States Government. If, in discussions with the United States, our present preliminary information is confirmed and it becomes clear that the United States intends to give wholehearted support to this programme, it will then be appropriate for the Canadian Government to consider what part it intends to take in the programme.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA; COLOMBO PLAN

43. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted a report concerning the Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia. The plan called for six-year development programmes for each of the seven Commonwealth countries in the area which were, on the whole, modest and realistic. They called for maximum use of the various countries' own financial resources but, as these were limited, there was left an estimated need for £1,085 million of external finance over a six-year period. The programme was in recognition of the fact that economic development was at a very low level in the countries of South and South-East Asia and that to achieve even slow progress outside help would be needed. The Commonwealth Relations Office had asked whether we would be prepared to give approval to the report in order that publication might proceed. It was recommended that:

(a) Canada approve the report and agree to publication early in November, it being specifically noted that this did not carry with it approval of the individual programmes of the countries;

(b) Canada approve the constitution of the Council for Technical Cooperation and that the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Colombo be appointed Canadian member of the Council; and,

(c) final decision on the provision of financial assistance be deferred until the relationship of the United States to the Colombo Plan had been thoroughly explored.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 24, 1950 and attachment — Cab.Doc. 243-50)

44. The Minister of Finance said that one weakness in the report was the way it glossed over the serious drain on India and Pakistan resulting from the Kashmir dispute and the military expenditures related to it. While only approval for publication was specifically called for at the present, it had to be recognized that this would imply a moral commitment to financial contribution.

45. The Prime Minister said that it was important to know whether U.N. officials connected with technical assistance had examined the report and how they thought it would fit in with the U.N. programme. Before any definite decisions were taken, it would be desirable to have a further opportunity to examine the report in detail.

46. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that approval of the report on the Colombo Plan for Economic Development in South and South-East Asia be deferred pending further consideration; and,

(b) that the Secretary of State for External Affairs ascertain the views of U.N. officials connected with technical assistance as to the relationship of the Colombo Plan to the U.N. programme.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 27, 1950

THE COLOMBO REPORT — APPROVAL AND PUBLICATION

I attach the two telegrams which I discussed with you this morning: our outgoing message No. 1643 of October 25th, in which we put forward a proposed change in the foreword of the Colombo Report, and London's reply, No. 2053 of October 26, in which a third possibility is put forward.[18]

2. You will find the present wording and our proposed change on the second page of our outgoing telegram. The proposal from London is on the front page of the incoming telegram.

3. Our outgoing telegram went as a result of a decision of the Interdepartmental Committee. I find that Mr. Heeney was present throughout the meeting and that, while the text of the telegram was cleared with Mr. Robertson, Mr. Heeney himself signed it.

4. Mr. Robertson has suggested that we should withhold circulation of the incoming telegram. I would be grateful for your instructions on this point. As you know, I am not very happy about Mr. Robertson's advice.

5. Mr. Robertson says that he believes the Prime Minister is going to read the Report over the weekend. As as further preparation for next week's Cabinet meeting Mr. Robertson has asked Deutsch to go over the ground with Mr. Mayhew (although I would have thought it rather embarrassing for Deutsch to do so). Mr. Robertson does not believe that anything can be done until next week's Cabinet meeting.

6. On the other hand the incoming telegram (paragraph 7) calls for an immediate reply. If we are going to pursue the line decided upon by the Interdepartmental Committee — if we are going to seek some change in the wording of the foreword — we must press on immediately. For this purpose it would be necessary to find out whether Dr. Clark and other members of the Committee would agree to the compromise wording proposed from London. An immediate gathering of the Interdepartmental Committee might be appropriate but, if Dr. Clark agreed to the compromise, there is little doubt in my mind that the others would do so too.

7. If the members of the Interdepartmental Committee were really serious in their desire to change the foreword the approach suggested in the previous paragraph would seem to be the right one. However, I gather that Mr. Robertson would really like to avoid any change in the wording of the foreword. Hence he proposed simply to leave the matter over until Cabinet met next week. (Hence, I believe, his reluctance to distribute the incoming telegram immediately).

[18] Note marginale:/Marginale note:
Mr. Plumptre, Thanks, E. R[eid].

8. I would like guidance on the following points:

(a) Whether a reply should be sent today to London and, if so, what the general line of its contents should be;

(b) What I should say to Dr. Clark in the not unlikely event of his telephoning me and asking me whether we have yet had a reply from London.

THE COLOMBO PLAN

1. The Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy considered Tuesday afternoon the recommendations it could make to Cabinet regarding the Colombo Plan.

2. Serious misgivings were expressed about the propriety of the Canadian Government approving this Report in the blanket and unqualified phraseology used in the foreword to the Report. The sentence regarding approval in the foreword of the Report reads: "The Report has been approved by these Governments".

3. The view was stated that the sections on population page 9 para 2 and on the high defence expenditures page 52 para 11 either glossed over serious difficulties too easily or were directly misleading. In particular, strong disapproval was expressed over the way in which the high defence expenditures of Pakistan and India are made to appear (1) as a small portion of their national income when in fact they are a serious economic drain; and (2) as having some direct relation to international conditions rather than as being the result of the domestic quarrel over Kashmir.

4. The Committee explored possible ways to get around this difficulty without having to suggest action which might postpone the publication of the Report. It was agreed, however, that it would be greatly preferable to have new wording substituted for the sentence "The Report has now been approved by these Governments." The suggested substitute wording is: "These Governments have now expressed general agreement with the conclusions of the Report and have approved its publication."

5. I should be grateful if you would take up urgently with the officials in London the possibility of having this wording substituted in the place of that now contained in the Report.

6. Spender will probably be visiting Ottawa this week-end and we may take up with him at that time this suggested change. I should be grateful for your early comments on the United Kingdom's reaction.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

1. Your message was discussed today with Otto Clarke and Martin Flett of the Treasury who, at the official level, have main responsibility in the United Kingdom for clearing the report through its final stages. They saw serious difficulty, at this late date, in obtaining general acceptance for the revised wording which you propose, particularly in view of the fact that India and Ceylon have already approved the report, and Pakistan's approval is expected within the next couple of days. They suggested that substantial amendments to this critical sentence particularly the omission of the idea of approval of the report, would raise very considerable suspicion in the Commonwealth countries of South-East Asia and might cause difficulties which might jeopardize the prospects for the report and in any case would seriously delay its publication.

2. The United Kingdom would probably be prepared to accept the following wording: "These Governments have now expressed general approval of the report, and have agreed to its publication". You will note that this phrase omits reference to "the conclusions of the report". The feeling here is that the use of the word "conclusions" would be inadvisable in that it is not definite, and might be taken to refer only to the last five paragraphs which make up the peroration and are identified as the "conclusion".

3. We discussed with Clarke and Flett alternative methods of presenting the proposed change to other Commonwealth Governments, having regard to the fact that it would not now be possible to reopen the question of the treatment in the report of "population" and of "the defence expenditure of India and Pakistan". You may wish to consider relating the change in wording to (a) the fact that Governments have had insufficient time to consider every detailed phrase and figure in the report, and (b) that Governments in any case would not wish to be bound in this detail, but should confine their approval to the report in general.

4. On the question of procedure, there seemed to be two possibilities. On the one hand you might wish to instruct me to communicate formally to the United Kingdom Government the proposed wording indicated in paragraph 2 above, with the request that they agree to this change, and suggest that they seek the concurrence of the other Commonwealth governments on an urgent basis. In such a communication we might explain that the reasons for the change proposed by Canada were as in paragraph 3 of this message. On the other hand you might wish to send an intergovernmental message to all concerned. The advantage of the first alternative would be that the United Kingdom might be able, in informing other Commonwealth Governments of the proposed change, to say that they themselves would not see any objection to this alteration.

5. On the points of substance you raise about the report, Deutsch will recall the delicacy of the compromise reached over the wording with regard to Indian and Pakistan defence expenditure. While the gloss which has been given to these expenditures by relating them to national income may at first appear slightly misleading, I wonder if those two Governments (or the North Atlantic Treaty countries), would really wish the amounts being voted by them for defence to be greatly reduced if the Kashmir question were settled, bearing in mind the strategic position of the Indian sub-continent and its frontier with China and the USSR.

6. Concerning the section on population (paragraph 2 of page 9), I agree that the presentation of this vital problem may err on the side of optimism. I understood, however, that this paragraph was drafted in this way specifically to avoid giving the impression in the United States and other countries which might consider making some external finance available, that the problem was insoluble and that whatever assistance was extended would only be swallowed up by an increasing population, with no improvement in the standard of living or social conditions. Deutsch will recall that the suggestion made in this paragraph about the counter balancing effects which could be expected to flow from an advance in the standard of living of the peoples of the area, was inserted in the light of Mr. Mayhew's remarks.

7. In view of the shortage of time, I would appreciate hearing from you as soon as possible what further steps you intend to take, or wish me to take on this matter.

COOPERATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTH AND SOUTH EAST ASIA; COLOMBO PLAN

6. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 25th, 1950, said that copies of the Colombo Plan, as drafted in London, had since been circulated. The immediate question was authorization of a statement that the Government of Canada "approved" the report in the terms set forth in the Foreword so that publication might take place by November 13th in accordance with present arrangements.

7. The Minister of Finance felt that, on the whole, the document was an able one but there were certain points to which he took exception. The reference to the India-Pakistan dispute over Kashmir was misleading. The dispute was absorbing about one-half of the central budgets of the two countries and the drain over six years would amount to as much as it was proposed to put in through the development programme. The report also glossed over the effect of a rapidly increasing population in limiting the efficacy of the programme. It was not desirable to prevent publication of the report, but its implications were so broad that it did not seem possible at the present time to say that it was approved by the Government of Canada. It has to be recognized, through our participation so far, but particularly if approval were extended, that Canada would be morally committed to financial participation. There had been informal suggestions that Canadian contributions might amount to as much as $50 to $60 million per year. It had been made clear that any such expectations were unrealistic.

8. Mr. St-Laurent believed it open to question whether the Commonwealth was an appropriate association to undertake the organization and execution of a programme of the character outlined in the report. It was not yet entirely clear what the relation of the Technical Assistance Bureau would be to the development programme nor was it yet clear how the technical assistance programme would fit in with U.N. plans. It seemed difficult to do more at present than say that the report was still being considered by the Government of Canada but that there was no objection to its publication.

9. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration thought it important not to do anything that might suggest indifference by Canada to the economic welfare of South and South East Asia. If approval could not be given to the report, there should at least be indication that the objectives were desirable and that Canada had an interest in them.

10. Mr. Deutsch explained that the Technical Assistance Bureau would be limited to administration of the technical assistance scheme and would not be concerned with the general development programme. How this would be handled had not been determined as yet. If the United States came in, the name and basis of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee would have to be altered but it might, perhaps, have a co-ordinating function. Actual arrangements for assistance would be on a bilateral basis between the giving and receiving countries. As to the propriety of having such a programme handled by Commonwealth countries, it was to be noted that it was not contemplated in the report that the programme could be carried through by the Commonwealth alone. It could only be implemented if the United States participated. So far as present "approval" was concerned, the political aspects of the matter were of some importance. The Asian countries considered that in reducing their programmes they had made a substantial concession to the western point of view. They looked to the western countries for some expression of interest in the welfare of their countries through willingness to approve a programme on these limited lines. It was to be noted that the report did not contain any suggestions for a distribution of the financial burden.

11. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that the High Commissioner in London be directed to inform the U.K. authorities that;

(a) the Canadian Government had not completed consideration of the report on the Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia and, therefore, was not in a position to express approval at the present time but that there was no objection to publication; and

(b) with regard to the Foreword of the report, the Government was of the opinion that the best solution would be deletion of the final sentence in paragraph 1 or, alternatively, substitution of a statement that the governments concerned "have now authorized publication of the report"; as far as Canada was concerned there would be no objection to keeping the present language of the Foreword in respect of governments that had given approval provided there was specific reference to the fact that the Canadian Government had not completed consideration of the report and had only authorized its publication.

690. PCO/Vol. 196

Le ministre des Pêcheries
au premier ministre

Minister of Fisheries to Prime Minister

November 2, 1950

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I feel rather guilty about being away at this particular time when you are giving some thought to the Report of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee. I hope to be back in Ottawa for the meeting of the Cabinet on November 8th when the Report is slated to come up for discussion. My presence or absence is of course not important; at the same time I feel that I should be there as I represented the Government at the meetings of the Committee in Sydney and London. In the meantime, perhaps I can discharge part of my responsibility by letting you have my views about the Report and specifically about one particular section which may give rise to considerable discussion.

It is stated in the Report that the chief aim of the program in aid to south and south-east Asia is to raise the standard of living of people in that part of the world. There is another aim which, though not stated, is implied throughout the Report. This is the preservation of peace. Both are actually the same because without a high a standard of living there can be little hope of lasting peace or security. I think it should also be emphasized that this may be our last chance of preventing conflict and aggression in Asia. For that reason it is vitally important for Canada to assume its full responsibility and its share of the cost of the program.

The section of the Report which will give most concern is that which deals with the large amount of money presently being spent by India and Pakistan on defence. At the meeting of the Committee in London this question was discussed informally among certain of the delegates but it did not come up for full consideration at any of the plenary sessions. True, it was mentioned on one occasion by Mr. Spender against the advice of other delegates, but he quickly withdrew the matter from the agenda when he realized that the Conference itself would be endangered by any further discussion. I believe the meetings would have come to a complete and disastrous end had he pursued the matter.

It was the opinion of most delegates, an opinion which I shared, that the expenditure on arms by India and Pakistan was a matter of purely domestic concern. Criticism or advice would only be interpreted by Mr. Nehru and Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan as unwarranted interference. It can rightly be pointed out that the governments of these two countries are in a better position than is any other government to judge what measures are best for their own people.

I believe that it would be a grave mistake for Canada to decide against taking its share in the program on the grounds that India and Pakistan are devoting a large portion of their budgets to armaments. I think that Canada should take a lead in giving assurances to these countries that they will be left free to decide their own differences between themselves. After talking with several of their leaders, I am more than ever convinced that the Kashmir problem can be solved by peaceful negotiation. I am equally convinced that a settlement cannot be reached by a United Nations commission or by any other outside agency. The solution lies in the hands of Mr. Nehru and Mr. Ali Khan and we should let them know that we have confidence in their vision and ability to reach agreement on peaceful terms.

The argument may be advanced that in taking part in a program involving the expenditure of large amounts of money to south and south-east Asia we are giving little regard to the security of our investment. In answer to this argument, a comparison might be made of our past and present commitments to Europe. During two costly wars we have sent many thousands of Canadians to the Continent; some of them are there still, headstones marking their place. Since the last war we have spent many millions of dollars in an attempt to rehabilitate Europe and to bring about peace and security in that troubled part of the world. Even now we are contemplating spending some 390 million dollars in a further effort to achieve lasting peace. We have lost our investment on two occasions and we have no real assurance at the present time that we are not going to lose it again. At the same time we do not count the cost nor consider the risk as unjustified.

In comparison, the program of assistance to south and south-east Asia is a great deal less in cost and the risk involved is not anywhere so great as that present in the European program. At the same time the aim to be achieved is equally important to the peace of the world. I think that the two programs balance each other and that we should view the problems and the dangers in Asia with the same foresight and generosity as we do those of Europe. If we make sure of our friends in south and south-east Asia we will lessen the risk everywhere and strengthen the North Atlantic Pact.

Further in connection with Kashmir, I think it is well to point out that when India and Pakistan achieved their independence they accepted the responsibility of solving their racial and religious differences and of working out agreements about their boundaries. Most of these problems have now been settled. It is true that a good deal of strife and unhappiness occurred before a settlement was reached. At the same time they did work out agreements on most major problems and both countries are now well on the way towards full and peaceful nationhood. The only difference remaining between them is that of Kashmir. As I said before, I am confident that this problem can be settled on an amicable basis, providing there is no interference from outside. We can give concrete evidence of our confidence in Mr. Nehru and Mr. Ali Khan by endorsing and taking part in the program of assistance to south and south-east Asia.

There is one other important point worth consideration. It is true that both India and Pakistan are heavily armed. Many people seem to take it for granted that they are armed for a future war against each other and that this situation constitutes a serious threat to peace in Asia. I personally do not believe that the leaders of either country will ever allow such a conflict to break out. Actually, the presence of a large body of well-disciplined troops complete with weapons and equipment constitutes the strongest safeguard against aggression by another power in the whole of south and south-east Asia. At some future time we may be grateful for the friendship of India and Pakistan, a friendship which they can bolster and maintain by force of arms in the preservation of peace.

For all the reasons, which I have but poorly expressed, I would counsel against any decision in respect to the program of aid to south and south-east Asia which is based on fear or concern regarding the defence measures of India and Pakistan.

Yours very truly,

R[OBERT] W. MAYHEW

TELEGRAM 291 New York, November 2, 1950

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Reid from the Minister, Begins: Your telegram No. 193 of the 1st November:† Colombo Plan.

2. I am very worried about what the effect will be in New Delhi, Karachi and Colombo when they hear, as they will inevitably, of the contents of the telegram which it is proposed to send to our High Commissioner in London about the Colombo report. This whole initiative, of which the Colombo report forms a very important part, has always appealed strongly to me as one of the comparatively few effective steps we could take to strengthen the ties between Asia and the West. We have had occasion in the past few months to see more clearly than ever before how important those ties are to us; any action now which would seem to imply any decrease in interest on our part would be highly unfortunate.

3. I appreciate that the Colombo report is not perfect. But taking all the circumstances into account, I think the surprising thing is that it is such a solid, sensible and moderate document. The objections which have been raised to the passages about the defence expenditures of India and Pakistan, and about the effect of population increases are certainly valid. But these defects are comparatively minor, I would maintain, and are to be regarded as not much more than spots on the sun. In a matter of this importance, I think it would be a great mistake to allow the better to become the enemy of the good.

4. There may be some misgivings over the fact that this is a Commonwealth initiative. My own feeling is that these misgivings are unfounded in this case, as the report specifically envisages that the initiative should be broadened as quickly as possible in order to include non-Commonwealth countries in South and Southeast Asia, and also the United States. In this way, it would lose its Commonwealth character. For this reason I do not think we have to fear that this marks the inception of Commonwealth machinery for economic cooperation. It is, rather, an essential step in a concerted attack on the problem of poverty and low productivity in South and Southeast Asia, which must be of great concern to all non-Communist countries. Nor is the process of expanding the initiative to include non-Commonwealth countries something reserved for the future. It has already begun. You will have noticed that the Commonwealth Consultative Committee, at its meetings in London, altered the title of the Commonwealth scheme for technical assistance to omit the word "Commonwealth". The United Kingdom has been as anxious as any other country to enlist the support of the United States and all non-Commonwealth countries in the area so that there need be no suspicion, I think, that they are attempting in this way to revive outdated schemes for Commonwealth centralization.

5. I had very much hoped that it would be possible for the Cabinet at its meeting yesterday to approve the report in principle and, at the same time, to leave for further consideration the question of a possible Canadian contribution. If there is no possibility of reversing the decision, I would like our telegram to London to be drafted in such a way as to cause a minimum of uneasiness in Asian capitals. My own feeling is that, if it is impossible for us to approve the report at this time, it would be best to work for the agreement of all members of the Consultative Committee to a statement in the foreword that, "these Governments have now authorized publication of the report". A statement of approval from which Canada had to contract out would have a very damaging effect, in my opinion.

6. However, I would still hope that it might be possible for Cabinet to reconsider its decision in this matter and to agree to approve the report in principle. I should be grateful if before despatching a message to London you would show this teletype to the Prime Minister. Ends.

TELEGRAM 1703 Ottawa, November 2, 1950

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference my telegram No. 1669, October 28, Colombo Plan.

1. The Cabinet on November 1st discussed the question of "approval" of the report on the Colombo Plan and decided that they can not authorize it to be stated at this stage that the Government of Canada has approved it. The government feel that they have not had sufficient time to consider adequately all the implications of the report. They feel, moreover, that the implementation of the programme as is made clear in paragraph 32 on page 56 is dependent on the cooperation of other countries, particularly the United States. Accordingly, they feel that it is not feasible to say that the report is approved until it is clear what attitude will be taken by such other countries, particularly the United States. They feel that it might be particularly damaging if approval were extended at this time and if at a subsequent date implementation became impossible due to the failure of U.S. participation.

2. The government also consider that the situation would not be appreciably better if the words as proposed by the United Kingdom as set forth in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 2053 of October 26 were used.

3. In view of the decision of the government, will you please inform the U.K. authorities that the Government of Canada has not completed its consideration of the report and is, therefore, not in a position to express approval at this time but that it has no objection to publication. In doing so, you might make it clear that the government is not in any sense expressing disapproval of the report. As to the treatment of paragraph 1 of the Foreword, the government is of the opinion that the best solution would be simply to delete the final sentence. An alternative possibility might be to substitute for it a statement that "these governments have now authorized publication of the report". Anything which went beyond that would not be in conformity with the only decision so far made by our government.

COUNCIL FOR TECHNICAL COOPERATION IN SOUTH AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA; CONSTITUTION AND CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

1. At the Sydney Conference of last summer, it was agreed to establish an organization through which technical assistance would be made available to the countries of South and South-East Asia for a 3-year period beginning July 1, 1950 to a maximum amount of £8 million. On June 12th, the Cabinet agreed to a Canadian contribution to the programme of $400,000 for the 12 months beginning July 1, 1950.

2. The technical assistance plan, as set up at Sydney, was on a provisional basis. A constitution for a Council to administer it was later drawn up during the recent London meetings. It is set forth as Appendix 7 to the report on "The Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia'. The first meeting of the Council will take place shortly and the various governments have been asked to consider whether they can approve the draft constitution.

3. The technical assistance plan is really distinct from the general programme for economic development in South and South-East Asia, although related to it. The constitution states that "The purpose of the Council for Technical Cooperation is to assist in the economic development of South and South-East Asia by the provision of technical assistance". The Council is to organize the provision of training personnel from countries that have them available, of expert instructors and advisory missions and of equipment required for training or use by technical experts in the Asian countries. It is to have its headquarters at Colombo and to consist of one representative of each cooperating government. To assist it, a Bureau will be established, consisting of a director and a small staff. The director is charged to establish liaison with the United Nations and with specialized agencies providing technical assistance. As to the actual provision of assistance, the Constitution provides:

> "Technical assistance provided under the Scheme will be arranged on a bilateral basis by agreement between cooperating Governments, and the terms and conditions upon which assistance is provided will, in every case, be solely a matter for the Governments concerned. Bilateral arrangements do not exclude joint schemes where more than two cooperating countries are involved".

4. As the first meeting of the Council will take place very soon, the Department of External Affairs have recommended in their document No. 243-50 (already circulated):

(a) that the government approve the constitution of the Council;[19] and,

(b) that the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Colombo[20] be appointed the Canadian member.[21]

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Your telegram No. 23, Colombo Plan.†
Following is text of telegram referred to in New Delhi's telegram No. 95† to us, Begins: We have received message in following terms from Canadian High Commissioner in London, Begins:

I have been asked to let you know that the Cabinet has not yet completed its consideration of these questions, and that the Government of Canada is, therefore, not now in a position to approve the report. I should make it clear that the Government has in no way expressed any disapproval of the report, but believes that, in the light of all the circumstances, it would be premature to accept it at this time.

While unable to approve the report at present, the Government of Canada sees no objection to its publication. However, for the reasons set out above, it would not be possible to agree to the inclusion of the sentence in parenthesis in paragraph 1 of the foreword. My Government considers that the best solution would be to delete this sentence, or alternatively, to substitute the wording: "These Governments have now authorized publication of the report." Ends.

2. United Kingdom Government have considered Canadian proposal and, in all circumstances, feel that best course would be to adopt the first Canadian suggestion, namely deletion of the sentence in brackets in paragraph one of the foreword.

3. I should be grateful if you could let me know at earliest possible moment whether this proposal is acceptable to Governments of Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, Ceylon.

4. Following on Australian Government's telegram No. 226† to us, we have been in touch with United States authorities to see whether postponement of publication until after 21st November would present serious difficulties for them. In light of

We shall be telegraphing on this point tomorrow, but should be grateful for an immediate reply on paragraph three above so that instructions may be given to printers. Ends.

2. Telegram in question was addressed to Australian, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon Governments.

3. Australia, India, and Ceylon have agreed to proposal to delete sentence in parenthesis in paragraph one of foreword. New Zealand preferred your second alternative (New Zealand telegram No. 34† to you) while Pakistan has not yet replied. We are in touch with New Zealand authorities and hope they will fall in with consensus of opinion in favour of first alternative.

Dear Mr. [J.R.] Murray,

COLOMBO PLAN

This is in confirmation of what I told you over the telephone earlier today. We have been informed from London that all the Governments concerned have, subject to certain minor corrections, now approved publication of the text of the Consultative Committee Report. At the request of the Canadian Government the reference in the last sentence of paragraph 1 of the foreword relating to the question of the approval of the Report has been deleted.

It now seems almost certain that the Report will be laid before Parliament in London on Tuesday, 21st November, at 2 p.m. Its sale price will be about 3/-.[22]

696. DEA/11038-40

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au premier ministre

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 27, 1950

My dear Prime Minister:

It is now four weeks since the Report of the Colombo Plan was published and seven weeks since it was considered by Cabinet. In the interval, two new and important factors have become clear; each lends urgency to the need for a decision by the Government on whether Canadian support is to be given to the plan.

First, the United States Government has now made known to us its attitude to the Colombo Plan. The United States reaction has been friendly and constructive. In a note delivered to the Department (copy attached†) the United States in effect said it will support the aims of the Plan and that, if the other governments are agreeable, it would like to be associated with the Consultative Committee, although without at present any financial commitment. On the basis of this note, the United Kingdom has suggested a meeting of the Consultative Committee toward the end of January. New Zealand and Australia have accepted this suggestion and welcomed the participation of the United States. I think we should do likewise.

Secondly, Canadian public opinion, as reflected by the editorials in the French and English Press across Canada, has shown a remarkably enthusiastic response to the Plan and to the possibility that Canada will be able to contribute substantially to its success. (A summary of the Press comment is also attached†).

Since the publication of the Colombo Plan, two Commonwealth countries have stated publicly the form their contribution to the Plan would take. The United Kingdom have announced that they will contribute at least £300 million over the six-year period and that this will mostly consist of releases of sterling balances. It can no doubt be said that the United Kingdom is merely repaying a debt rather than making a new outright gift. But it is also true that in repaying this war-incurred debt — a debt which many thought the United Kingdom should not attempt to repay in full and many more thought they would not be physically able to repay — the United Kingdom will in fact be making a very real contribution to the economic welfare of India and Pakistan at a considerable economic cost to themselves. By 1957 the sterling balances will be down to a working reserve level. One of the major economic burdens overhanging the United Kingdom will have been removed far sooner than anyone would have thought possible a year or two ago.

Australia is the other country which has said what its financial contribution will be. Mr. Spender announced in the House of Representatives that Australia would contribute "no less than 25 million pounds sterling" (75 million dollars) during the six year period. The first-year contribution, however, is to be 7 million pounds sterling (21 million dollars).

As far as Canada is concerned a desirable timetable and questions to be decided would be:

Decision in principle to participate to be taken by Cabinet on December 27;

Decision on the actual amount and form of the Canadian contribution to be deferred to January 15. (A suggested amount to be requested would be 25 million dollars annually for six years, but commitment for first year only to be firm);

Agreement now to take part along with the United States in the next meeting of the Consultative Committee late in January.

Some of the more important reasons why we should approve the Colombo Plan were set out in the memorandum to Cabinet of October 24 (copy attached). In this letter, you should not wish me to go over the merits of the Plan itself — ground which I think has already been well covered. I would, however, like to mention one or two of the general political considerations involved.

The importance of the free countries of Asia to the fabric of world peace in increasing at a pace which is hard to realize. The issue is not merely how to prevent the spread of communism to these countries. In our own interest our concern with their welfare should, I think, be more positive than that. The role the free Asian countries can play in building a peaceful Asia is impossible to measure. But it is clear that they will be in a better position to play such a role effectively, the stronger their economy and political institutions are. The Colombo Plan offers hope to the free Asians — and hope to us — that their economies and therefore their free institutions will be strengthened.

The question is who will provide support for the Plan and why should Canada consider doing so? The bulk of the support must come from the United States, and I think we can now be reasonably certain that it will be forthcoming. There are, however, real difficulties in the way of a direct and exclusive Indian-American relationship. The Indians may be, at times, far too sensitive; the Americans may have been unnecessarily awkward in their approaches to India. Anything which can be done to improve this situation will be a blessing.

It does not seem to me that here is one situation where the countries of the Commonwealth can play an important part in bridging the gap between the poverty and therefore the neutrality and indifference of free Asia and the wealth and therefore, at times, the "interventionist" and impatient tactics of the United States.

I would like to see our decision approached on this basis. And I would very much hope that by the time you meet with your fellow Prime Ministers in London in January, the Government will have decided to contribute to the Colombo Plan (although the amount need not necessarily be settled in advance) and to send a Canadian delegation to the meeting of the Consultative Committee next month.

Yours sincerely

COLOMBO PLAN, CANADIAN AND U.S. PARTICIPATION

16. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 1st, 1950 said that certain further decisions in principle were necessary on Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan for co-operative economic development in South and South-East Asia. U.S. authorities had indicated that they would be prepared to attend the next meeting of the Consultative Committee which the United Kingdom had proposed be held about the end of January. The United Kingdom had asked whether Canada would approve extension of an invitation to the United States and would be represented at the meeting. If Canada were represented, it would commit the government further to participation and would involve decision in principle that Canada be associated with the work under the plan. Decision on the form and amount of Canadian contribution could be left over for later consideration. The United Kingdom had announced that it would contribute at least £300 million over six years and Australia that it would contribute not less than £25 million (Sterling), including a contribution of £7 million in the first year.

(Departmental memorandum, Dec. 1950† and attached letter, Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Prime Minister, Dec. 27, 1950).

17. The Minister of Finance thought Canada was, in fact, committed in principle to participation already by association thus far with the plan. The amount of contribution would have to be left over for subsequent determination. In the light of other demands and inflationary pressures it would be desirable to keep it as modest as possible.

18. The Minister of National Defence said the defence aspect of the Economic Development Plan was real and considerable. An important immediate effect of the plan would be strengthening morale in South and South-East Asia.

19. The Prime Minister felt it was important that there should be evidence of sympathetic attitude on the part of western countries toward the problems of the countries of South and South-East Asia. So far as the plan itself was concerned, it was clear that, unless the United States participated in a substantial manner, the objectives could not be achieved. It was accordingly important to know what the United States could be expected to do before definite decisions were taken on the Canadian contribution.

20. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed that:

(a) the U.K. authorities be informed that the Canadian government would welcome the extension of an invitation to the United States to attend the next meeting of the Consultative Committee on the Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia and that Canada would be represented at the meeting; and,

(b) decision be deferred as to the form and amount of Canadian contribution.

SECRET Ottawa, August, 14, 1950

Dear Mr. Heeney,

LONDON MEETINGS, SEPTEMBER-OCTOBER, 1950

You will remember that I left with you on 21st July a Memorandum† on suggested meetings in London this fall, in paragraph 6 of which the proposal was made that there might be a meeting of Commonwealth Ministers concerned with economic and trade questions, in London, at some convenient date between the Paris meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the London meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee on South-East Asia.

2. It is expected that the Paris meetings will end on 16th September and, as you know, it has been suggested that the Consultative Committee should meet in London on 25th September. The week beginning 18th September would accordingly provide the opportunity for discussions between Commonwealth Ministers on economic and trade questions. In case it would assist the Canadian Government, I have been asked to inform you of the sort of subjects which the United Kingdom Government envisage might be covered in any such general talks. These are as follows:

(1) Consideration of longer-term relationships between dollar area and sterling area including the discussion of a forward policy on imports from the dollar area

[23] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Left with me by Mr. Shannon, 4.00 pm, Aug[ust] 14. I have sent the carbon copy to the Minister. E. R[eid] Aug. 14/50.

and of the implications of any possible approach towards general non-discrimination and convertibility.

(2) The major economic implications for the Commonwealth and the sterling area of developments in international situation and in particular of programmes of re-armament.

(3) General trade questions as follows:

(a) Progress report on Commonwealth co-operation in the trade field, with special reference to dollar saving, and on plans for increasing availabilities of goods in short supply.

(b) International trade policy with relation to the Havana Charter, (G.A.T.T.), and the position of Japan.

(c) Account of trade developments in certain European integration schemes.

(d) Commercial treaty policy, with special reference to United States proposals.

In passing these suggestions to you, I have been asked to enquire whether an Agenda on these lines would commend itself to the Canadian Government. The United Kingdom Government, for their part, would welcome any suggestions as to further subjects which might be considered at the same time.

3. In the Memorandum of 21st July, it was suggested that perhaps two days might be allowed for the suggested discussion of general economic and trade questions. On further consideration it is thought that, if the Agenda tentatively suggested above were adopted, the discussions might occupy perhaps three or four days, but this is a point on which the views of the Canadian Government would also be welcomed.

4. Other Commonwealth Governments are similarly being consulted and an invitation to be represented is also being sent to the Government of Southern Rhodesia.[24]

Yours sincerely,

G.B. SHANNON

PROPOSAL FOR GENERAL ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON IN SEPTEMBER BEFORE COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

You asked me to communicate to Mr. Shannon the reaction in Cabinet yesterday to his letter of August 14th on this subject. He called on me this afternoon.

2. I explained that since his letter had only been received 48 hours ago there had been no time for detailed interdepartmental consideration by officials. However, our Minister had taken it into Cabinet yesterday where there had been a strong reaction by the Prime Minister and other Ministers including our own. This reaction took three lines:

(a) The subjects proposed for Ministerial consideration were extraordinarily broad and diverse. Satisfactory discussion of all these subjects would not only take a great deal of time in London, but would also need a great deal of detailed preparation beforehand. There did not seem to be time for such preparation before the proposed meeting.

(b) While the topics listed were by no means unimportant there were other far more urgent matters to be dealt with in the present time, especially those arising out of the war in Korea.

(c) The possibility that a Minister from Canada should attend had to be viewed in the light of the foregoing considerations. The Canadian Parliament would be meeting soon (like the United Kingdom Parliament and for similar reasons). In addition there were meetings of the United Nations Assembly and also of the Foreign Ministers. In the light of all these demands on their time it would not be possible for a Canadian Minister to attend the proposed economic discussions in London. The Minister of Finance had already cancelled attendance in Paris at the meetings of the Bank and Fund. If it was decided to proceed with the proposed economic discussions it might be possible to arrange for some senior Canadian official to be present but Ministerial attendance would be impossible.

3. I added that further consideration would be given to Mr. Shannon's letter at an Interdepartmental Committee meeting which would probably take place later this week. After that we would be able to give him further views both on his letter of August 14th and also on the timetable for the Commonwealth Consultative Committee meetings which he had given us under cover of his letter of July 21st. Meanwhile it seemed desirable that the United Kingdom authorities should know of the reaction of Ministers to the proposals contained in his letter of August 14th.

4. Mr. Shannon said that the United Kingdom Government had been hoping for Ministerial attendance at the Commonwealth Consultative Committee meetings. I said that, according to my understanding, yesterday's discussion in Cabinet had not closed the door to such attendance. It had been focused on the broad economic discussions that had been proposed in the week before the Commonwealth Consultative Committee meeting. I believed that it was the view of the Department of External Affairs at least that there should be Ministerial representation at the Commonwealth Consultative Committee because the work of that Committee was assuming increased importance because of the Korean war and resulting pressures of opinion in South and South-East Asia. Mr. Shannon then asked whether I could give any indication what Canadian official might attend the economic meetings, assuming that these took place. I said that the name of Mr. Towers had been mentioned in Cabinet discussion because Mr. Towers, in the absence of Mr. Abbott, would be the senior Canadian representative at the Paris meetings of the Bank and Fund. However, I warned that this could not be taken as a firm indication; the question had not even been raised with Mr. Towers himself.

5. Mr. Shannon indicated that he himself had been rather surprised by the breadth of the topics put forward for the economic discussions. I asked whether he had any suggestion to make as to their origin. He said that such discussions might be justified on the basis that the United Kingdom was now in a good deal firmer financial position than it was last year, that Marshall Aid was tapering off, and in the light of the new situation raised by the Korean war. I pointed out that the implications of the Korean war, which was the source of the present general emergency, were only referred to quite incidentally in the list of topics.

6. Mr. Shannon said he would transmit to the United Kingdom authorities the views that had been expressed in Cabinet.

III. ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS; PROPOSED MEETING IN LONDON

13. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned that he had received a letter from the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom concerning a proposal for a meeting among Commonwealth ministers in the week beginning September 18, to discuss economic and trade questions. The meeting was apparently planned largely to take advantage of the presence of the ministers in London. The suggested agenda was very wide in scope. The Cabinet had agreed that, as no Canadian minister could be present, the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce should represent the Government.[25]

[London], September 25, 1950

Dear Mr. [T.N.] Beaupré,

The Meetings of the Commonwealth Ministers on General Economic & Trade Questions concluded Friday afternoon September 22nd. All the papers† circulated at the meetings as well as the minutes† are being sent to Ottawa by External Affairs and will be available to you.

It is difficult to put one's finger on any tangible results of the Conference. A general idea of sterling area fiscal policy emerged, though there were certain conflicts about detail. These will reveal themselves when the minutes are read. My purpose in writing is to indicate one or two of the items that were raised in which we have some particular interest and on which I have views.

European Integration Schemes

The U.K. defined its policy with respect to the various Western European Integration Schemes as that of a benevolent spectator unable to commit itself in advance to any proposals likely to run counter to its broader interests.

They would examine sympathetically any suggestions put forward and even if unable to take part in schemes adopted by other O.E.E.C. countries would co-operate to the extent which other responsibilities permitted.

The Sterling Area Commonwealth countries were obviously pleased at the assurances that their preferences on the U.K. market would not be sacrificed to the ideal of closer Western European integration, but South Africa, and Australia complained that O.E.E.C. liberalization arrangements in favour of the U.K. were not automatically extended by the O.E.E.C. countries to them. The U.K. suggestion was that such difficulties could be met by bilateral negotiations with individual O.E.E.C. countries. I had a feeling at this point that the U.K. felt they had a weapon here which might be useful in channelling through London merchants an increasing portion of Commonwealth produce. This may not have been intended, but there was suspicion that the interests of the U.K. entrepot trade were much in mind.

Commercial Treaty Policy

It was during discussion of this item that the deep rooted U.K. devotion to "protection" first made its appearance in these talks. Once the citadel of free trade, the U.K. is now strongly protectionist minded. There is, however, the wish to keep alive the fiction of adherence to the faith, and throughout the meetings there was no lack of outward devotion to the ideals which only the force of present circumstances keep from being translated into forceful action.

The objection to the U.S. proposals for a treaty of Commerce, Friendship and Navigation were twofold:

(a) they were a threat to Imperial Preference

(b) they would limit exchange controls.

The clauses relating to Imperial Preference were no more obnoxious than similar ones under I.T.O. or G.A.T.T. but they appeared to be more binding and were not accompanied by the compensating advantages which the last two organizations conferred. The British attitude was defined as aiming to preserve in all its commercial treaties full liberty to continue, — and indeed to extend — preferential treatment for other Commonwealth countries, particularly on tariffs and on entry and residence. Should G.A.T.T. or the I.T.O. not be ratified, then the U.K. would be free to develop and extend "imperial preference" as it saw fit. The U.K. do not wish to bind themselves on preferential arrangements if the I.T.O. charter is not ratified or if the G.A.T.T. disappears.

Gold & Dollar Position of the Sterling Area

This item must be discussed in conjunction with the tables which will have reached you separately. While commenting on the very favourable improvement in the gold and dollar position of the sterling area, from a deficit of $1,700 million in 1948 to an estimated deficit of $350 million in the 12 months ended June 30th 1950, Mr. Gaitskell claimed that judged by any valid criterion the gold and dollar reserves of the area were still far too low to entertain thoughts of non-discrimination or full convertibility. While he would not say precisely what level of reserves would be sufficient for this purpose, he did say they would have to be 2 or 3 times the current level ($2,422 million).

The tables confirm the gratifying improvement in the trade position, but they also reveal that this improvement came about almost entirely by smaller purchases from dollar areas rather than from increased dollar earnings. In fact they show that the improvement has been secured at a much lower level of international trade. If we take merchandise imports and exports between the sterling area (excluding South Africa and Ireland) and the dollar area, the value of trade declined by $926 million dollars between the calendar year 1948 and the year ended June 30th 1950. Exports to dollar areas fell by $264 million and imports from them by $662. Whatever may be said therefore of the fiscal policy of the sterling area during this period it cannot be claimed that it approached a balanced trade at the highest possible level.

While there was general agreement that the reserves had to be built up and that continued caution in dollar purchases was necessary, it was clear that certain members of the area, especially those with a current surplus in dollar area trade, are becoming slightly restive. Australia for example, benefiting from current high wool prices, urged the avoidance of a rigid formula to control dollar imports. Ceylon stressed her need to buy the cheapest food irrespective of currency and also mentioned the need of the recently established Central Bank to have local reserves of gold and dollars. New Zealand claimed to be in balance on dollar trade and pointed to the need for capital equipment from dollar sources.

Nevertheless, all concurred in a Working Party statement that the 75% limit on dollar expenditure had been a factor of great importance in the recent improvement of the dollar position of the sterling area and that continuance of strict economy was necessary in this field. They could not, however, agree to a formula to replace the 75% one, which it was admitted could no longer operate.

During these talks, considerable emphasis was given to the impact that stockpiling was likely to have both upon dollar expenditure and upon the gold and dollar reserves. In my view too much attention was given to this. A good case can be made for considering strategic stockpiling — to some degree at least — as reserves. It is true that these reserves may not be as readily convertible as gold, and that they will vary with market fluctuations, but this latter drawback applies to foreign currency reserves as well, — even the U.S. or Canadian dollar. To take no account of such assets in the balance sheet is surely as much an error as to rate them on a par with gold.

Economic Implications of the International Situation and of the Programme of Re-Armament

The U.K.'s accellerated re-armament programme was outlined and immediately revealed the pincer movement in which the rest of the sterling area was caught. One arm of the movement was the attempt to restrict the sterling area's purchases from dollar markets, — the other arm was to deny them a prior claim on purchases in the U.K. Gaitskell tried to reassure them that in the U.K. programme re-armament and dollar exports came first, and Commonwealth Sterling area exports a close second, but he had to admit that they would have to face some interference with what would otherwise have been. He said that this should not mean a cut in exports to the sterling area, but it was bound to prevent any expansion in these exports. To the suggestion that if the U.K. could not supply it would be necessary to turn to the U.S. for their requirements, he replied that supplies would undoubtedly be equally short there. It must have been obvious to all representatives that either U.K. re-armament was not going to match commitments or exports were going to suffer. The British statement was misleading in minimizing the effects of re-armament upon exports and Canada is going to feel this as well, both in failure to secure offers (e.g. steel) and in getting unacceptable delivery conditions. The economy is too stretched now to permit business as usual and re-armament too, unless there is trade union and labour acceptance of longer hours of work. The reluctance of the sterling area Commonwealth countries to commit themselves to a limit on dollar purchases was the result of their determination to maintain an escape route if the other arm of the pincer proved too damaging.

South Africa and Southern Rhodesia argued that the sterling area dollar reserves were just as usefully employed in capital expenditures in the under developed areas of the Commonwealth as in the U.K. itself and that a study should be made of the Commonwealth as a whole to see what should have priority, e.g. railways for Southern Rhodesia, gold mining for South Africa etc.

Commonwealth Co-operation in the Trade Field

Harold Wilson outlined the course of U.K. production and exports and tried to reassure the other Commonwealth countries that in planning U.K. production, the needs of the other areas were very much in mind. He suggested that if other Commonwealth representatives had further items in mind where increased production was especially needed, the U.K. would welcome their views. He did not mention that the bulk of U.K. planned industrial expansion to date has been aimed at dollar saving rather than dollar earning so that the increased volume of goods available for export was more likely to be of interest to the sterling area Commonwealth than to Canada, e.g. tinplate. It is true of course that Canada should benefit from much of the U.K.'s post war industrial expansion, but in many cases this benefit is coincidental to planned expansion to other markets. We should take advantage of Wilson's offer, by pressing for expansion in fields most likely to interest us, — and should urge that this policy be extended to dependent areas as well, e.g. production of copra in Colonial areas.

It was suggested that the Commonwealth Liaison Committee might undertake a study of Commonwealth long term newsprint demands and supplies. I believe it would be useful for us to develop a Commonwealth approach to this problem (see my letter of March 22nd 1950† to Mr. Heasman).

International Trade Policy

The U.K. defined the Charter as an instrument which had many drawbacks but slightly more virtues and for that reason they would ratify it, if the U.S. should do so first. If the intention should be to make the G.A.T.T. a wider and more permanent instrument, the U.K. would desire detailed consultations with the Commonwealth before committing herself. It is clear that the U.K. enthusiasm for the basic principles of G.A.T.T. has cooled. Their objectives in the coming negotiations at Torquay will be to preserve the structure of Imperial Preference and to limit as far as possible reductions in its scope. No further reduction in preference margins will be countenanced except against clear and substantial compensatory benefits. It was indicated that with the U.S.A. they would drive much harder bargains from now on. I am not certain what is behind the cooling off of U.K. enthusiasm for these arrangements, but suspect that it is a combination of two things:

(a) disappointment at the benefits derived to date from U.S. concessions.

(b) the protectionist urge asserting itself, — a realization that as convertibility approaches protection will be needed on the home market and in the overseas Commonwealth markets as well.

When it came to the question of extending M.F.N. treatment to Japan, only Ceylon seemed prepared to face the issue. This was probably because only Ceylon did not have the secondary industries likely to be prejudiced by Japanese manufacturing and trading methods. To Ceylon, the problem of cheap supplies was important.

The U.K. revealed its fear of Japanese competition, particularly in the textile field. Sir Raymond Streat[26] has been to Japan and reported that given a free hand on cotton textile production, Japan would soon eliminate Lancashire from all the traditional world markets, even assuming she undertook to forego all unfair trade practices. His solution is for the Allies to impose a limit on the number of looms and spindles that may be operated there. Harold Wilson stated that when the question arose of extending M.F.N. treatment to Japan the U.K. would almost certainly exercise her might to withhold the G.A.T.T. benefits from her. While this might protect the home market, it would not help the U.K. export position unless the other members of the Sterling area Commonwealth did the same.

The foregoing are offered as my comments on discussions in which I took no part. It was most helpful for me to attend the conference and I am grateful that arrangements were made for me to do so. Whether I helped the Conference or not, is doubtful, — that it helped me is beyond dispute. My work will be much easier with the information gathered on U.K. and Commonwealth policy and views on trade and economic matters. Let me know if you wish further details on any of the points I have raised?

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa, August 8, 1950]

DISCUSSION WITH MR. MENZIES

The Australian Prime Minister came to see me on Tuesday afternoon after he had left you, and we had a pleasant and interesting discussion for almost an hour.

He said that he had been worrying about the lack of contact between our two countries and the fact that most Australians feel Canada is so remote from them and vice versa. I agreed with him that this was the case, but told him that I felt a good deal of progress had been made in recent years. Our High Commissioners and their staffs were doing a good job in each country to increase the knowledge of and interest in the other country. We had increasingly close contact — though it was not always without disputation — with Australian delegations at United Nations meetings. I remarked, incidentally, that Dr. Evatt, while he was performing on the U.N. stage, had been responsible for a good many headlines in Canadian papers, which brought Australia to Canada's attention. Mr. Menzies agreed, but was not sure that these headlines were always the best from the Australian point of view. I did not attempt to argue with him on this! I stated also that Canadians were becoming more aware of Pacific problems, and the importance of that area to themselves and the world. With that awareness went an increasing interest in Australia. The attention given here to the Colombo and Sydney Conferences was a reflection of this. While it remained true that Canada, apart from British Columbia, tended, for obvious reasons, to look eastward and across the Atlantic, this situation was changing and we in the Government welcomed that change. Most Canadians, I thought, were now quite aware of the fact that there was a Pacific as well as an Atlantic ocean. If they had not been aware of this previously, Korea had certainly driven the point home.

I asked Mr. Menzies directly what he thought we could do to increase our friendly contacts. I thought he might reply by referring to some form of permanent Commonwealth consultative machinery, but he did not bring this up at all. He contented himself by saying that they were going to have important Jubilee celebrations in his country next year, and he hoped that Canadian representatives, headed by the Prime Minister, would be able to attend. He felt that the more visits to Australia by Canadians, and by Australians to Canada, the better.

He thought that probably we knew more about Australia than Australians knew about us, because they tended to lump Canada with the United States. I told him that we are aware of this disadvantage — which could also, on occasions, be an advantage — and that it would be a good thing if Australians realized that while we could never escape from the overpowering shadow of our great neighbour, we had no intention of being lost sight of completely in that shadow. Mr. Menzies then added that while he was in Washington, he came to the conclusion that Canada and Australia stood higher in the regard of people there than any other two countries.

We had also some discussion of Korean developments during which Mr. Menzies took a far more cautious line regarding Australian participation and United States leadership than he took in his public speeches in Washington. He was worried about the Americans expecting too much too quickly from countries like Australia, and he indicated that he had talked pretty frankly to them in that regard. He was also worried about the implications of the intervention in Korea of the United Nations led by the United States. Was there any limit to our obligations under the Charter when we found ourselves involved so quickly and so completely in a place like Korea, which the Americans themselves had written off strategically many months ago, but to which they were now so heavily committed? I told him that we certainly shared this worry and we agreed that possibly in the next year or so, while the democracies were gaining in strength, it might not be a bad idea to go to some length in keeping the Russians in the Security Council and, indeed, getting the Chinese Communists there. That would certainly limit our obligations, as they would veto any future action of the Korean type! I was interested to discover that Mr. Menzies appreciated the arguments for recognizing Communist China and giving her representation in the United Nations. I gather that if he had a free hand from public opinion, he would support this step at once, and that his position in this regard was far closer to London than to Washington. This attitude, however, does not seem to harmonize with some of his public statements in recent weeks.

I asked the Australian Prime Minister what his views were about a Pacific Pact, and explained to him our doubts whether this would be a practicable or desirable development at the present time. He surprised me by agreeing in forthright terms with these doubts. He even referred to the folly of attempting to bring about a Pacific Pact organization at this time along the lines of the North Atlantic organization. He said this would be attempting to erect a structure on a foundation of jelly. I then ventured to remind him that his Minister of External Affairs seemed to have somewhat different views, to which he replied, "Oh, the Pacific Pact is Percy [Spender]'s baby and, of course, I have to let him talk about it occasionally".

Mr. Menzies then talked very frankly and very interestingly indeed of some of his domestic political problems in Australia, which I need not deal with in this memorandum.

Mr. Menzies ended by expressing great appreciation for all the kindness that had been shown him since his arrival in Ottawa.

VISIT OF THE PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

41. The Prime Minister welcomed the Prime Minister of Australia.

42. Mr. Menzies said that Sir William Slim, Chief of the Imperial Staff, had paid a visit recently to Australia for the purpose of discussing general defence problems. Until a few months ago, there seemed to be a general, if unstated, feeling in the Australian Parliament — and even in his Cabinet — that Australia should concentrate primarily, if not exclusively, on the Far East in so far as defence preparations were concerned. In the light of recent international developments, however, the matter had been looked at again more closely and it was felt that if there was to be another world conflict the real dangers would centre in and around Europe. So long as Japan was, for military purposes, under U.S. occupation, there was no great power that need be feared from a military point of view in the Pacific. The Korean incident, however, had shown how difficult it might be to convince public opinion in the democracies that the real danger spot was not in the Pacific. If, for example, a world conflict broke out before the Korean situation had been straightened out and while Australian troops were still fighting there, it would be exceedingly difficult to convince the Australian people that their troops should be withdrawn from the Far East and sent to Europe or the Middle East.

It seemed probable that Soviet tactics over the next few years would concentrate in multiplying incidents such as the recent North Korean aggression. Thus it would be possible for the U.S.S.R. to disperse not only the military and economic strength of the democracies but also their psychological strength. Undoubtedly all democracies would be strained to keep a satisfactory balance between greatly increased defence budgets and the maintenance of a satisfactory level of industrial and commercial development while, at the same time, to avoid an inflationary spiral which might take on disastrous proportions.

Although the purely military efforts of the democracies were being correlated in a fairly satisfactory way, it would seem that there was not enough cooperative planning in the political sphere. This seemed to him to be essential if the free countries were to have any real success in relating their policies to their resources.

43. Mr. Menzies briefly commented on his recent visit to the United States and said that one of its purposes had been to negotiate a direct loan from the International Bank which, if successful (and he was hopeful that it would be) might suffice to meet the major portion of Australia's dollar needs for the next five years.

44. Mr. Menzies also mentioned that Jubilee celebrations would be held in Australia in 1951, to commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the establishment of the Commonwealth, and that he would be happy and honoured to receive the Prime Minister and as many of his colleagues as possible during the course of those festivities.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 11, 1950

My dear Colleague,

The Indian High Commissioner came to see me the other day on his return from New Delhi, with instructions to raise the question of Indian immigration into Canada. As you know, for some time we have been increasingly embarrassed by the position of Indians in this regard. As I see it, the only way to meet this situation without embarrassing our relations with India (which are more important now than ever before) and at the same time ensure that no substantial Indian immigration into Canada takes place, is by the adoption of a quota system. I know that your Department is giving consideration to this, and I would be grateful if the matter could be pressed.

Mr. Kirpalani also raised, in a purely unofficial and informal way, the position of Canadian citizens of East Indian race in regard to certain disabilities to which he feels they are subjected. I told him that I thought there were no such disabilities in this country at the present time, but he had in mind the fact that Canadians of his race are not able to secure admission to Canada for their relatives from India, while Canadians of other racial descents are able to do so.

I would be very grateful if this matter could be looked into also, as I have told Mr. Kirpalani that I would be replying to his representations before long.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 18, 1950

On September 11, Mr. Pearson wrote to Mr. Harris about representations made to him by the Indian High Commissioner, Mr. Kirpalani, on the question of Indian immigration into Canada. Mr. Pearson expressed the view that adoption of the quota system was the only way of regulating such immigration satisfactorily. He hoped that your Department could press its study of the application of a quota system to immigration into Canada.

2. In passing me a copy of the Minister's letter, Mr. Heeney asked if I would follow the matter up with you. While I realize that the main responsibility for this study rests with your Branch, you may be assured that we will be glad to give you any assistance in this matter which we can.

3. A few general remarks will indicate the direction of my own thinking on this matter. It seems to me that if a study is to be made of the quota system, then we should try to aim our shotgun so as to knock down as many birds as possible with the pellets from a single shell. We must line up the birds in our sights first. In doing so I think we should consider the applicability of the quota system to regulating the entry of all the groups that may wish to immigrate into Canada and whom experience has shown would be difficult to assimilate. Immigration of the main groups is now restricted by P.C. 2115 of September 16, 1930.† There are other groups, however, such as West Indians, Latin Americans, South African negroes, and so forth, that should also be taken into account.

4. You will recall that during 1947 the Inter-Departmental Committee on Immigration Policy discussed the quota system briefly. At that time a paper was prepared in this Department on "Asiatic Immigration into Canada" (March 1, 1947). It was prepared with special reference to the pressure being exerted by the Chinese at that time. Although more diplomatic pressure may now be coming from India than China, I think you will find in this paper a possible basis for further study and investigation of the quota system.

5. I would be glad to discuss this problem with you at any time.

Note du haut-commissariat de l'Inde

Memorandum by High Commission of India

IMMIGRATION OF INDIANS INTO CANADA

There is discrimination against Indians in Canada in the matter of:

(i) Immigration of Indians into this country; and

(ii) admission of relatives of Indians already settled down in Canada.

(i) Under the Order-in-Council No. PC 2115 of 16th September, 1930, immigration of persons of Asiatic race, including Indians, is prohibited. After the attaining of independence by India and in view of very cordial relations between Canada and India, the Government of Canada have been approached from time to time for removal of this ban. Large scale immigration from India will neither be possible nor desirable but it has been represented to the Government of Canada previously to consider favourably the question of immigration of Indians on an annual quota basis as is being done in the United States.

(ii) The present position of about 1400 Indians settled down in Canada is anomalous in the respect that, although they are Canadian citizens, they do not enjoy the same rights as their other fellow Canadian citizens of European origin. The latter have the privilege to bring into Canada not only their first degree relatives but, according to the announcement of the Immigration Minister of 30th June, 1950,[28] any of their relatives sponsored by them can be admitted as immigrants. Further, immigrants will also be brought by employers to a maximum limit of 25. However,

[28] Voir/See Canada, Canadian Weekly Bulletin, Volume 5, No. 35, July 7, 1950, p. 6.

Canadian citizens of Indian origin, at present, can only seek admission of their wives, and children under 18 years of age. This has been the main cause of complaint of those of our people who have settled down in British Columbia. In view of the changed times and the cordial relations which exist between our two sister countries of the Commonwealth, it may be agreed that this remaining differentiation should be removed against Canadian citizens of Indian origin at an early date.

On representations from the Indian community in British Columbia, this Mission has time and again taken over this matter with the Immigration authorities at Ottawa. Last year they only agreed to give consideration to applications for admission of relatives of Indians resident in Canada only where these residents have reached an advanced age and require assistance not otherwise available in the management of their properties in this country. This concession is however meagre as compared to the facilities given to other Canadian citizens of European origin. It has also been brought to notice that in view of the general policy of ban on immigration from India, the applications made for admission under this category have not been given the same consideration as is being given to those from other Canadian citizens. Moreover even if given the necessary sympathetic consideration in such cases, this concession does not give equal privileges and facilities in the matter of admission of relatives to Canadians of Indian origin with those of Canadians of European origin.

The Government of India and the Indian community in Canada have deeply appreciated the very sympathetic consideration shown by the Government of Canada in the matter of granting privileges of citizenship rights and other immigration concessions to the Indian community in British Columbia and doubtless the grant of equality with other Canadian citizens of European origin in regard to admission of all categories of relatives, as the latter enjoy, will be gratifying and will go a long way in further strengthening the bonds of friendship between our two great countries.

IMMIGRATION; ENTRY OF EAST INDIANS

37. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that representations had been received from the government of India renewing the request for elimination of the discrimination against Asians, including Indians, in the present immigration regulations. They were not pressing to have actual immigration entry conceded but only for removal of the directly discriminatory provisions.

38. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that the problem was essentially one of amending the provisions so that they appeared to place Asians on the same basis as other persons but without, in fact, extending a right of entry. Certain additions to the admissible groups of Asians had in practice been made recently under the general authority to grant exceptions. This had been applied in relation to Lebanese and such persons. A small interdepartmental committee had been established to examine the problem of modifying the regulations affecting Indians.

39. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning representations seeking amendment of the provisions regarding the entry of Asians, and particularly Indians, into Canada.

IMMIGRATION; EAST INDIANS AND CHINESE

19. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 29th, 1950, said that work was continuing on revision of the immigration regulations applying to Asians. It would be difficult to eliminate the appearance of discrimination while at the same time maintaining the exclusion of providing for only a very small inflow of Asian immigrants. The most obvious method was to apply a quota to each of the Asiatic countries. So long as there was no quota for non-Asiatic immigration, however, this was a continuation of discrimination in another form. The quotas would probably also involve discriminations as between Asiatic countries. Another possibility might be to approach the government of India, which was the one immediately concerned, to ascertain whether a treaty or agreement might be arranged to establish a quota of possibly 100 persons per year and thus permit the removal of Indians from the application of the general regulations.

Pending decision on the general question, it seemed desirable to make a slight relaxation in the provisions of Order in Council P.C. 2115 of September 16th, 1930, so that entry of husbands of Canadian citizens of Asian origin and also of unmarried children between 18 and 21 could be allowed.

20. The Secretary of State for External Affairs thought it would be desirable to investigate the possibility that a treaty might be acceptable to the Indian government. If something could be done that would give the three Asian commonwealth countries a preferred position, it would be desirable.

21. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and agreed:

(a) that Order in Council P.C. 2115 of September 16th, 1930 be amended to permit the entry of the husband of a Canadian citizen of Asian origin and also unmarried children of a Canadian citizen between the ages of 18 and 21; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly; and,

(b) agreed that the Department of External Affairs investigate the possibility of entering into a treaty or agreement with the government of India, and possibly with the governments of Pakistan and Ceylon, concerning immigration into Canada.

PAKISTAN: EXPORTATION DES ARMES
PAKISTAN: EXPORT OF ARMS

709. DEA/50000-J-40

Note du chef de la Direction économique pour la Direction du Commonwealth

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Commonwealth Division

SECRET Ottawa, March 27, 1950

I refer to form memorandum No. 267 attached.†

2. On December 8th, 1948, Cabinet approved the export of certain items of military equipment to India and Pakistan.[29] This approval applied specifically to a long list of items which the Government of Pakistan had requested. The list is entitled "Annexture to M.G.O. Letter No. D.O. MGO/7 dated 27-10-48". This Annexture included an item of 114,750 rounds of 20 mm ammunition. The Canadian Commercial Corporation now request permission to export 576,000 rounds of this ammunition. The Annexture included an item of 24,540 rounds of 6 pounder 7 cwt. H.E. Shell. The Canadian Commercial Corporation now wish to export to Pakistan 50,757 rounds of this ammunition, and they point out that the Annexture included a similar item of 78,143 rounds of 6 pounder 7 cwt. APCBC/SVDS.

3. The departmental memorandum to Cabinet which recommended the approval included the following political considerations as pertinent in considering the applications:

(1) There had been no resolution in the Security Council of the United Nations which would require Canada to forbid the export of military equipment to these countries, although items concerning Kashmir and Hyderabad had been on the Security Council agenda for some time and final disposition of them had not been made. It was stated that the United Kingdom had been supplying military equipment to both India and Pakistan.

(2) At the meeting of Prime Ministers in London in 1948, India and Pakistan representatives had both stressed the importance of maintaining their military strength in order to provide a defence against Soviet expansion and Communism at home.

4. The memorandum to Cabinet also stated that the representative of India had made it clear, when approached informally, that he considered that Canada should, as a matter of course, sell arms to another member of the Commonwealth.

5. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has obtained final approval from this Department for each shipment of items of military equipment listed in the Annexture. We have approved exports valued at $10,900,000 in 1949 of this equipment, and in addition, authority has been obtained and approval given for other exports of arms and ammunition by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and exports of aircraft and spare parts by private companies, so that the total value of exports of arms and ammunition to Pakistan approved by this Department in 1949 is $11,265,987. Pakistan is by far our largest customer for arms and ammunition.

6. We understand from the Canadian Commercial Corporation that the list approved by Cabinet on December 8th, 1948, if filled entirely, would mean exports to Pakistan of equipment worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

7. I understand that the situation in Kashmir is very tense, and I am, therefore, recommending to the Minister that the whole question of exports to Pakistan should be again submitted to Cabinet. I should be glad to have, at your early convenience, comments on the recommendation which should be made to Cabinet on this particular request from the Canadian Commercial Corporation and on the whole policy of exports of arms and ammunition to India and Pakistan.

Note du chef de la Direction du Commonwealth pour la Direction économique

Memorandum from Head, Commonwealth Division, to Economic Division

SECRET [Ottawa], March 31, 1950

In reply to your memorandum of March 27, concerning the export of arms from Canada to Pakistan, I concur in your opinion that it would be wise to submit this question to Cabinet. As I feel that our present policy in this respect is sound, the submission to Cabinet should not be designed to secure a change but rather to ensure that the government is kept fully informed on this matter.

2. The situation in Kashmir is momentarily at least somewhat less tense because the Security Council recently, by a vote of eight in favour, none against, two abstaining and one (U.S.S.R.) absentee, adopted a resolution for the appointment of a mediator whose basic task would be to give effect to a programme for demilitarization of Kashmir. However, communal riots in East and West Bengal have recently created a danger situation which it is feared in certain quarters might even lead to hostilities between India and Pakistan; the decision of Liaquat Ali Khan to proceed to New Delhi on April 2 has relieved the immediate tension and given rise to hopes that he, with Mr. Nehru, will be able to pave the way for better relations between the two countries.

3. If war eventuates, it would be unhappy to realize that the two members of the Commonwealth were using against each other ammunitions and war material supplied in part by Canada. The Indian Government might lodge a complaint on the basis that Canada had sold very considerably more to Pakistan than to India.[30]

4. These factors, nevertheless, do not seem to be of sufficient weight to change the Canadian policy on export of arms. Such arms are certainly required and will undoubtedly be supplied from elsewhere, if not from Canada, in order to equip the Indian and Pakistan armed forces to meet the threat of communism.

5. A ban on the export of arms to the sub-continent would result in a situation very similar to that produced by the "non-intervention" policy in Spain, whereby friendly governments denied arms to the Loyalist Government which they recognized, although at the same time the rebel Franco Government was known to be receiving shipments from Germany and Italy. As India has arsenals of her own, a ban on the export of arms to the sub-continent would not apply equally to both countries, but would, in effect, grievously weaken Pakistan without similarly affecting India. It could be expected that Pakistan would violently resent such action on the part of Canada and would probably leave the Commonwealth, particularly if other Commonwealth nations adopted a policy similar to that of Canada. It would be difficult to estimate the reaction of other Moslem countries. Within the sub-continent such a ban on exports might encourage Indian aggression as Pakistan would be a comparatively easy victim if arms were not available from outside sources.

6. I have spelled out the situation at some length for your information. You may well feel that there is no need to incorporate all of these details in the memorandum which you make for the Minister. In my opinion, the factors set forth in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your memorandum of March 27 are conclusive.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO PAKISTAN

I agree with the suggestion made in your memorandum of the 27th of March that, in view of the tense situation in Kashmir, the present policy concerning the export of arms to India and Pakistan should be reviewed.

2. Nevertheless, I feel that on balance it would be unwise at the present time to alter the policy which we have been following. The arguments in favour of authorizing the additional shipment of arms, described in the annex of your memorandum, seem to me to be as follows:

(a) The Pakistan forces are so inferior, both in numbers and equipment, to the Indian forces and have to rely so much more than the Indian forces on arms, munitions and equipment from abroad that I think these further shipments from Canada would be more likely to maintain the present balance in Kashmir rather than disturb it.

(b) The Pakistan Government already believes that the adoption by the Security Council of its resolution on Kashmir of the 14th of March (which, in the Pakistan view, is a dilution of General McNaughton's proposal of the 17th of December) represents some surrender by western countries, and particularly by the United States and the United Kingdom, to Indian intransigence. A decision by the Canadian Government to alter its policy and to refuse to allow further export or arms to Pakistan would be interpreted by the Pakistanis as further evidence that they were progressively being abandoned.

(c) At the moment the crux of the whole situation, I believe, is the attitude of the Indian Government. Unless Pandit Nehru can be persuaded, by whatever means and under whatever disguises, to back down and permit the demilitarization of Kashmir and the holding of an unfettered plebiscite, there is little hope that the dispute can be settled. Continued shipment of arms to Pakistan might have some effect in convincing him that Kashmir cannot be annexed to India by a slow process of attrition.

3. The arguments in favour of halting the export of arms from Canada to Pakistan seem to be as follows:

(a) Continued supply of arms from Canada on a large scale might tend to stiffen opinion in Karachi. And, although no further concessions of substance should be demanded, in my view, from the Pakistan Government, it is, of course, essential, if a settlement is to be reached, that the attitude of the Pakistan Government should remain supple. However, the events of the past few weeks have shown that the Pakistan Government are not at present disposed to adopt an inflexible position.

(b) To those in Canada and elsewhere who are not well acquainted with the relative military strength of India and Pakistan, nor with the rights and wrongs of the Kashmir dispute, export of arms on a considerable scale from Canada to one of the parties of the dispute might seem to be an irresponsible policy in view of the very critical situation in Kashmir.

4. It may be inferred from the manner in which I have presented the arguments against continuing the present policy that I do not think they are strong enough to dictate a change at the present moment. I agree, however, that it would be wise, once again, to acquaint Cabinet with the issues involved. I also feel that close watch must be kept on this subject, in case during the next few months it seems advisable to reverse the present Canadian policy.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], April 5, 1950

EXPORT OF ARMS TO PAKISTAN

An application has been received from the Canadian Commercial Corporation to export to Pakistan ammunition as follows:

576,000 rounds of 20mm cartridges valued at	$ 764,786.88
50,575 rounds of 6 pounder 7 cwt. H.E. Shells valued at	$1,100,006.25
Total value	$1,864,793.13

2. On December 8th, 1948, Cabinet approved the export to Pakistan of a list of military equipment recommended in a departmental memorandum of December 7th, 1948 (copy of which is attached). About one-third of the ammunition now requested is covered by items in the list approved by Cabinet on December 8th, 1948.

3. The departmental memorandum to Cabinet which recommended the approval included the following political considerations as pertinent in considering the applications:

(1) There had been no resolution in the Security Council of the United Nations which would require Canada to forbid the export of military equipment to these countries, although items concerning Kashmir and Hyderabad had been on the Security Council agenda for some time and final disposition of them had not been made. It was stated that the United Kingdom had been supplying military equipment to both India and Pakistan.

(2) At the meeting of Prime Ministers in London in 1948, India and Pakistan representatives had both stressed the importance of maintaining their military strength in order to provide a defence against Soviet expansion and Communism at home.

4. The memorandum to Cabinet also stated that the representative of India had made it clear, when approached informally, that he considered that Canada should, as a matter of course, sell arms to another member of the Commonwealth.

5. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has obtained final approval from this Department for each shipment of items of military equipment listed in the Department's submission to Cabinet of December 8th, 1948. There have been shipments of equipment from this list amounting to $9,216,057.08, and the export of equipment valued at $1,321,711.82 has been approved, but the equipment has yet to be shipped. In addition, authority has been obtained and approval given for other exports of arms and ammunition by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and exports of aircraft and spare parts by private companies, so that the total value of exports of arms and ammunition to Pakistan approved by this Department in 1949 is $11,265,987. Pakistan is by far our largest customer for arms and ammunition.

6. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has informed us that the list approved by Cabinet on December 8th, 1948, if filled entirely, would mean exports to Pakistan worth hundreds of millions of dollars. In view of this, and of the tense situation in Kashmir and Bengal, it was felt necessary that you should acquaint Cabinet with the issues involved in exporting arms to Pakistan.

7. The following considerations appear relevant:

(1) The Pakistan forces are so inferior, both in numbers and equipment, to the Indian forces and have to rely so much more than the Indian forces on arms, munitions and equipment from abroad that further shipments from Canada would be more likely to maintain the present balance in Kashmir rather than disturb it.

(2) The Pakistan Government already believes that the adoption by the Security Council of its resolution on Kashmir of the 14th of March represents some surrender by western countries, and particularly by the United States and the United Kingdom, to Indian intransigence. A decision by the Canadian Government to alter its policy and to refuse to allow further export of arms to Pakistan would be interpreted by the Pakistanis as further evidence that they were progressively being abandoned.

(3) Continued shipment of arms to Pakistan might have some effect in convincing Pandit Nehru that Kashmir cannot be annexed to India by a slow process of attrition.

(4) Continued supply of arms from Canada on a large scale might tend to stiffen opinion in Karachi.

(5) To those in Canada and elsewhere who are not well acquainted with the relative military strength of India and Pakistan, nor with the rights and wrongs of the Kashmir dispute, export or arms on a considerable scale from Canada to one of the parties of the dispute might seem to be an irresponsible policy in view of the very critical situation in Kashmir. If war eventuated, it would be unhappy to realize that the two members of the Commonwealth were using against each other ammunition and war material supplied in part by Canada. Since the cease-fire in Kashmir, we have refused no export of arms to either India or Pakistan, although Pakistan has requested a much greater amount than India.

8. In view of these considerations, I suggest that you recommend that Cabinet approve the present request to export ammunition to Pakistan valued at $1,864,793.13, but that it rescind its blanket approval granted on December 8th, 1948, and that further requests for arms from Pakistan should not be granted unless approved by Cabinet.[31]

SECRET Ottawa, March 22, 1950

UNITED KINGDOM IMPORT PROGRAMME — USE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR CREDIT

These matters are likely to be introduced into Cabinet later this week by the Minister of Finance. They were the subject of an emergency meeting yesterday of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy called by Dr. Clark. A recent telegram from Washington was under discussion (WA-645†). It quoted ECA estimates purporting to show drastic cuts in United Kingdom imports from Canada — particularly imports of wheat. A draft reply to that telegram is being sent to you under cover of a separate memorandum.

2. The United Kingdom import programme for 1950-51 is not yet settled; it cannot be settled until the size and conditions of the ECA appropriation are much more clear than at present. A meeting of the Canada-U.K. Continuing Committee had been planned for April but has been postponed by mutual consent. Separate discussions were planned regarding U.K. imports of Canadian wheat and flour when the present contract runs out at the end of July. Mr. Howe had planned to discuss these matters with the United Kingdom late in May or early in June.

3. In the Committee meeting Dr. Clark proposed, partly supported by Mr. Towers, that before new negotiations began the Canadian Government should suspend further drawings by the U.K. on the Canada-U.K. Credit. Drawings have been running at the rate of $10 millions a month. There is some $90 millions left in the Credit — enough to last until the end of 1950. Dr. Clark feels that, in the coming negotiations, we shall need all the ammunition we can accumulate; that it is unlikely and perhaps unnecessary that Parliament would vote further financial aid to the U.K. this year; and that as much as possible of what credit is available should be held in reserve as a bargaining weapon.

4. Mr. Towers, while agreeing with Dr. Clark that suspension of drawings was desirable, proposed to put it up to the U.K. in a more conciliatory way and, if possible, to gain their agreement. There are purely financial grounds on which the U.K. might (other things being equal) be willing to forego drawings. The U.K. are, temporarily and accidentally, very flush with Canadian dollars; their working balance in the Bank of Canada is some ten times its normal size. For the past five months their drawings on the Canadian loan have merely added to their swollen balance in the Bank; over the coming five or six months they would have no difficulty even if they were not allowed access to the credit because they could simply draw down their bank balance. Meanwhile, if the Canadian Government provides them with additional money from the Credit, this money has to be borrowed by the Government at an appreciable cost in interest.

5. Mr. Mackenzie said that, if the suspension of drawings could be justified and accepted on purely banking grounds, that was one thing; but it was quite another if the suspension was connected in any way with ECA statistics, with the threat of U.S. food exports to the U.K. and with the coming negotiations between the U.K. and Canada. He felt that, as a result of tripartite and other discussions, Canada was under some moral obligation to allow continuing use of the U.K. credit. (This was vigorously denied by Dr. Clark who said that, last September, he told Sir Henry Wilson Smith that there was no commitment beyond December). Mr. Mackenzie also expressed misgivings about the reaction in Washington if Canada (without full agreement from the U.K.) stopped financing even a share of the North American export surplus.

6. Mr. Plumptre, representing this Department, did not take an active part in the discussion, but gave some support to Mr. Mackenzie.

7. Dr. Clark said he would be advising his Minister to propose in Cabinet the suspension of drawings on the U.K. loan. Since he could not get the full support of the Committee he suggested that other departments represented should tell their Ministers of the action he proposed.

8. Mr. Mackenzie undertook to raise with his Minister the possibility of advancing the date at which new negotiations with the U.K. would take place regarding wheat and flour. (He did not expect to get any commitment from the U.K. except covering flour). The other members of the Committee all felt that the date should be advanced, and that it should be fixed immediately. The Government would then be able to say the first steps towards new arrangements had already been taken — a desirable statement to be able to make if recent ECA estimates on wheat exports leaked out to the public.

9. The text of this report is being sent to London and Washington for comments.[32] The Minister of Finance cannot attend Cabinet until Saturday and we should have some replies by that time.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Plumptre from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-490 of March 22nd.† Use of Canadian dollar credit to United Kingdom.

1. I am in agreement with the line taken by Mackenzie as reported in paragraph 5 of your memorandum to Mr. Pearson. While it is impossible to estimate in advance the intensity of the reaction in Washington to a suspension of drawings on the credit as a bargaining lever with the United Kingdom, it is evident that such an action would be noted unfavourably at least by the officials in the Administration who are charged with responsibility in this field of policy. I am not interested in whether or not Canada is under any moral obligation to allow continuing use of the credit, since an appeal to moral obligations usually serves only to confuse the issue. The fact is that a suspension of the use of the credit at the present time, when we are certainly not compelled to do so on financial grounds, will have an ugly appearance, especially in the light of the reductions in United States aid to the United Kingdom during the next fiscal year. To argue here that we are justified in doing this to assist us in later bargaining over the United Kingdom import program (and possibly as an incidental retaliation for E.C.A.'s unjustified guess of what that program will be) will carry absolutely no conviction.

2. The position, of course, would be somewhat different if the United Kingdom agreed that their supply of Canadian dollars was ample to carry them through the next few months and concurred in a postponement so that some remaining part of the credit would be available in 1951. Even an agreed suspension of this nature, however, strikes me as being open to objection from the Washington point of view. The argument could, and quite possibly would, be made that the fact that the

[32] Envoyé à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis, télégramme N° EX-490 du 22 mars 1950 et au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni, télégramme N° 396 du 22 mars 1950.
Sent to Ambassador in United States, Telegram EX-490 of March 22, 1950 and to High Commissioner in United Kingdom, Telegram No. 396 of March 22, 1950.

United Kingdom did not need to go on drawing on the Canadian credit was good evidence that they were being helped too lavishly by the United States, since E.C.A. dollars were reaching Canada in such volume that they were piling up there in the United Kingdom's balances.

3. I noted that Mackenzie's expectation is that the United Kingdom will not make any commitment to import a firm quantity of wheat when the contract runs out and that some commitment on flour is all that he expects. This is what I had assumed would happen under the International Wheat Agreement. Do those who advocate a suspension of the credit for bargaining purposes aim at getting from the United Kingdom an undertaking which would in effect be a continuation of the wheat contract for a fifth year by agreement to purchase a fixed quantity at a set price?

4. Would not a suspension of drawings for bargaining purposes, with the object of later getting a United Kingdom commitment to buy Canadian wheat, resemble very closely the tactics implied in E.C.A.'s estimates of the wheat import program of the United Kingdom in 1950-51? Would it be consistent for us to take a strong line with E.C.A. about the "forecast" of a reduction of $100 millions in the United Kingdom's wheat imports from Canada and a corresponding addition to their imports from the United States, while denying credit to the United Kingdom unless and until we receive their promise to take wheat from us? Would it not also make our later negotiations with the United Kingdom more difficult if we suspended the credit before the negotiations began? It must be remembered that the United Kingdom has no responsibility whatever for the estimate of their import program prepared by E.C.A., which is entirely a product of the imagination of certain E.C.A. officials. Ends.[33]

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Plumptre from Wilgress, Begins: Your telegram No. 396 of March 22nd† to London regarding United Kingdom import programme and use of Canadian credit.

1. I do not, repeat not, have in Geneva the E.C.A. estimates purporting to show drastic cuts in United Kingdom imports from Canada particularly imports of wheat as disclosed to you in Washington telegram WA-645. This necessarily limits scope of my comments. For instance, I cannot judge how far reduction of wheat imports

[33] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
The Minister & USSEA & N.A. Robertson have seen this. No further distribution is required. A.F.W.P[lumptre]

reflects United Kingdom hope for a fall in wheat prices. We know they are anxious to improve terms of trade in their favour and hence it is natural that their policy will be directed towards bringing wheat price down to minimum provided for in International Wheat Agreement. We can also assume that the United Kingdom will not be above using present United States emphasis on disposal of agricultural surpluses to force us into a position where we will be compelled to extend financial assistance to the United Kingdom for an indefinite period. All this shows the need for us to proceed with great caution and not, repeat not, to be hurried into taking decisions which later on may place us at a disadvantage.

2. For these reasons I doubt the wisdom of connecting any suspension of further drawings by the United Kingdom on the Canadian credit too directly with negotiations concerning wheat. I think use of Canadian credit as a bargaining weapon might be kept in reserve rather than employed at the outset. There is the danger that if use of Canadian credit is employed for bargaining purposes the United Kingdom may force us to grant further credits as a means of disposing of our wheat after existing credit is exhausted. This would be tantamount to placing us in the position of having to give away our wheat which we have always taken such great care to avoid.

3. Accordingly if suspension of drawings on credit is decided upon I think it would be very much better to link it exclusively with present large United Kingdom balance in Canadian dollars that is on purely banking grounds. If later on it became necessary to use credit for bargaining purposes in connection with [group corrupt] it would make little difference if we used the threat of suspending drawings or threat of not, repeat not, restoring United Kingdom right to draw on credit.

4. For same reasons I feel it would not, repeat not, be wise to approach United Kingdom simultaneously both about suspension of drawings on credit and about negotiations for wheat. I realize the desirability of being able to say first steps towards new arrangement have already been taken. Perhaps, therefore, the first step should be to make arrangements for discussions regarding clarity. Our view had been that these discussions should be deferred until Congress had acted upon ECA appropriations, and also after United Kingdom budget had been submitted. On the other hand, it would not, repeat not, be wise to defer discussions until a date too near the expiration of present wheat contract. While, therefore, I feel United Kingdom Government might be approached now about the date of discussions I still think it would be an advantage if the actual discussions did not, repeat not, take place until late in May or early June as originally planned. If, however, earlier discussions are needed from the point of view of public relations, they could take place towards the end of April since we know Sir Henry Wilson Smith will be available at that time but will be absent from London during May. I very much feel, however, it is important we should not, repeat not, give the impression to United Kingdom that we are in a panic or unduly disturbed about what we have learned in Washington.

5. Whatever date may be decided on for wheat negotiations I feel, if possible, regarding suspension of drawings on Canadian credit should be kept separate and a reasonable interval should intervene between any official approach we may be making about wheat and such action. The same considerations would apply if we decided first to act on suspension of drawings on credit.

6. Apart from other considerations mentioned, I feel it would create an unfortunate impression in the United States if it was learned that we were suspending United Kingdom drawings on Canadian credit as preparation for bargaining over wheat. The same objection would not, repeat not, arise if it could be made clear in Washington that suspension of drawings had been proposed on purely banking grounds. Ends.[34]

Mr. Reid asked me to prepare a brief account of one or two matters that have moved forward (or have not moved forward) while you were away.

PROPOSAL TO SUSPEND THE USE OF THE CANADIAN CREDIT BY THE UNITED KINGDOM

The United Kingdom is at present using up the residue of the 1946 Canada-United Kingdom Loan at a rate of $10 millions a month. At this rate it will only last until December, 1950. In addition, however, the United Kingdom has built up a substantial balance in the Bank of Canada which would carry them through (at the same rate of drawings) until nearly the end of 1951. This balance in the Bank of Canada has resulted from large purchases of Canadian wheat by E.C.A. on British account.

Dr. Clark suggested that we should tell the British that they could no longer draw on the 1946 loan. He foresaw tough bargaining with the United Kingdom in the near future over Canadian wheat and flour exports; the present four-year contract runs out in July. He wanted to conserve the maximum amount of credit to bargain with. Towers gave him some support, arguing chiefly that the United Kingdom did not need to use the loan and the Canadian Government was now having to borrow money in order to hand it over to the United Kingdom who were not using it.

The opposition was led by Mackenzie who felt that we were under some moral obligation (denied by Clark) to continue releases of the loan and that any suspension would have very undesirable results not only in London, but also in Washington. In this view he was vigorously supported by Mr. Wrong to whom the matter was referred for advice. He felt that even if the United Kingdom freely agreed to suspend drawings this would be misconstrued in Congress to mean that the United Kingdom didn't need the money. This in turn would react unfavourably on the E.C.A. appropriation.

The matter was discussed between the Ministers concerned. Mr. Howe, supported by Mr. Pearson, evidently got Mr. Abbott to agree that we should not ask the United Kingdom to suspend drawings.

TOP SECRET & PERSONAL

Following Personal for the Prime Minister from C.D. Howe, Begins: Our discussions with the United Kingdom Ministers and officials on wheat questions ended yesterday afternoon. Pearson accompanied me to these meetings, along with the High Commissioner, Mackenzie, McIvor and Robertson. On the U.K. side there were the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Minister of Food, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and others.[35]

2. I am sending you this interim report, but I would be grateful if any discussion of the results of our talks could be postponed until my return on Tuesday next, as I am anxious to put the whole matter, as I see it, before Cabinet. In the circumstances, therefore, I would be glad if this telegram did not receive any circulation at this time.

3. The talks went very well and were conducted in a most friendly way. There were, of course, difficulties in discussing United Kingdom wheat import plans without some reference to price consideration or to the effect of any agreement on United States susceptibilities. Sir Stafford was also anxious to have the "have regard to" clause disposed of at this time.[36] On that point, I told him, however, that I had no authority to do this, and he, in his turn, made his view quite clear that we could not now expect to receive any specific monetary compensation for this clause. He hoped that the arrangement which we were now attempting to reach for 1950-51 would be a satisfactory basis for the future, and as such make us feel that the "have regard to" matter was now closed, although, at the same time, he felt that our agreed arrangement should stand on its own feet and not be considered as directly related to "have regard to" obligations.

[35] Il s'agissait respectivement de sir Stafford Cripps, Maurice Webb et P.C. Gordon Walker. These were Sir Stafford Cripps, Maurice Webb, and P.C. Gordon Walker, respectively.
[36] Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1946, N° 30./See Canada, Treaty Series, 1946, No. 30.

4. After considerable discussion I accepted yesterday the text cited below as a possible joint communiqué. It is this text that I would like to discuss with you and my colleagues next Tuesday, and I have informed the United Kingdom that final agreement on it will have to be postponed until such discussion. The final draft of the text represents, I think, a considerable improvement over the first United Kingdom draft, and in my own view, and that of Pearson, is a reasonably satisfactory document. It reads, Begins:

"Mr. C.D. Howe, Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, has held discussions in London with United Kingdom Ministers on the subject of the United Kingdom's wheat requirements in the crop year 1950-51 within the framework of the International Wheat Agreement.

"Both Governments have now reviewed the results of those talks. They are agreed that the International Wheat Agreement removes the need for a contract to replace the existing Anglo-Canadian Wheat Agreement which expires at the end of next month.

"The United Kingdom Government has made it clear that, out of its total wheat import requirements in 1950-51, it expects to buy a large proportion in Canada which, quite apart from the special contractual arrangements of the past four years, is, and it is hoped will remain, the traditional source of supply for the United Kingdom. The Canadian Government, for its part, is satisfied that Canadian wheat growers will continue to find in the United Kingdom a market for a very substantial part of their exportable wheat." Ends.

5. You will note from the above that no figures are mentioned. However, I have made it clear to the United Kingdom people, and they have agreed, that if I am pressed in the House on this point and feel that some mention of figures is unavoidable, I shall say that our understanding is that our exports of wheat to this market in 1950-51 will be not less than 100 million and not more that 120 million bushels. It has also been agreed that for this year, without prejudice to subsequent years, the U.K. will take 300,000 tons of flour, which represents 50,000 tons more than they have been holding out for.

6. If the above arrangement is confirmed in Ottawa on my return, a question will be asked the Chancellor in the House of Commons here on the results of recent Anglo-Canadian wheat talks, to which he will reply as follows:

"It is the hope of the Government of U.K. that they will be able to meet their requirements for dollar wheat from their traditional market in Canada within the IWA.

"This should be possible provided that such wheat can be purchased upon as favourable terms as those obtained by any other buyer in the dollar market whether in USA or Canada". Ends.

WHEAT; ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

1. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported on discussions held in London on the sale of wheat to the United Kingdom in 1950-51.

The discussions had dealt particularly with three questions: the quantity of Canadian wheat to be bought by the United Kingdom from Canada in 1950-51; the proportion of that quantity to be taken as flour; and the final settlement of any questions still outstanding under the "have regard to" clause of the 1946 wheat contract.

At the meetings, the United Kingdom [representative] had indicated that there would be no objection to his saying that he thought it was reasonable to assume that Canada would be able to sell 100 to 120 million bushels of wheat to the United Kingdom in 1950-51 at competitive International Wheat Agreement prices. This would include the carry-over of 12.5 million bushels bought under the terms of the four year contract. The grain trade felt that the figure was likely to be closer to 120 than to 100 million and, if the extraction rate in milling were reduced from 85% to 80%, a somewhat larger amount could be sold. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was willing to say that the U.K. Government hoped that they would be able to meet their dollar wheat requirements from their traditional market in Canada within the International Wheat Agreement and that this should be possible provided such wheat could be purchased on terms as to price, quality and position not less favourable than those obtained by any other buyer in the dollar market whether in the United States or Canada.

With regard to flour, the United Kingdom would be willing to take 300,000 tons in 1950-51, provided terms were competitive, on the understanding that this was without prejudice to a possible lower scale of purchases in 1951-52.

In connection with the "have regard to" clause, the United Kingdom were anxious not to be represented as having given assurances regarding wheat purchases in 1950-51 in return for the waiver of a claim by Canada under the "have regard to" clause. Nevertheless, in the context of these discussions, the United Kingdom felt that it would be reasonable that all obligations under the "have regard to" clause might be considered to have been taken care of. Mr. Howe had said that was a matter which could only be settled by the Cabinet on his return.

Final confirmation of the results of the discussions had been deferred until the Cabinet had an opportunity to consider the report concerning them.

2. Mr. Howe read a draft statement proposed for publication in the United Kingdom and Canada. It would indicate that the two Governments had agreed that the International Wheat Agreement removed the need for a contract to replace the one which would expire on July 31st. It would also state that the U.K. Government had made clear that, out of its total wheat requirements in 1950-51, it expected to buy a large proportion in Canada which, apart from the special arrangements of the last four years, was, and it was hoped would remain, the traditional source of supply for the United Kingdom. It would add that the Canadian Government was satisfied that Canadian wheat growers would continue to find in the United Kingdom a market for a very substantial part of their exportable wheat. In response to a question, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say that it was hoped that the United Kingdom would be able to meet its requirements for dollar wheat from the traditional market in Canada and that it would so be able to meet them if purchases could be made on terms not less favourable than those accorded other purchasers of wheat from the dollar area.

3. The Minister of Agriculture said that it was important that there should be no suggestion in any statement that the United Kingdom had not undertaken an obligation under the "have regard to" clause. Wheat producers in Canada would feel that, in view of the sales below world prices in the early years of the contract, there was an obligation toward them either by the United Kingdom or by the Canadian Government. It was possible that the feeling could be met by a supplementary payment of something of the order of five cents per bushel. The question was a difficult one and would have to be discussed further at a later date. It had to be recognized that the basis of arrangement laid Canada open to the danger of price cutting by the United States if the carry-over there became burdensome.

4. The Minister of Finance mentioned that, in recent months, the United Kingdom had been building up substantial dollar balances in Canada. These now amounted to approximately $189 million. In the circumstances, it seemed desirable to have further drawings against the U.K. credit deferred until the United Kingdom was in a position where the drawings were actually required. A proposal to that effect might be made through the U.K. High Commissioner. There would be no suggestion that the credit was to be terminated but only that the time of drawing should be altered in accordance with U.K. needs.

5. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning discussions on wheat in the United Kingdom and agreed that arrangements be made for the immediate announcement of the results of the discussions in the terms proposed;

(b) agreed that further consideration of the "have regard to" clause be deferred to a subsequent meeting; and,

(c) approved the proposal of the Minister of Finance that it be suggested to the U.K. Government that drawings on its credit be deferred until it was in actual need of additional funds.

WHEAT PRICES; SETTLEMENT UNDER "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE

3. The Minister of Agriculture reviewed the history of the Wheat Agreement with the United Kingdom. The basis of the arrangement had been that the price for the last two years of the contract should be settled having regard to the relationship between the contract price for the first two years of the contract and world wheat prices. In 1949, the United Kingdom had represented that the price should be the maximum set under the world wheat agreement, i.e. $1.80 (U.S.). It had been settled at $2.00 in recognition of the obligation under the "have regard to" clause and a price of $2.06 had been realized. It could, accordingly, be argued that the United Kingdom had paid 25¢ or 26¢ per bushel in that period under the clause, representing an amount of about $35 million. There had been various estimates, some considerably exaggerated, of the possible gains which producers had foregone as a consequence of the operation of the Wheat Agreement. From various premises, the extent of loss could be plausibly estimated at anything between $100 and $180 million. In the circumstances, it might well be claimed that there was still an amount due to wheat producers. Taking a minimum figure for price advantages foregone, the residual amount due might be set at about $70 million.

During the four years of the contract, there had been approximately 1.4 billion bushels of wheat over which any additional payments might be pro-rated. An additional 5¢ per bushel on that amount would equal approximately $70 million. With undistributed amounts still held against sales during the pooling period, a payment of this sort would bring the total of further payments to producers up to about 12¢ per bushel. Since it had been made clear at the time of the 1950 negotiations that the United Kingdom felt its obligation under the "have regard to" clause had been discharged, any further obligation toward the producers was one to be met by the Canadian Government.

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that, in offering and entering into the contract, a principal consideration had been the stability and security provided for wheat producers during its continuance. An attempt now to re-open the basis of arrangement would amount to a claim that because the insurance had not, in the event, been needed the premium should be refunded. It had been made clear during the 1950 discussions that the United Kingdom would not enter into any further arrangement with regard to wheat purchases unless it was definitely understood that the U.K. obligation under the "have regard to" clause had been settled. This matter had been discussed by the Cabinet on May 30th, 1950, who had acquiesced in this interpretation of the position as the basis of the new arrangements.

5. The Minister of Finance suggested that approval of any additional payment such as that proposed would amount to an admission either that the wheat contract had been a bad one or that the Government had made an improvident arrangement in allowing the U.K. obligation to be considered settled. It was a proposal that would have to be carefully considered.

6. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, deferred, to a subsequent meeting, decision on the proposal concerning a further payment to producers on wheat sales during the period of U.K. agreement.

WHEAT PRICES; "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE

3. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 22nd, 1950, said that dissatisfaction with the prices paid wheat growers under the Wheat Agreement was not likely to become acute as long as general prosperity was maintained at its present high level. However, a number of people had felt that they had been forced to take $1.55 for their wheat when world prices were considerably higher and that no substantial benefit had accrued to them in the last two years from the "have regard to" clause.

4. The Minister of Finance suggested that the United Kingdom might perhaps consider they had implemented the "have regard to" clause in view of the higher prices paid during the 1949 period and the stability provided by the Agreement. Too much emphasis was placed on the arithmetical aspects of the problem and if the United Kingdom adopted a reasonable attitude towards imports from Canada during the coming year, they could be said to have fulfilled their obligation under the "have regard to" clause.

5. The Minister of Justice, while agreeing with the points put forward by Mr. Abbott, suggested that, although the case against making any additional payment into the wheat pool might be a valid one, it was difficult to explain to the people concerned who would feel that when the time came for settling up account, the "have regard to" clause had not had the value expected of it.

6. The Minister of Fisheries suggested that there were a number of other groups in addition to the wheat grower who had been put in a somewhat similar position with regard to foreign markets, as a result of price control. It should not be forgotten, however, that the general policy of price control resulted in compensating advantages. It might be worthwhile having an economic and accounting study made of the whole position.

7. The Cabinet, after further discussion agreed that the question of settlement of the "have regard to" clause under the Wheat Agreement be deferred until a later meeting when the Minister of Agriculture was present.

Note du secrétaire du Cabinet pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary to Cabinet to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], June 26, 1950

If, having in mind all the circumstances of the United Kingdom wheat contract and not simply the construction of the "have regard to" clause, it is felt that some special supplementary assistance should be given to the western wheat growers, I think there is something to be said for trying to project such assistance forward into the future instead of providing it in the form of retrospective payments for years which, all things considered, were very good ones for western farmers.

In the first day's discussion of this question in Cabinet, Mr. Howe spoke about the wheat contract as a form of insurance against the risks of uncertain markets and unstable prices in the immediate post-war period. In the event, and thanks, among other things, to the United States and Canadian credits and the Marshall Aid programme, these specific risks did not materialize, at least for wheat. Not unnaturally, there is a feeling that the premium paid for a stable return and secure market by foregoing the speculative profits has turned out to be a pretty heavy one. Mr. Howe said, and correctly, that one does not ask for the refunding of fire insurance premiums simply because you have not had a fire. Nevertheless, there remains something, I think, in the argument that their very real interest in the United Kingdom wheat market was over-insured for the four years' period now ending.

Continuing the insurance analogy, I have been wondering whether it would not be better policy for the Government to offer to continue the coverage for the next crop year, 1950-51, instead of, in effect, refunding some part of the premiums paid over the four completed crop years. This would take the form of an offer to purchase this year's crop at, say, the ceiling price under the International Wheat Agreement. To the extent that world prices for 1950-51 fell below the ceiling, the Government would be incurring a loss on its guarantee. If world prices continue at the ceiling, there would be no loss and there would have been a real and substantial insurance on the wheat growers' return over the whole of the forthcoming year.

It seems to me that some such policy as this would be a logical and consistent completion of the Government's general wheat policy during the post-war years, and it might discourage the forensic arithmetic which the "have regard to" clause has provoked. It would tend, I think, to keep world wheat prices nearer the ceiling of the Wheat Agreement than they might otherwise be, and it would not require any supplementary estimate this year.

WHEAT PRICES; "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE

6. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 23rd, 1950 suggested that, rather than extend supplementary assistance to wheat growers for past deliveries made under the U.K. wheat contract, consideration might be given to guaranteeing a price for this year's crop at or near the ceiling price under the International Wheat Agreement.

(Secretary's note to the Prime Minister June 26, 1950)

7. The Minister of Agriculture suggested that if the Government were not prepared at this time to extend supplementary assistance to wheat growers for past deliveries made under the U.K. wheat contract, it might be preferable to defer decision until consideration could be given to actual payments at the end of the wheat pool year.

8. The Cabinet, after further discussion, deferred decision, pending further consideration, on requests for supplementary assistance to wheat growers for deliveries made under the U.K. wheat contract.

WHEAT PRICES; SETTLEMENT OF "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE

7. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 26th, said that he was still of the opinion that some additional payment should be made to wheat producers in respect of the losses they might be considered to have suffered under the Wheat Agreement with the United Kingdom. If this was to be effected before the end of the year, a vote of monies from Parliament would be required and would have to be sought at the present Special Session. If such a course were not considered desirable, an announcement might be made that the matter was still under consideration.

8. The Prime Minister said that the Special Session had been called for very specific purposes. No announcement on the question of an additional payment to wheat producers should be made at present, beyond a statement that the matter would not be considered at the Special Session.

9. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that no announcement be made concerning consideration of an additional payment to wheat producers under the U.K. contract, beyond a statement that the matter would not be considered at the present Special Session of Parliament.

III. U.K.-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE; MEETING OF JUNE 19

7. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that during his recent visit to London it had appeared that the United Kingdom officials were anxious to have the meeting of the Continuing Committee that had been tentatively planned. The time seemed a suitable one at which to attempt to get some arrangement in relation to the British West Indies and for general reasons it seemed important to accept the invitation.

The principal items for the agenda would be the review of the balance of payments; a consideration of U.K. prospects for selling in Canada; the Canadian trading position in relation to the British West Indies; and the United Kingdom import programme for 1950-51.

In connection with the West Indies, an attempt was being made to prepare definite proposals to put before the United Kingdom. One possibility might be to have open general licenses provided for basic items, such as codfish, potatoes, flour and lumber. A different approach would be needed in relation to manufactured goods. Related to this discussion would be the question the United Kingdom had raised concerning liberalization of trade between O.E.E.C. countries and the colonies generally. It would be desirable if U.K. steps in relation to such liberalization could be held off until the Committee met.

As a part of the discussion of U.K. prospects for selling in Canada, there should be discussion of dumping duties. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had indicated while in London that it seemed probable that Canada would have to remove the present waiver. The United Kingdom would be expecting a definite statement on our policy. One possibility that might be considered, although there seemed to be legal difficulties, was that of a conditional waiver of dumping duty. There might be a provision to the effect that dump should not apply to products sold in Canada at a price below the domestic market price in the country of origin, if the export price to Canada was not less than the general export price. Another possibility might be to remove the waiver of dump on everything except automobiles. Perhaps it could be indicated that the waiver would be left in respect of cars until the exchange restrictions on automobile imports from the United States were removed.

8. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue thought that the suggested formula for a conditional waiver of dumping duty would not be practicable. It seemed clear that some action would have to be taken, and the best procedure might be to remove the waiver on everything except automobiles, as proposed.

9. The Chairman suggested that it might be desirable to explore the possibility of having the Dollar-Sterling Trade Board follow up cases in which dumping duty would now be applicable, in order to remove the circumstances that required a waiver. It would be much easier to eliminate the present waiver if it were actually inoperative.

10. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned that other matters for discussion at the Continuing Committee might be the question of sales of codfish to the Mediterranean area for sterling, and the probability of further relaxation of import controls in Canada. In connection with the latter, it seemed desirable to warn the United Kingdom that such relaxation was forthcoming.

11. The Committee, after considerable discussion,

(a) noted the report of the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the agenda for the meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee; and

(b) agreed that a memorandum on dumping duties be prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce for circulation to the members of the Committee.

Note du chef du Comité interministériel sur la politique du commerce extérieur pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Chairman, Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy, to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 165-50 [Ottawa], June 13, 1950

RESCINDING OF WAIVER OF DUMPING DUTIES

1. The Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy at its last meeting discussed the policy recommended in the attached memorandum. It was felt that a number of considerations should be placed before the Cabinet at the time the memorandum is under discussion.

2. It was felt by some members of the Committee that there were important considerations in relation to the general context and timing of action on dumping duties which were apart altogether from the specific merits of such action. Rescission of the waiver of dumping duties as an isolated action might be interpreted as a reversal of the general policy of assisting U.K. exports to Canada. While the U.K. government may understand the reasons for the action, U.K. manufacturers may regard it as a move to frustrate the efforts they have made and Canadian manufacturers may see it as a tendency toward domestic protection. It would have some tendency to firm prices at their present levels. A further factor is that in the United States a real effort is at present gaining ground to have a more constructive policy taken in assisting imports from abroad. It would be unfortunate if action by Canada should give comfort to elements in Congress and U.S. industry seeking to maintain or increase protection.

3. In the light of these considerations, it was suggested that as a matter of timing it might be preferable to take any action at the same time as tariff revisions resulting from the Torquay meetings are announced. After those discussions, there may be some downward revision in Canadian tariffs on certain U.K. imports. Action on dumping duties would be less noticeable and have a less pronounced appearance if taken in that context.

4. On the other side, it was pointed out in the meeting that the final results of the Torquay discussions might not be available for announcement for at least a year. That might be too long to retain the present anomalous position. Moreover, it was argued that U.K. sales in Canada are doing very well at the present time and that relatively minor price adjustments would enable British sales to continue. Where losses in U.K. trade do result, they will be a small part of the gains which have recently been made. It was felt that the U.K. government already understood that such action might be taken and the reasons for it.

5. So far as the proposal to leave the waiver with respect to automobiles is concerned, the Committee recognized that this could be represented as an extension of discrimination against the domestic automobile industry. On the other hand, it was thought that the exception could be justified on the ground that motor cars are in a unique position. They represent a case in which the domestic U.K. market is being deliberately starved and in which high prices are being purposely attached to the small fraction of output sold domestically. The normal standards with regard to dumping duty do not apply and the true criterion is whether export prices to Canada are less than export prices generally.

6. So far as concerns the present effect of the waiver of dumping duties on Canadian producers, it was felt that it would be difficult to show cases in which real injury was being sustained at the present time.

N.A. ROBERTSON

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du ministère du Commerce pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Department of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet

SECRET [Ottawa], June 13, 1950

RESCINDING OF WAIVER OF DUMPING DUTIES

1. Under the authority of Subsection II of Section VI of the Customs Tariff, P.C. 3550, dated August 9, 1948, and subsequent related Orders in Council, exempted the following goods from the special or dumping duty:

Motor vehicles, except those adapted for passenger use with a seating capacity for more than ten persons;
Linoleum and Oilcloth;
Confectionery;
Sanitary Earthenware;
Sporting Equipment, including golf and tennis balls, golf clubs and bags, tennis racquet frames, fishing tackle and roller skates;
Soda ash;
Cocoa butter and cocoa and chocolate preparations in powder form;
Lawn Mowers;
White Portland Cement;
Common and Colourless Window Glass.

The exemptions were applicable to all countries, but were made to assist British goods to compete in this market at a time when their prices, at then current exchange rates, were seriously interfering with the United Kingdom's attempts to divert exports to North America. The list was intended to cover those items on which it appeared that dumping did exist in the sense in which it is legally defined, but merely as a result of the premium prices caused by limited supply on the home market. The list did not, however, include such items as cotton textiles, radios, and others, which could have been dumped in the true sense of the word by the United States or other suppliers. It was decided to include automobiles only because of the existence of quantitative import controls in Canada.

2. Since devaluation of the pound sterling, British exporters have been able to sell some of the exempted commodities in Canada without violating the dumping provisions of our Customs law. Others are on the border line, but an important volume is, in fact, being sold at values substantially below the home market price in the United Kingdom. There remains, therefore, an element of dumping which does adversely affect Canadian production. This gives rise to protests that the present exemptions in our dumping duty laws give the British unfair competitive advantages, and that because the list is limited it discriminates against a selected number of Canadian industries. The publicity given to these protests may well have an adverse effect on the continued Canadian support of the overall British export drive. The waivers of dumping duty were never intended to be anything other than a temporary expedient, and the question of rescinding the respective Orders in Council is really one of timing.

3. At the present time, the suspension of the dumping clause provides British exporters with only limited advantages. In the case of automobiles, the exporters of those cars which comprise the greatest volume of exports to Canada, and which are most likely to become a permanent feature of this market, would only have to make minor changes in their pricing (in two cases less than 1 per cent of selling price) in order to avoid the technicality of dumping. Cocoa butter, cocoa and chocolate preparations in powder form are undoubtedly being dumped, but the price is fixed by the British Ministry of Food and it should be possible to make sufficient adjustments so that dumping would not be necessary.

4. In view of all the circumstances, the questionable value of some of the waivers, the undoubted discrimination against some Canadian manufacturers, and, indeed, the improved position of the United Kingdom generally, it seems desirable that the trade in these commodities between the two countries should now be brought on a more permanent basis than having it depend on special concessions.

5. This has been explained on a number of occasions to the British — particularly on the occasion of the recent visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The British have asked that this question be discussed at the forthcoming meeting of the United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs. They fear that the rescinding of the Orders in Council may be misunderstood by British exporters, in that they might gain the impression that, as soon as they showed signs of real progress in selling in this market, obstacles would be placed in their way.

6. Notwithstanding the British view, it is believed that, with the assistance of the Dollar Export Board in the United Kingdom and the Dollar Sterling Trade Board in this country, most of the exporters concerned can be persuaded so to adjust their affairs that the rescinding of the Orders in Council will have little practical effect, and that the psychological problem can be minimized. For this purpose some period of notice of discontinuance of the waivers may be necessary as an indication of good faith, and advice to these Boards of the Department of National Revenue's willingness to examine individual cases may be important. Automobiles, of course, are the most important item in the list.

7. It is, therefore, recommended that the Canadian delegation to the United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, scheduled to meet in London on June 19, be instructed, when discussing dumping duties, to advise the United Kingdom representatives that:

(a) with the exception of motor vehicles, it is the Canadian Government's intention to rescind the waiver of dumping duties on all other commodities at present listed, within the next three months;

(b) in the case of motor vehicles, the Government's intention is that the present waiver will be continued for the next twelve months (i.e. to June 30, 1951) or until quantitative restrictions are removed on the import of automobiles from the United States, whichever may be the sooner. This would be conditional upon a responsible undertaking from the United Kingdom that the selling prices of their automobiles to purchasers in Canada will not be less than the average of the prices at which vehicles of each model are currently being exported to all countries.[37]

I. UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS; REPORT ON LONDON DISCUSSIONS

1. The Committee heard a report from the members of the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on matters that had been under discussion.

(A) U.K. BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

2. Mr. Deutsch said that the U.K. representatives had given a very favourable estimate of the U.K. balance of payments for 1950. For the second quarter, the sterling area was in surplus with every area in the world. It appeared that for the first half of 1950 the balance would be even more favourable than the optimistic estimate that had been made a month or two previously. So far as trade with Canada was concerned, the sterling area had been pretty well in balance for the last two or three months and U.K. officials were of the opinion there was no reason why the balance should not continue. The present estimate was that the sterling area deficit with Canada for the current year would amount to about $56 million.

(B) U.K. SALES IN CANADA

(i) Rescission of Waiver of Dumping Duties

3. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the U.K. officials had been informed that action to remove the waiver of dumping duties would be required in the near future. A programme had been discussed along the lines approved by the Cabinet. The U.K. representatives seemed satisfied with the proposal to continue the waiver of dumping duties on motor vehicles for a further year or until restrictions against U.S. imports were removed, the continuance being on condition that U.K. selling prices to Canada were not less than the average export prices to other countries. In the case of cocoa and chocolate, the U.K. had asked that the waiver be continued until October 1, by which time it was expected that cocoa buying would be back in the hands of the private trade. There had been a wide disparity between selling prices to Canada and for domestic consumption in the U.K. but the prices were being adjusted.

So far as other items were concerned, the U.K. members did not seem particularly disturbed at the intimation that the waiver would have to end. It had been indicated that this would probably take place within about three months. The U.K. would like three weeks' notice of any changes. They would prefer that the rescission take place in stages rather than all at once. This would tend to prolong criticism and an alternative proposal might be to hold up all action until October 1, and then act in respect of all classes of goods.

4. The Chairman pointed out that the approval by the Cabinet had extended only to the statement which the Canadian delegation made to the U.K. representatives. The Cabinet had not as yet approved any specific action on the removal of the special dumping duty provisions.

(ii) Relaxation of Emergency Import Restrictions

5. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the meeting had been informed that the present prohibited list would probably be eliminated and that textile and leather quotas would be abolished. Other general changes had been outlined. The U.K. representatives expressed no concern about possible modifications in Schedules I and II. In the case of Schedule III, the items that might be removed from control had been presented in three lists:

(a) a number of items in respect of which the controls were not effective;

(b) several items manufactured in Canada where there was some element of protection;

(c) certain items where the controls had been of value to the United Kingdom in diverting purchases from United States to United Kingdom suppliers.

The U.K. group were not much interested in proposed changes effecting lists (a) and (b), but in the case of (c) they indicated several items on which they would prefer to see controls remain. It was proposed to prepare a composite list in the light of the discussion. The Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce would consult on timing. It seemed probable that the announcement should be made before the Torquay meeting but it would be administratively convenient to have the changes effective as from October 1. The proposed amendments would affect about 40 per cent of all the items in Schedule III.

(iii) Purchases under Canadian Government Contracts

6. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the U.K. delegation had been informed of the change in government policy as set out in Cabinet Directive No. 16. They had indicated their appreciation for the action taken.

(iv) Export Incentives to Individual Firms

7. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that there did not seem to be any very great push in the U.K. behind an incentive plan. Various departments took rather different views on proposals that had been made. It was quite possible that the United Kingdom might ultimately give approval to one or another scheme that would show promise of producing an increase in earnings of U.S. dollars.

(C) TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND COLONIAL TERRITORIES

8. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the delegation had submitted a number of proposals relating to Canadian trade with the British West Indies. The original proposal had been for open general licenses to be issued on a broad list of staple products. The U.K. representatives had felt that the use of open general licences would have to be considered on the basis of the sterling area as a whole and not in relation to the B.W.I. alone. It seemed that they were moving toward a policy of this sort for a selected list of items but they were not ready to take action as yet. Accordingly, a second plan had been presented by the Canadian delegation relating to the principal manufactured items entering into trade with the B.W.I. It was proposed that each customs area issue permits to Canadian exporters on a minimum basis of one-third of the average exports of each individual in the period 1946-48. These were the years of highest trade between Canada and the B.W.I. The plan of operation would be for the Department of Trade and Commerce in Ottawa to issue documents affirming the average level of export in the base period for individual exporters on the basis of which the relevant import controllers would issue the necessary permits. There were some cases at present where individual exporters were already getting licenses for more than one-third of their exports in the base period. These would not be disturbed by the formula which established only a minimum. The U.K. officials had agreed to the general lines of this proposal.

With regard to staple items other than flour and salt fish, the Canadian delegation had proposed that token imports be allowed on the basis of 50 per cent of average sales from 1946 to 1948. The principal items of concern were canned fish, canned meat, lumber, paper, fertilizers and feeding stuffs. The token arrangements would have to be extended to the United States and this led to special treatment for textiles. Consideration was being given to an arrangement by which a token import plan for textiles would be established at a rate less than 50 per cent — possibly 20, 15 or 10 per cent.

The general basis of understanding was that a comprehensive programme along the above lines would be adopted if, on examination, it was considered that the total cost of the plan for B.W.I. imports (from both Canada and the United States) would not exceed $6 million. The cost was to be calculated as the difference between probable movements under the three part arrangement less the cost of like goods moving during the 12 months ending June 30, 1950. This did not mean that $6 million was a ceiling on the total of Canadian and U.S. exports to the B.W.I. under the new arrangements. It was simply a formula for estimating whether the general plan should be adopted. The Department of Trade and Commerce thought that the plan would come within the cost limit that had been set. There could be no announcement until discussions with the B.W.I. and United States had been completed but it was hoped that an outline of the plan might emerge quite soon.

So far as flour was concerned, the U.K. representatives gave a general assurance that there would be no greater degree of restriction than at present. Flour was moving satisfactorily. In the case of salt fish, the issuance of open general licenses had been ruled out. It seemed probable that approval would be given to the issuance of licenses for dollar imports of salt fish to an amount between $3.5 and $4.5 million. The upper figure would allow a movement about equal to that taking place currently.

There had also been discussion of the proposal that the United Kingdom extend the arrangement that had been in effect for 1949 output from Newfoundland under which sales of salt cod to Spain, Portugal, Italy and Greece were allowed for sterling, the sterling being applied against the Newfoundland debt. The Canadian delegation had asked that sales for sterling to the amount of $6 million be allowed. It seemed probable that the United Kingdom would approve some smaller figure, possibly about $4 million. The matter was highly controversial and no announcement whatever could be made until definite decisions had been taken in the United Kingdom.

It had been generally intimated that, if the various arrangements with regard to Canadian trade with the B.W.I. were carried out, we would give agreement to the proposed measures for liberalization of trade between the Colonial territories and O.E.E.C. countries.

(D) U.K. PURCHASING PROGRAMME, 1950-51

9. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture said that the United Kingdom had been planning for a considerable shortfall in Canadian deliveries under the current bacon contract. They had been informed that it was to be expected that the entire contract amount would be delivered — most of it toward the end of the year or early in 1951. One U.K. suggestion concerning this had been that late deliveries of bacon be held up until March or April of 1951. It seemed clear that the United Kingdom would be prepared to enter into a contract for about the same amount in 1951. The United Kingdom wished to secure all the cheese that could be made available and there would definitely be a contract for 1951. It seemed quite probable that there would also be some purchases of apples. The U.K delegation had raised the possibility of another dollar-for-dollar arrangement but it had been indicated that this would probably not be possible.

10. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said it had been suggested that if, in view of the favourable development of U.K. exports to Canada, some additional purchases in Canada were justified it would be helpful if apples, honey and other small food items could be considered. Indications of increase in U.K. purchases did not mean that they were abandoning their $1200 million import programme. In many instances, there were real difficulties about availabilities and the full amount the United Kingdom wished to buy would not be forthcoming — items such as zinc, newsprint, asbestos and lumber were among these. It appeared that there would be a large order for Maritime lumber and that some Newfoundland iron ore would be bought both in 1950 and 1951.

11. The Committee, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the delegation concerning items under discussion at the meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs.

Dear Mr. Abbott,

NEWFOUNDLAND CODFISH

During the recent meeting of the Continuing Committee in London, agreement was sought by the Canadian members of the Committee to the continuance for the 1950 catch of the special arrangements applying to the 1949 catch for the sale of Newfoundland codfish to Mediterranean countries for sterling. The amount involved for the 1950 catch was estimated at the equivalent of $6 million.

It will be recalled that the arrangements for the 1949 catch were only agreed to by my Government as a special measure of transitional assistance to Newfoundland, with the clear understanding that they would apply only to the 1949 catch and that their continuance would not be sought in future years. This understanding was set out in my letter to Dr. Clark of the 30th November, 1948, and was again rehearsed in a further letter to him of the 31st January, 1950.†

Against this background, the request put forward by the Canadian members of the Committee naturally caused some concern to the United Kingdom representatives — running counter, as it did, to the understanding previously reached. In view, however, of the difficulties stressed by the Canadian side in this matter, the United Kingdom members agreed to submit the proposal to United Kingdom Ministers for consideration.

The question has now been considered by Ministers in the light of the discussions at the Committee and of our general financial relations with Canada; and I am glad to be able to inform you that in deference to the request of the Canadian Government Ministers have agreed that the existing arrangements should be continued for a further year subject to a limit of $6 million.

It is understood that the administrative arrangements will be the same as in previous years.

In communicating this information to you I have been asked to stress that the agreement of my Government is for one year only, i.e. relates only to the 1950 catch. While the difficulties of the Canadian Government are appreciated, it appears to my Government that what is needed is some alternative and more permanent solution of the problem which would not involve the United Kingdom in eventual loss of dollars. Now that Newfoundland forms part of Canada, the onus for devising such a solution would seem to rest with the Canadian authorities. Accordingly, it is suggested that the matter might appropriately be discussed further at the next meeting of the Continuing Committee, in the hope that it may then be possible for the Canadian members to put forward proposals which would place matters on a mutually acceptable basis for the future.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

SCHEME FOR TOKEN IMPORTS INTO THE BRITISH WEST INDIES

Sir Henry Wilson Smith informed me yesterday that the officials concerned had recommended and cleared with their own Ministers the scheme for token imports into the British West Indies, along the lines discussed at the recent meeting of the Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee. The scheme would cover imports of codfish but the recommendation respecting codfish still had to be cleared with the Secretary of State for Scotland. This was expected in the next day or two, whereupon we could be advised and the scheme would be notified officially to the Canadian Government through Clutterbuck.

Dear Mr. Plumptre,

UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE — SALES OF FISH TO BRITISH WEST INDIES

The Minutes of the Fourth Meeting of the United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee in London on 23rd June† record, on pages three and four, some discussion on Canadian sales to the West Indies of dried, pickled and salted fish. You will remember that it was agreed not to include fish in the token imports scheme, but the United Kingdom side agreed to consider further the representations made by the Canadian side about the restrictive policy of certain of the West Indies Governments in admitting Canadian fish, and then to communicate to the Canadian Government the result of their consideration.

As a result of the enquiries they have made of the West Indies governments concerned, the United Kingdom Government have now decided to tell these Colonial Governments that their import policy in regard to fish from Canada may in future be dictated purely by commercial considerations, and that the United Kingdom Government do not wish them to discriminate against Canadian fish to their own commercial disadvantage.

It appears that the Colonial Governments in the West Indies expect their imports from Canada of dried, pickled and salted fish in 1950 to amount to about $4.5 million. The reduction which this figure represents on the value of the 1949 imports arises almost entirely from price considerations.

As was mentioned during the Continuing Committee meetings, there has been considerable pressure in the United Kingdom for support of the home fishing industry in relation to the West Indies market. Against the background of this pressure, the United Kingdom Government have asked the Governor of Jamaica, who is reported to be negotiating a contract with Canadian suppliers covering the year August, 1950, to July, 1951, to consider confining the proposed contract to the rest of 1950 only, in order to give United Kingdom suppliers an opportunity of competing on a purely commercial basis for 1951.

Yours sincerely,

1. Following letter, dated January 19, has been received from George Goyder, British International Paper Limited, addressed to the High Commissioner. Letter begins:

The Newsprint Supply Company saw the President of the Board of Trade on Monday and were informed officially of the Government's decision to import no Canadian newsprint to Britain during the first six months of 1950.

The press take a poor view of this decision and are informing the public of their views over this week-end. I believe a great deal of unnecessary ill-will both in Canada and in England would be avoided by an arrangement to make token shipments until such time as the newsprint contracts can be resumed. It will be difficult to avoid the reaction that England has run out on an obligation in view of the fact that sufficient dollars have been found to purchase a very considerable quantity of pulp for the British paper mills in 1950.

I attach a cable which I received from Mr. Doane[38] on Monday and which the newspapers read to Mr. Harold Wilson.

So far as the newspapers and the Canadian mills are concerned I am sure you will understand the matter cannot be considered closed. Letter ends.

2. We assume that you have received from Mr. Doane text of his cable referred to above.

Dear Mr. Plumptre:

Thank you for sending me copies of Telegrams No. 123 and No. 142† from London, dated January 20th and 23rd respectively, concerning newsprint.

I have been unable to trace a copy of the text of Mr. Doane's cable, but believe it safe to assume that it covers the same ground as Goyder's letter quoted in Telegram No. 123.

Our Commercial Secretary in London cabled me several days ago on the question of giving support to token imports of Canadian newsprint, to which I replied as follows on January 14th:

"We are naturally anxious to do anything we can to assist in maintaining token newsprint shipments but find great difficulty in suggesting any positive action that we can take. We have a number of equally troublesome situations, i.e., pitprops, codfish, seal oil, etc., and I feel it is most important that we should not take any action which suggests to the British that we are asking them to help us out of a problem. We can only press in respect of the broader interests of the continuation of our mutual trade, and in this regard I think we have gone about as far as we can. We are not prepared to suggest or agree to diversion of funds from other commodities. Believe it would be preferable for newsprint supply company to make their own representations but rely on your good judgment to accompany Goyder or not as you see fit."

I feel that there is no need for any further action on our part.

Yours faithfully,

M.W. MACKENZIE

SUPPLIES OF CANADIAN NEWSPRINT FOR UNITED KINGDOM REQUIREMENTS

1. At a social gathering a few days ago Mr. Harold Wilson, President of the Board of Trade, spoke to me briefly and said he would like to have a talk with me in the near future on the subject of newsprint. His secretary has now telephoned to invite me to lunch with Mr. Wilson on Tuesday, October 31st, and stated that Lord Rothermere[39] would also be present.

2. From what I have heard, I believe the intention is to see in what manner the Canadian Government could bring pressure to bear on the Canadian newsprint companies to supply the Untied Kingdom requirements for the near future in view of the critical situation of supplies in this country at the present time. Connected with this will be the re-establishment of the former contract on a firm basis.

3. The details will only become clear after I have had my talk with Mr. Wilson and Rothermere, but it would be very useful for the purpose of this talk if I could have some preliminary guidance as to the attitude I should adopt towards this approach for Canadian Government intervention in what hitherto has been a matter of discussion between the Newsprint Supply Company and the Canadian producers.

Second Viscount Rothermere, Chairman, Associated Newspapers Ltd., United Kingdom.

2. You will recall that when the former contract was under consideration the Canadian Government brought some pressure on Canadian newsprint companies to supply the United Kingdom. When the United Kingdom went back on this contract their action was not only very upsetting to the companies but also embarrassing to the authorities in Ottawa.

3. Accordingly it is not considered that the Canadian Government is in any position to bring renewed pressure on the companies. If an official approach were made to them they would no doubt ask us to decide which of their present customers in the United States should receive reduced supplies. There is no authority for allocating exports of newsprint. It is, to say the least, very doubtful whether Ministers would wish to introduce any form of allocation or indeed to make a renewed approach to the Canadian companies in view of what happened to the former contract.

4. In short the United Kingdom authorities will have to try to make their peace with the Canadian companies. It is doubtful whether any pressure from the Canadian authorities would be helpful even if it were forthcoming, which is extremely unlikely.

Your telegram No. 1674 of October 30th — supplies of Canadian newsprint to the United Kingdom.

1. Your telegram was very helpful and enabled me to take a fairly definite line when I had luncheon today with Mr. Harold Wilson, President of the Board of Trade. Lord Rothermere was the only other guest, and he was present in his capacity of Director of the Newsprint Supply Company.

2. Mr. Wilson and Rothermere outlined to me the desire of the Newsprint Supply Company to place a contract for 400,000 tons with Canada, delivery to extend over the three years up to the end of 1953. The present situation in the United Kingdom is serious, and stocks have never been so low, most newspapers having only a few weeks' reserve stocks on hand. For this reason the Newsprint Supply Company is anxious to obtain as much Canadian newsprint as possible in 1951, but Lord Rothermere realizes that none could be made available during the first six months of the year. The object of the three-year contract, however, would be to give the Canadian mills assurance of a market over a reasonably long period. The United Kingdom Government has agreed to make dollars available for the purchase of 400,000 tons of newsprint from Canada over the three-year period, and as Mr. Wilson pointed out, this is the first time the Treasury have ever committed themselves to the release of dollars for so long a period in advance for the purchase of an import commodity.

3. Lord Rothermere is leaving for Canada on November 16th, but before [then a] preliminary approach will be made by the Newsprint Supply Company to the Canadian mills.

4. Mr. Wilson requested that the Canadian Government should indicate to the Canadian mills that they would like to see the United Kingdom obtain the quantity of newsprint indicated, and more particularly that the requirements of the short term should be met. I told Mr. Wilson that from what I knew of the attitude of the Canadian Government, they would be most reluctant to intervene in any way in this matter, which they considered to be one for the Newsprint Supply Company to negotiate with the Canadian mills, giving the Canadian mills such assurances regarding availability of dollars as they might be able to obtain from the United Kingdom Government. Mr. Wilson reminded me that last year when the contract had been cancelled, the Canadian Government had shown a great interest. I replied that it was a very different thing to express concern over the cancellation of a contract than to become involved in negotiations for a new contract which could be left entirely to the parties concerned, since the Canadian Government did not interfere in any way with exports of newsprint.

5. When he saw that I was adopting a firm attitude, Mr. Wilson said that he thought that all that would be necessary would be for Mr. Howe to put in a good word to the Canadian mills. I said that while I was sure Mr. Howe would be glad to see the United Kingdom obtain the quantity of newsprint in question on account of the importance which we have always attached to the United Kingdom market, I was sure that he would be reluctant to intervene in a matter of this kind, particularly as such intervention might be misinterpreted in other quarters and we would really have no control over subsequent developments.

6. Finally, Mr. Wilson said that the United Kingdom Government had decided to make an approach to the Canadian Government, and he wished to know if I had any objection to forwarding this request, or if I would prefer that it should be sent through Sir Alexander Clutterbuck. I told him that naturally I would pass on to Ottawa any message which he might care to give me, but that I could not hold out much hope of any action being taken by the Canadian Government. I was careful to state that this did not in any way imply lack of goodwill on the part of the Canadian Government since they were interested in the United Kingdom market for Canadian newsprint, but that in accordance with the policy of the Canadian Government and past experience with this particular commodity, they would feel that it was not appropriate for them to intervene. Mr. Wilson explained that the purpose of the luncheon was to talk over with me what approach might be made to the Canadian Government. He appreciated the frank way in which I had stated the probable attitude of the Canadian Government, and in the course of a few days he would send me a message which he would ask me to transmit to Ottawa.

My telegram No. 2084 of October 31st — supplies of Canadian newsprint to the United Kingdom.
Following is message which Mr. Harold Wilson, President of the Board of Trade, has requested me to pass to the Right Honourable C.D. Howe. Message Begins: Our newsprint situation has been steadily and seriously deteriorating. In July we were obliged by the falling off of supplies to reduce the size of newspapers from seven to six pages. Three weeks ago we were compelled to introduce tonnage rationing, which has had the effect of restricting circulation.

2. We recently placed orders for 100,000 tons of newsprint from Canada for the fourth quarter of 1950 and 1951, and of this 12,000 tons is already at sea. We hope to receive a further 25,000 tons by the end of March, without which our stocks would fall below 50,000 tons, an almost unworkable level.

3. We have also decided to authorize the allocation of dollars for the importation of a further 400,000 tons of Canadian newsprint between now and the end of 1953, if so much can be made available, and we have informed the Newsprint Supply Company that we will issue import licenses and make available the necessary foreign exchange for this amount. Part of this, if it were obtainable, would go to replenish stocks and part into current consumption. On stocks, for your confidential information, we should like for strategic reasons to get back to the 1939 level of 250,000 tons, which is five times more than the level to which our stocks may soon fall. On any calculation this stockpiling will take some years to achieve.

4. If a stock of this size should ever prove unnecessary for strategic reasons it could of course very easily be absorbed by increased consumption here — for which as you know there is plenty of scope — without detriment to our future import policy.

5. You will be aware that we were compelled in the past to restrict our purchases of Canadian newsprint, but I think that the Canadian Government fully understood the circumstances that forced us most reluctantly to take this decision. Now that the situation has improved we are anxious to resume and maintain our traditional purchases from Canada.

6. The proposal to increase our purchases by 400,000 tons has not yet been put to the Canadian mills. I am sending this message to you in the hope that you will feel able to give this matter most sympathetic consideration, and to lend your personal support to the efforts of the Newsprint Supply Company both to secure our immediate needs of newsprint and also satisfactory long term contracts up to the end of 1953. At the present time in particular we feel that it is most important to keep our public closely and fully informed on current affairs, both at home and abroad. This is becoming increasingly difficult with the shortage of newsprint and the inevitable reduction in the size and circulation of our newspapers. Message Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following for President, Board of Trade, from Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Begins: It is not at all clear what we can do to ease the problem that you raise in your message of the 19th November, regarding newsprint. I readily agree that the present situation is most unfortunate, although, as we have previously pointed out, it is not unexpected.

The total output of the Canadian industry is committed, by contract, to others — largely the United States — and any re-direction of supplies next year would involve interference with private contractual relations. The situation is made the more difficult by the fact that the additional quantity you wish to purchase is not dissimilar from the amount of the expected exports of your domestic production — exports recently committed to markets that have traditionally been served by Canada, but which, under pressure, have sought their supplies in the United Kingdom.

The Canadian industry have demonstrated in the past their genuine interest in retaining their place in the United Kingdom market and they are, I am sure, still of the same mind. However, they are equally interested in other markets, from which they have been displaced and which hold promise of long-term value.

There are many other emergency demands for newsprint being made on Canada from all over the world, and we are discussing the difficult problems involved with the industry. It seems to me, however, that the immediate problem before the United Kingdom is one of supply for current requirements during 1951, which I understand is now under discussion between the Canadian mills and the United Kingdom purchasers.

I think, therefore, that, under the circumstances, any discussion of the additional supply — particularly that part of it which relates to the building up of stocks — should await resolution of the immediate problem. Ends.

AGRICULTURE; U.K. FOOD CONTRACTS, 1951

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, as Acting Prime Minister submitted a report from the Department of Agriculture concerning initial talks about possible food agreements with the United Kingdom for 1951. On November 3rd, the United Kingdom had submitted proposals by the Ministry of Food for a cheese contract covering 90 per cent of the Canadian exportable surplus up to a total of 70 million pounds at 25¢ per pound (the 1949 contract price) and 60 million pounds of bacon at $29.00 per cwt if the Canadian Government was prepared to maintain export and import controls on bacon. If the Government was not prepared to maintain controls, the U.K. might consider purchasing Canadian bacon competitively at the current contract price of $29.00. The proposals had been discussed by telephone with the Minister of Agriculture who had said that the U.K. officials should be informed that prices offered were unsatisfactory and unlikely to be acceptable to the Canadian Government. This view had been communicated to U.K. officials and further information from the United Kingdom should be available shortly.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Acting Minister of Agriculture, Nov. 13, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 157-50)†

14. Mr. Howe referred to the difficulties met with in attempting to fill the 1949 contracts. The National Dairy Council estimated that cheese production would be down in 1951 and recommended against any contract with the United Kingdom for a firm amount. It seemed desirable that there should be no further negotiations about 1951 contracts pending further discussion.

15. The Minister of Finance said that the undesirable features of the export embargoes which had been related to the contracts and which had prevented sales to the United States were quite clear. On the whole it seemed desirable to discontinue government contracts.

16. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that there be no further negotiations with the United Kingdom concerning cheese or bacon contracts for 1951 pending further discussion after return of the Minister of Agriculture.

SALE OF CHEESE AND BACON TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

32. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 15th, 1950, said that the United Kingdom had confirmed certain proposals made with respect to contemplated cheese and bacon purchases in 1951. These were based on the same prices as paid under the terms of the 1950 agreement and for approximately the same quantity of cheese, but for more than double the quantity of bacon.

There were a number of courses that could be followed:

(1) to continue the present arrangements, including subsidies and import and export controls;

(2) to accept the U.K. price without subsidies, i.e. 29¢ for bacon and 25¢ for cheese, and to maintain import and export controls;

(3) to discontinue import and export controls, to withdraw subsidies, and to authorize the Dairy Products Board and the Meat Board to act as procurement agencies for the Ministry of Food and to purchase for their account in the open market such quantities of cheese and bacon as might be available at the prices offered;

(4) to discontinue all agreements and revert to private trading, with the United Kingdom purchasing in the Canadian market as it saw fit.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Nov. 29, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 271-50)†

33. The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested the possibility of securing a higher price from the United Kingdom should be explored before any decision were taken.

34. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of Agriculture on United Kingdom proposals for cheese and bacon purchases from Canada in 1951 and agreed that:

(a) the possibility of securing an increased price for cheese and bacon sales for 1951 to the United Kingdom be explored; and,

(b) the Minister of Agriculture indicate to the forthcoming Federal-Provincial Conference on Agriculture that the United Kingdom had asked Canada for as much cheese and more bacon in 1951 than had been the case in 1950, but that no agreement had yet been reached regarding general arrangements and prices.

BACON; CONTROL OF EXPORTS AND IMPORTS; FLOOR PRICE; U.K. PURCHASES

54. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 29th, 1950 said that the United Kingdom had offered to continue buying bacon in Canada in 1951 at 29¢ per pound, to 130 million pounds, a figure considerably in excess of the presently estimated surplus. In 1950 the government had paid a bonus of 3.5 cents per pound over the British buying price, making an effective floor of $32.50 per 100 lbs. It was recommended that this price arrangement be continued in 1951 and that export-import controls continue. At the present time the export of live hogs was prohibited except for breeding purposes; the export of fresh pork was prohibited and that of cured pork controlled under an export permit system administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The import of both live hogs and pork was prohibited. If continuance of the 3.5 cents subsidy were not approved, it was recommended that the 1950 programme be extended in other respects. An immediate discontinuance of the export-import controls would admit United States pork freely and would likely depress hog prices.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Dec. 28, 1950 — Cab. Doc. 303-50)†

55. Mr. Gardiner said that the extent to which American pork might move into Canada if controls were removed seemed more doubtful than a short while ago. Cured pork prices had gone up in the United States and it was unlikely that there would be any large amount of pork available to Canada at least before the spring. The control on live hogs was in part a health control and should be continued.

It was to be noted that by the latest estimates farm incomes in Canada had declined by $300 million from 1949. A lowering of the floor would be undesirable at such a time, particularly since it seemed improbable that the floor suggested would, in fact, entail any actual cost to the treasury. If it were thought that the policy could not be continued of subsidizing U.K. purchases to the extent of 3.5 cents an alternative might be to leave the floor at $32.50 and offer to deliver to the United Kingdom anything that could be secured at that price. They might not be willing to purchase at such a figure and this would involve the possibility that substantial amounts of pork might be acquired with no certainty as to disposition. This would particularly be possible if restrictions on imports were removed.

56. The Minister of Finance said he was opposed to any continuance of the export and import controls on pork. They threw doubt on the good faith of Canada in carrying out the provisions of GATT and would also weaken our position in trying to ensure that the United States did not impose protective controls. The United States had refrained from imposing controls on apples, potatoes and other products when they had surpluses. So far as the prohibition against the import of live hogs was concerned, it was open to all the objections to quantitative restrictions, as instruments of commercial policy and should be abandoned unless it was clearly needed for health reasons. It was difficult to see how a continuance of the 3.5 cents subsidy could be justified or the preservation in any other form of the $32.50 floor. It had been established as a cushion in a period of adjustment and with no intention that it should continue beyond 1950. The government was concerned about anything that raised or supported the cost of living index.

57. The Minister of Trade and Commerce doubted whether there would be any substantial movement of U.S. pork into Canada if controls were removed. The duty of 1 1/4 cents and freight charges would be an effective deterrent if there was not a greater disparity in prices than seemed probable. It seemed impossible to continue the 3.5 cents subsidy on U.K. purchases. The alternatives were either to remove the $32.50 floor altogether or to establish it on a basis under which the government stood ready to buy at $32.50. Such a policy might be tried for one month. It if worked successfully with the border open it could continue. If not, it should be regarded as finished and the floor price at $32.50 should end. He was entirely opposed to any prohibition on the import of pork.

58. The Minister of Justice said that it seemed not at all improbable as conditions were developing that at some time the government might wish to impose ceilings on certain farm products. If so, they would be more difficult to justify if floors were now removed.

59. The Prime Minister thought it would be desirable to terminate the subsidy on U.K. purchases. The U.K. should be put in the position where it would have to assess the amount of bacon it was likely to get at the price it offered. On such a basis some adjustment might be forthcoming. If the policy of buying at $32.50 were established, the government would have to stand ready at any time to sell at that figure plus carrying charges so as to ensure that there was as little build up of stocks as possible and to avoid charges of pushing prices too high.

60. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that:

(a) the policy of paying a subsidy of 3.5 cents per pound on purchases of pork by the United Kingdom be not continued;

(b) no further control be exercised over the export or import of pork and pork products; and

(c) the government undertake to buy pork and pork products at a price based on prices when Wiltshire sides were delivered at 32.5 cents per pound and to sell pork and pork products so acquired at 32.5 cents on the same basis plus carrying charges; the policy to be inaugurated initially for a one month trial period on the understanding that it would be terminated if it appeared that too large quantities would be acquired or that for other reasons the policy would not be practicable.

CHEESE; EXTENSION OF U.K. CONTRACT AND SUPPORT PRICE

4. The Minister of Agriculture said that, while the 1950 cheese contract expired at the end of December, the British Ministry of Food had agreed in writing to extend it to the end of March 1951. It was probable that, if requested, the United Kingdom would agree to an extension to the end of April 1951 which was the end of the normal dairy year. Such extension was desirable in order that butter and cheese price policies might be determined at the same time and in proper relation to one another for the dairy year beginning May 1st.

During the term of the U.K. contract, the Department of Agriculture had been authorized to buy cheese under a formula that resulted in a price of 28 cents for first grade cheese delivered at Canadian seaboard. It was recommended that the Department be authorized to continue the same buying price until April 30th.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 15, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 13-51)†

5. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendations of the Minister of Agriculture and agreed that:

(a) the U.K. Ministry of Food be requested to extend the 1950 cheese contract to April 30th, 1951; and

(b) the Department of Agriculture be authorized to continue the buying price for cheese authorized for 1950 until April 30th, 1951.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], January 5, 1950

MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT

The attached papers, consisting of messages WA-3488[1] and WA-3489 of December 23, 1949, from Washington, and our EX-12 of January 4† in reply, relate to recent developments in our negotiations with the United States to facilitate Canadian military procurement from the U.S. Military Establishment under the M.D.A.A. They refer, in particular, to the problems we are meeting in procuring F.86 aircraft components.

2. There are still two obstacles to overcome before the procurement contracts required by the Department of National Defence can be placed. These are:

(a) the nature of the agreement, if any, which may be required to initiate procurement under the M.D.A.A., and

(b) the method of payment which would satisfy the provision that the full cost shall be made available before any contracts may be placed with the U.S. Military Establishment by any foreign nation.

3. As regards (a) above, there seems to be good grounds for optimism that no formal agreement on procurement will have to be concluded between the two countries. The State Department's political officers now feel that Canada-U.S. procurement arrangements should flow naturally from existing mutual defence assistance arrangements of long standing which predate the M.D.A.A., although they are meeting some resistance on this point from their Department's legal experts who maintain that some sort of inter-Governmental agreement may be necessary, even though it would be a much briefer document than the bilateral agreements being concluded with the European beneficiaries under the Act.

4. With regard to (b), you will see from message WA-3489 that the Ambassador proposes to address a note to the Secretary of State suggesting that the "full cost in advance" provision of the Act could be met, in our opinion, by extending to the U.S. Military Establishment an irrevocable Letter of Credit, which would have the status of cash but which, in fact, would only be drawn upon in accordance with normal progress and delivery payments, so as not to tie up unnecessarily large amounts of U.S. dollars. The text of the note, contained in WA-3489, has now been approved by National Defence, Finance and Trade and Commerce. It emphasizes the necessity for an early conclusion of this arrangement so that the procurement of F.86 components and other items may be expedited.

5. As we have pointed out to Mr. Wrong in our EX-12, we have a special interest in pressing the U.S. authorities to agree with our Letter of Credit proposal as soon as possible. We understand that the Canadair Company are having difficulty in continuing production of the F.86 without the items which the R.C.A.F. must obtain for them from the United States. The Department of National Defence may, therefore, feel obliged to comply with the provisions of the M.D.A.A. as it now stands and to put up the full cash requirement for the items which they must have very soon if Canadair is to continue production of the F.86 without interruption. On the other hand, you will readily appreciate the difficulty in which Mr. Wrong would find himself in continuing the negotiations with any hope of success if it were necessary to give way on certain M.D.A.A. items before we had allowed a reasonable time for the U.S. authorities to reply to our Letter of Credit proposal which would, of course, be a very much better financial arrangement from the Canadian point of view and which, we understand informally from U.S. officials, has a good chance of being accepted. Mr. Wrong will, I am sure, do everything he can to obtain the earliest reply from the U.S. authorities. In the meantime, I sincerely hope it will not be found necessary to prejudice his negotiations by complying with the present unsatisfactory terms of the M.D.A.A.

MILITARY PROCUREMENT

My immediately following message contains the draft of a text of the United States reply to our note on military procurement, the text of which was contained in my message WA-3489 of December 23rd. This text was given by Satterthwaite, Deputy Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs in the State Department, to Ignatieff this morning for our comment. Satterthwaite said that it had not yet been given final approval and that he was giving us an advance copy in order to expedite consideration of the matter and to give us an opportunity for comment before the note is finally approved on the United States side.

2. In giving the note to Ignatieff, Satterthwaite said that, in the opinion of the State Department, it went as far as the officials concerned believed it was possible to go within the terms of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, to meet our note of January 5th.† However, you will find the terms of the note in some respects rather disappointing. The text incorporates conditions provided for in Section 402 of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act. Satterthwaite explained that this was necessary to conform with the provisions of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act that any transaction under this legislation "shall make appropriate provision" for these conditions. The condition regarding security, the transferability of the equipment and its use would presumably give rise to less difficulty than the last provision which refers to the furnishing of equipment, materials and assistance by Canada to the United States and other "eligible nations". When Ignatieff saw the text, it read as follows: "and that the Government of Canada will furnish where appropriate ...". Ignatieff told Satterthwaite that such an open-ended obligation could not even be considered by the Canadian authorities and the language was changed to read: "as may be agreed". It was understood that this language meant that any arrangements under such a provision would have to be the subject of separate negotiations.

3. Satterthwaite urged the inclusion of this condition on the grounds that this language would afford an opportunity for negotiations leading to reciprocal purchases by the United States of military equipment and materials in Canada, the understanding also being that the furnishing referred to would cover payment for the equipment and materials so furnished. In this connection, Satterthwaite recalled Mr. Perkin's comment, reported to you in paragraph 6 of my message WA-25 of January 5th,† that he hoped that arrangements for reciprocal purchases might be worked out between the North Atlantic countries within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty.

4. As regards the use of the Letter of Credit, it will be noted that while this is agreed to, it is provided that the Letter of Credit "incorporates the element of irrevocability and demand payment in full of United States dollars". In explanation of this, Satterthwaite recalled the informal discussion in the State Department on December 22nd last, reported in my message WA-3488 of December 23rd, when the United States officials said that the Letter of Credit to be worked out between the two Governments would be supplemented by a Letter of Intent setting out the drawing arrangements which would be followed in the execution of the contract. At that time, it was explained that the United States Government, in view of the terms of the M.D.A.A., could not undertake a formal obligation in this regard but in practice the drawing arrangements on the Letter of Credit which would be followed would be those set out in the Letter of Intent.

5. Satterthwaite said that he expected to be in Ottawa on Monday afternoon, January 9th in connection with the Colonial Airlines question[2] and will be available to discuss the questions raised by the United States reply to our note on procurement.

6. I hope to have further comments on this note to send you on Monday after I have had an opportunity of finding out how matters stand with regard to the negotiations between the United States, and the United Kingdom and other grant beneficiaries under the M.D.A.A. in respect to their bilaterals.

7. Our comments on the United States draft note have been requested as early next week as possible. However, you will, no doubt, wish to discuss the note with Satterthwaite before sending me your comments.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following is an advance text of United States draft reply to our note on military procurement.

1. "I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of Your excellency's note No. 6 of January 5th, 1950,† concerning the procurement of defense equipment by Canada from the United States Government under the terms of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, there being discussed first, the question of the need for the conclusion of a bilateral agreement, and second, the question of payment by means of an irrevocable letter of credit. It is noted that Your Excellency expresses the desire that no new agreement be required and that an irrevocable letter of credit be accepted as a means of payment under the provisions of the above-cited Act.

2. My Government considers, in view of the understandings already existing between our two Governments respecting mutual defense and standardization arrangements, that Your Excellency's Government can undertake agreement with the essential conditions stipulated in the Mutual Defense Assistance Act., i.e.; that the Government of Canada will take such security measures as may be specified by the Government of the United States of America to prevent the disclosure or compromise of classified military articles, services or information made available by the Government of the United States of America; that the Government of Canada will not, without the consent of the Government of the United States of America, transfer title to or possession of any of the equipment, materials, information or services furnished;[3] that the Government of Canada will use any assistance furnished under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 in furtherance of the policies and purposes of that Act; and that the Government of Canada will furnish, as may be agreed,[4] equipment and materials, services or other assistance consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, to the United States or to and among other nations eligible for assistance under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act to further the policies and purposes of that Act.

3. An indication by Your Excellency that your Government agrees to this elaboration of the existing understandings between our two Governments, will meet, we feel, the wish expressed in Your Excellency's note under acknowledgement.

4. With respect to the use of a letter of credit,[5] my Government agrees that, in principle, such an instrument can satisfy the requirements of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, provided the letter of credit incorporates the elements of irrevocability and of demand payment in full in United States dollars.[6] I believe that Your Excellency's Government will agree that these elements are essential. The exact terms of the letter of credit will, of course, have to be worked out between our two Governments.[7]

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

For the Secretary of State".

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Reference my WA-43 of January 7th. Military procurement.

1. I have now had an opportunity of discussing with officials of the United Kingdom Embassy here the progress of the United Kingdom's negotiations with the United States on the bilateral agreement to be concluded under the M.D.A.A. The United Kingdom have submitted to the United States a redrafted bilateral agreement, a copy of which was given to me for my information, with the request that it be treated as secret and that our possession of it should not be disclosed to United States authorities.

2. The United Kingdom redraft seeks to eliminate most of the objectionable features contained in the former United States draft bilateral and United Kingdom officials here are hopeful that their modified draft will be acceptable to the United States. They point out that unless some substantial modifications of the previous United States draft are obtained, the United Kingdom may be willing to forego any assistance under the M.D.A.A. this year, which they regard in any case as inadequate to compensate them for their own increased obligations.

3. The provisions of the United Kingdom redraft which relate to the "elaboration of the existing understandings" contained in paragraph 2 of the United States draft reply to our note on military procurement (my WA-44 of January 7th) are of particular interest. With respect to "security measures", the United Kingdom redraft specifies that "each contracting Government (i.e. United States and the United Kingdom) shall take such security measures as may be agreed in each case between the two contracting Governments in order to prevent the disclosure or compromise of any classified military articles, services or information furnished by the other contracting Government, pursuant to this agreement".

4. With respect to the transfer of title or possession of equipment, the United Kingdom redraft eliminates the onerous condition contained in paragraph 4 of Article 1 of the United States draft bilateral agreement (see my WA-3054 of November 4th). The phrase "or identifiable as having been fabricated with or by means of such equipment, materials or services" contained in sub-section (a) of paragraph 4 of the United States draft would be deleted under the United Kingdom proposal. The whole of sub-section (b) has also been dropped in the United Kingdom draft.

5. With respect to the furnishing of reciprocal assistance, the United Kingdom draft specifies that any assistance should give economic recovery a clear priority. A separate article of the United Kingdom draft states that the provisions of Article 5 of the Economic Co-operation Agreement is to be regarded as an integral part of the new agreement. The United Kingdom draft specifies that each contracting Government "will make or continue to make available to the other and to other Governments, such equipment, materials, services or other military assistance as the contracting Government furnishing such assistance may authorize in accordance with detailed arrangements from time to time to be made between them". It is also specified that assistance shall be designed to promote the integrated defence of the North Atlantic area and be in accordance with defence plans under Article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

6. In the light of the United Kingdom counter proposals for their bilateral, I think we should consider securing amendments to the United States draft reply to our note on military procurement which would make it less objectionable from our standpoint. However, as I pointed out in my WA-43 of January 7th, the United States administration consider that they are bound by the provisions of Section 402 of the M.D.A.A., which provides that any transaction under the legislation "shall make appropriate provision for" the conditions (a) to (d) in that section.

7. I hope that you will be in a position to send me your comments on the United States draft as soon as possible.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference WA-43 and WA-44 of January 7 and WA-55 of January 10. Draft U.S. reply on Canadian military procurement.

1. Satterthwaite, accompanied by Harrington and Eberts, had a meeting yesterday morning with Dr. Clark and Mr. B.J. McIntyre, Comptroller of the Treasury, on the Letter of Credit paragraph (No. 4) of the draft reply.

2. Dr. Clark said that irrevocable Letters of Credit to cover Canadian contracts would be entirely satisfactory. Also, he realized that Washington did not intend to draw against any Letter of Credit that might contain a demand payment in full provision except on progress or delivery. His Department, however, took very strong objection to the idea of a Letter of Credit containing such a provision which would give Washington a right (whatever its intentions) to demand full payment even if no progress or deliveries were made under a contract.

3. Such a provision, he pointed out, would be entirely contrary to normal business practices and he appeared to fear that someone might, in fact, make a mistake and demand full payment long in advance of final delivery. He added that, under Canadian law, which he did not think Parliament could be expected to change, it would not be possible for the Government to put up a Letter of Credit that included such a provision which would place all the safeguards in the hands of the U.S. Government. He explained further that, apart from the question of the legality of such a practice, it would defeat the M.D.A.A.'s aim of ensuring that Canada obtains its defence requirements in the general interests of the Atlantic group. This year's estimates will represent the maximum that the economy can stand and this will mean that National Defence's share will be so much and no more. If (in order to meet a demand payment in full provision in a Letter of Credit) a large portion of that share had to be devoted to long-term contracts which would not result in deliveries for two or three years, National Defence would obviously have less money in the next year or two with which to carry on other phases of its defence programme.

4. He expressed himself as very impressed by the appropriateness of the irrevocable Letter of Credit solution in view of the phraseology of the M.D.A.A. whose Section 408(e) refers to making available the full cost of goods for which we place an order. Moreover, he stressed that, quite apart from Canada's practice of meeting its obligations, an irrevocable Letter of Credit — as any Washington bank would confirm — is in itself a complete guarantee of payment, particularly as, under Section 26(1) of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act of 1931, any of the Government's unliquidated commitments at the end of a fiscal year are automatically made a first charge on the appropriation of the Department of National Defence in the following fiscal year. Moreover, in the case of long-term contracts, it is the normal practice for the Government to sign a contract looking to deliveries over a period of two or more years and at the outset to obtain from Parliament only sufficient cash to meet progress or delivery payments that will be due in the first year of the contract. Being committed, however, to a contract of two or more years, the payments due in the second or subsequent years automatically become a first charge (in the case of defence purchases) on National Defence's appropriations in the second and subsequent years of the contract. In the circumstances, there has never been any question of possible default.

5. Satterthwaite said that the explanation of the proposed demand payment in full provision is that: (1) experience had proven that actual full payment in advance must be obtained from Latin-American countries and that the Canada-U.S. arrangement must appear to be on the same basis, and (2) the National Military Establishment procurement officers feel that they are required under their regulations to obtain full payment in advance of signing contracts and are nervous about any arrangement which might get them into trouble if funds were not available as and when necessary.

6. It was eventually agreed that the State Department would consider: (a) revision of paragraph 4 of its draft note on the following lines "with respect to the use of an irrevocable Letter of Credit, my Government agrees that, in principle, such an instrument can satisfy the requirements of the M.D.A.A. of 1949, provided terms for it that are satisfactory to both Governments are worked out" (The last two sentences of the draft would be deleted); (b) an early meeting between a Department of Finance official and U.S. procurement officers and possibly others in the hope that the procurement officers might be convinced that an irrevocable Letter of Credit would fully guarantee their position. This meeting could but need not follow signature of the revised note. Satterthwaite appeared satisfied that Washington would accept the above revision and expressed some hope that the procurement officers could be convinced of the appropriateness of an irrevocable Letter of Credit.

7. At a subsequent meeting, the same group (without Dr. Clark and Mr. McIntyre) discussed with Mr. Drury and Mr. Pierce the four conditions in paragraph 2 of the draft note. No objection was seen to the first and third conditions, although Mr. Drury has since told us — in the light of paragraph 3 of WA-55 of January 10 — that the State Department might be told that the security condition applicable in the case of Canada should not be more onerous than the least onerous security condition accepted in the case of grant aid countries. Mr. Drury told Mr. Satterthwaite that he felt that the second condition should be reworded in such a way as to require U.S. consent for transfers only if an item of equipment (e.g. tanks) contained a substantial amount of components obtained by us under the M.D.A.A. He has since suggested to us that his point would be met if the following words were added to the present wording of condition 2: "or any articles that include substantial proportions of such equipment or materials". In other words, under the revised wording, we would be undertaking to obtain the consent of the U.S. for the transfer of a bogie that we had purchased and which had not yet been incorporated in a tank but we would not seek U.S. consent for transfer of a tank in which only a U.S. supplied bogie had been installed. Satterthwaite undertook to consider this question. He felt that Washington would probably prefer to leave the condition untouched in the note and to clarify its application in a supplementary confidential note.

8. Mr. Drury and Mr. Pierce also proposed to Mr. Satterthwaite that condition No. 4 should be amended to include, between "furnish" and "as may be agreed", the words "on a reciprocal basis". In other words, no matter what the U.S. transferred to Canada and whatever the terms of the transfer (grant aid might conceivably be sought in the long run) we would only be undertaking to give as good as we receive.

9. It would be appreciated if the foregoing could be discussed with the State Department and if the latter could put forward a new draft reply which, if it meets the points raised with Satterthwaite, will be submitted to the appropriate Ministers here for consideration.

TELEGRAM WA-94 Washington, January 13, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference your EX-57 of January 11th. Draft United States reply on Canadian military procurement.

1. We discussed with Snow of the State Department, late yesterday afternoon, the points raised in your teletype under reference, with a view to a revision of the United States draft note, both with respect to the Letter of Credit arrangement and to the conditions governing Canadian military procurement.

2. With respect to the Letter of Credit arrangement and the draft text contained in paragraph 6 of your teletype under reference, Snow explained that he thought that Satterthwaite had been unduly optimistic that the revised wording would be acceptable to M.D.A.A. legal authorities. As explained in my WA-3488 of December 23rd, M.D.A.A. legal authorities considered that the Letter of Credit arrangement itself was stretching the authority given in the MDA Act. He was doubtful, therefore, that they would accept any suggestion that they might be prepared to retreat from their former position. He said that he was convinced that the United States Government would insist that any Letter of Credit drawn up should cover the full amount of the contract and contain the right of the United States Government to draw on the Letter of Credit for the full amount of the contract subject only to such informal arrangements as may be worked out in practice. While he, Snow, agreed that such an arrangement might be difficult for us to accept, the position under United States law, as interpreted by the M.D.A.A. legal authorities was quite clear. For this reason, he thought it would only be misleading to infer in their reply that any irrevocable Letter of Credit not having the status of a demand note could be worked out.

3. With respect to the conditions contained in the United States draft reply, we put forward the suggestions contained in your teletype under reference. We suggested that the first condition relating to security was too one-sided and that the phrase "as may be agreed" should be substituted for the phrase "as may be specified by the Government of the United States of America" contained in their draft reply. Snow said that he personally thought this was a reasonable modification and agreed to recommend its acceptance to the M.D.A.A. authorities.

4. With respect to the conditions of transfer, we suggested that the following words should be added to the present wording of condition 2 — "or any articles that include substantial proportions of such equipment and materials". Snow agreed that this might be a desirable addition to the present text and undertook to recommend its acceptance.

5. With respect to condition 4 — "the furnishing of assistance to other Governments" — we suggested that the words "on a reciprocal basis" should be inserted between "furnish" and "as may be agreed", pointing out that we did not consider it appropriate for us to undertake, even a moral commitment, to supply materials to other eligible nations unless we might expect to receive something in return. Snow pointed out that we had already accepted such a moral commitment under Article 3[8] of the North Atlantic Treaty and that the wording we proposed suggested that Canada would be unwilling to provide any aid to our North Atlantic partners unless such aid were furnished on a reciprocal basis.

6. We took this opportunity to point out to Snow that our undertaking to "use any assistance furnished under the M.D.A.A. of 1949 in furtherance of the policies and purposes of the Act" (their condition 3) and to furnish military equipment "to and among other nations eligible for assistance under the M.D.A.A. to further the policies and purposes of that Act" might be interpreted as a new commitment and not as an "elaboration of existing understandings". Canada was eligible to secure assistance under the M.D.A.A. as we had entered into a collective arrangement with the United States (the North Atlantic Treaty). The purposes and policies of the Act, therefore, as far as Canada was concerned, were to facilitate the development of defence plans under the Treaty. For this reason, we indicated that it would be more appropriate for condition 3 to read, "that the Government of Canada will use any assistance furnished for the purpose of promoting an integrated defence of the North Atlantic area".

7. As regards condition 4, we said that it was doubtful that the Canadian Government would accept a commitment to furnish equipment to any nation which the United States declared eligible under the M.D.A.A., except on a reciprocal basis. Under M.D.A.A. legislation, any nation could be declared eligible which had joined with the United States in a collective defence or regional arrangement. Eligibility under the Act, therefore, was not limited to the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty. For this reason, we suggested that the phrase, "on a reciprocal basis" could only be deleted if Canada were not undertaking an additional commitment. We suggested that the wording of condition 4 might read as follows — "the two Governments undertake to make available to the other Government and to other Governments such materials, services, and other military assistance, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, as the Government furnishing such assistance may authorize in accordance with detailed arrangements from time to time to be made between them. Such assistance shall be so designed as to promote the integrated defence of the North Atlantic area and to facilitate the development of, or be in accordance with, defence plans under Article 9[9] of the North Atlantic Treaty". Snow admitted that United States authorities had overlooked these points and undertook to seek further clarification.

[8] En vertu de l'article 3 du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord, les parties doivent maintenir et développer leur capacité de résister à une attaque armée « par le développement de leurs propres moyens et en se prêtant mutuellement assistance ».
Under Article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty, the parties are to maintain and develop their capacity to resist armed attack through 'continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid'.

8. It is now proposed to hold a meeting with M.D.A.A. and State Department officials tomorrow Saturday for the purpose of trying to reach agreement on the amendment discussed with Satterthwaite.

PROCUREMENT

Efforts to obtain agreement satisfactory to us on the terms of an exchange of notes to initiate the procurement of F86A and other equipment reached an impasse during the week beginning Sunday, January 15th.

2. The amendments to the U.S. draft which had been raised with Satterthwaite the previous week in Ottawa were pressed by me through Snow. On Monday, January 16th, I reported that while the U.S. authorities were willing to meet us with improvements in language on two conditions, namely, the security provisions and transferability of equipment, they were not willing to change the reciprocal assistance condition, nor the paragraph dealing with method of payment. On Tuesday, January 17th, therefore, I reported to Ottawa that Snow had advised us that the possibilities of obtaining changes in the U.S. note at his level had been exhausted since he was unable to bring sufficient influence to bear upon M.D.A.A. officials and the Pentagon. He advised that an approach be made at a higher level (he suggested Mr. Perkins), stating our objections in detail and suggesting alternative wording.

3. On Tuesday, I saw the Canadian Chiefs of Staff who had arrived to meet with the U.S. Chiefs of Staff in the Canada-U.S. Regional Planning Group (North Atlantic) and I reported to them the present state of the impasse and showed them the text of the U.S. note as presently drafted. I recommended that the matter be pressed through the U.S. Chiefs of Staff so that influence should be brought to bear upon the Pentagon officials concerned with procurement. I pointed out to the Chiefs that the main difficulty was due to the present legislation (the M.D.A.A.) and the interpretation given to this Act. I said that the possibility might be explored with the U.S. Chiefs of trying to seek new legislation from the Congress. The matter of procurement was brought up by the Canadian Chiefs to the U.S. Chiefs, with the result that Mr. Johnson has instructed the U.S. Chiefs to draft a new legislation covering Canadian procurement of military equipment in the United States.

4. In the meantime, the procurement problem was considered at a meeting of the Deputy Ministers concerned in Ottawa on Thursday, January 19th. We have not had any report as yet of what transpired but, from a telephone message from Eberts on Thursday night, I learned that the following main conclusions were reached:

(1) that Mr. Heeney and Mr. Pierce would be seeing Messrs. Steinhardt and Harrington on Friday, January 20th, and would describe to them the present intolerable situation in regard to procurement, with particular reference to the draft U.S. note and the difficulties over method of payment. Mr. Heeney and Mr. Pierce would also review the background of our procurement difficulties;

(2) It has been agreed that Mr. McIntyre would arrive in Washington on Friday, January 20th, to explore the method of payment problem, with particular reference to the discrepancy between our law governing contracts under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, and the provisions of the M.D.A.A. that "full cost should be made available in advance of the execution of the contract".

(3) Ministerial authority will be sought to have instructions sent to you for an aide mémoire to be presented to Mr. Acheson, which, I understand, will recite again the difficulties we have encountered in relation to procurement of military equipment in the U.S. and setting out our objections to the draft U.S. note. I understand that Mr. Pierce may be coming down early next week to review the situation and also for the purpose of being present at the approach which is now contemplated to the Secretary of State.

5. As this new approach will involve a review of the procurement difficulties which we have so far encountered, I attach a summary† of the difficulties as they have appeared to us in the Embassy, and also a summary† of the main events which have occurred since the M.D.A.A. was passed, touching upon our procurement problems. I also attach the text of the U.S. note† as presently drafted.

CANADIAN MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

1. The meeting arranged on Saturday morning, January 21st, to enable Mr. McIntyre to meet officials of the State Department, MDA Administration and the Defence Department to discuss the method of payment question failed to resolve the legal obstacles. The United States representative on the one hand outlined in detail the reasons for their insistence that the letter of credit should have a payment on demand provision. They explained that the attitude of the Administration in this matter which has the endorsement of Treasury as well as the MDA Administration is based upon interpretation given to Sec. 408E of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act during the passage of that legislation in Congress and cited again the authority which had already been transmitted to you in my teletype WA-3488 of December 28th.

2. Mr. McIntyre put our case that an irrevocable letter of credit fully met in our opinion the requirements of 408E that "full cost" has to be made available before the execution of the contract and explained why under Section 30 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act it would not be possible to accept an obligation in regard to a contract for F.86 equipment which contained a provision that the full payment of the total contract could be drawn on demand without being related to performance of work on the contract or supply of material.

3. In commenting on our position the United States officials endeavoured to draw a distinction between the actual payment of funds and the encumbering of funds which they stated would be all that would be involved in the demand provision, since in practice drawings on the funds under the letter of credit would be related on the United States side to progress and delivery and that the drawing arrangements would be set out in a supplementary letter which however would not have any legally binding effect, the letter of credit with its demand provision being the legally operative instrument. There would be no supplementary contract or agreement that would be binding, only an order placed and the letter of credit.

4. No conclusions were reached at the meeting as it was evident that there was a real difference in the two positions based on interpretation of the law of Canada and of the United States. At least as a result of Mr. McIntyre's firm description of our position in this matter a clearer understanding of our attitude may have been given to the United States officials.

CANADIAN MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

1. A meeting was arranged on Tuesday morning, 24th January, to enable Mr. McIntyre, accompanied by Messrs. Keith and Ignatieff, to meet the Fiscal Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bartelt. Controller of the MDAA, Mr. [John E.] Murphy, the Legal Councillor, Vigderman, as well as Wight of the Canadian Desk, were present at the meeting, together with several legal and accounting officials of the Treasury.

2. After McIntyre and Murphy had put the problem to Mr. Bartelt, the situation was summarized by Bartelt in terms of finding some practical way of resolving the legal and technical difficulties arising out of the provision of Section 408(E) of the MDAA that the "full cost be made available in advance of the execution of the contract". He suggested that an approach be made from the point of view of finding an arrangement which would not involve the United States Government in any financial obligations arising out of the placing of the contract on behalf of Canada and recalled that the use of the letter of credit as an instrument of payment had been accepted by all on the United States side, in principle. He suggested that the legal technically involved in the construction of the words "full cost" which led to the requirement that the letter of credit should include demand provision might be met by making the drawings under the letter of credit related specifically to the terms of the contract and by ensuring that the letter of credit would be a full guarantee of payment by the Canadian Government to the contractor and not as previously contemplated in favour of the United States Government, thus excluding the possibility of the United States Government being involved in any financial obligations arising out of the contract.

3. As previously contemplated, the United States Government would have opened a trust account through the United States Treasury, backed by the letter of credit, as well as undertaking to make the contracts on behalf of Canada. Under the new approach, the United States Government would still make the contract; the Canadian Government would be required, in the terms of the letter of credit, to undertake to meet payments arising out of the terms of the contract on progress and delivery, and possibly at specified intervals. One difficulty that might occur is that in order to relate this type of transaction to Section 408(E), MDAA officials might require that the letter of credit in favour of the contractor include a provision for payment related only to the irrevocable nature of the instrument. Thus, they may insist that it would be provided in the letter of credit that the Canadian procurement could not withhold drawings on the letter of credit on grounds related to the progress of the work on the contract. This new approach that developed at the meeting has yet to be explored between the State Department, MDAA officials, Defence Department, and particularly with the contracting officers, and everything will depend on what payment terms are provided for in the contract. As the next step, the MDAA officials will therefore explore this approach with the Defence Department, and Mr. Bartelt undertook to provide whatever moral support they may require in exploring this approach. The United States officials have told us that it will take a few days to explore the possibilities with the Defence Department procurement officials.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

TELEGRAM EX-140 Ottawa, January 25, 1950

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Your WA-157 of January 22, Draft reply of State Department on Procurement. Following from Heeney, Begins: In view of the impasse on the question of procurement of military supplies in the United States which appears to have been reached at the "working" level, it has been agreed here by all concerned, and with Ministerial approval, that we must now take up the matter vigorously at a high level. Would you therefore take the first opportunity of personally discussing the situation with Mr. Acheson and putting our case to him in the frankest way. I agree that, for the present, your representations should be confined to an oral presentation, since the State Department has not yet formally replied to your note of January 5 last and since considerable of the discussion will of necessity be directed to their draft reply forwarded in your telegram WA-127 of January 17.† You should emphasize to Mr. Acheson our inability to purchase military equipment on the terms in their proposed draft, but you should also take the opportunity of pointing out to him the effect which our present difficulties in procurement may tend to have on the policy of standardization of equipment which both Governments have accepted as desirable in the interests of common defence.

2. With respect to the United States draft reply to your note of January 5, we have given it very careful consideration, and we have been driven to the conclusion that the draft note is quite unacceptable with respect both to financial conditions and to the other general conditions proposed therein. This represents the considered conclusion of all Deputy Ministers concerned.

3. With respect to the financial provisions, we are disposed to think that our offer, as conveyed in your note of [January] 5, of an irrevocable letter of credit deposited with a commercial bank in the United States, for the full amount of the contract, should meet the provisions for full cost in advance as required under MDAA, Section 408 (e). The proposal of the United States that the letter of credit must be on a demand basis permitting it to be cashed in full at any time is, in our opinion, an unreasonable interpretation, since the Act merely requires that the full cost be made "available" in advance of a contract and does not require that the full cost be paid in advance. Although the United States authorities have intimated that they are prepared to attach a separate letter indicating that it is not intended to cash the letter of credit except as work on the contract progresses, such a letter would not appear to have any legal validity. In any event the Canadian Government would be unable under present law to provide a demand letter of credit as proposed by the United States authorities. Officials of the Department of Finance feel that in offering an irrevocable letter of credit from which withdrawals might be made as work under the contract progresses, as has been proposed, they have gone the very limit possible under Canadian law.

4. With respect to the non-financial conditions proposed by the United States, these too are quite unacceptable. As Canadian authorities interpret MDAA, the only requirement in the case of military equipment acquired under Section 408 (e) is that "full cost, actual or estimated" must be made available to the United States in advance. The non-financial conditions set forth in paragraph 2 of the draft reply of the United States are based on Section 402 of the Act, which seems to us to refer to grant-aid only and not to cash purchases. This also appears to have been the view of the State Department until quite recently, since as late as January 5 you were advised by Perkins that no bilateral agreement would be required (your WA-25 of January 5†).

5. Whether these conditions are required for purchases under Section 408 (e), the conditions themselves (except condition 1 which relates to security and is a normal requirement in the transfer of classified equipment or material) seem to us to be an invidious restriction upon a partner in joint defence who is prepared to pay cash and is not asking for financial aid of any sort. It would seem most inequitable to require of Canada as a cash customer the same conditions as those required of countries receiving grant-aid. The only assistance Canada is asking is that of administrative assistance for procurement, which will be without cost to the United States. The quid pro quo demanded is out of all proportion to the service rendered.

6. Moreover, the conditions proposed would require Canada to accept international obligations as defined by a statute of the United States. These obligations are of a wider character than those under any international agreement to which Canada is a party. A bilateral agreement with the United States which would extend Canada's present international obligations by reference to a United States statute is objectionable, and would of course have to be approved by Parliament. Mr. Acheson will appreciate that the Canadian Government could not contemplate entering a bilateral agreement of this character with the United States in return for the mere right to purchase equipment. We do not think that any point would be served in commenting further on these conditions since they are not acceptable as a basis of discussion.

7. Mr. Acheson should also be reminded that the present F.86A programme was not undertaken before approval at both Service and Ministerial levels and the issue of a licence to manufacture in Canada. The programme was regarded on both sides as a desirable step in the standardization of equipment between our two countries. At the time arrangements were made for the F.86A programme the Canadian Government had the choice of adopting the United States or British jet fighter. At that time the Canadian Government had no reason to anticipate that difficulties would be encountered in securing component parts from the United States. In view of Canada's current deficit in dollars on trading account and surplus in sterling, payment for component parts for production in Canada of the British type aircraft would have been much easier. But the Canadian Government decided to adopt the United States type aircraft on the ground that this would facilitate common defence arrangements. Financial assistance was therefore extended to the Canadair Company for enlarging plant and tooling up for production. The company is now ready to proceed with production. Unless component parts are received within a very few weeks production simply cannot proceed. Should this happen a public explanation could scarcely be avoided, a situation which would probably prove embarrassing for both Governments.

8. When legislation to implement the military aid programme was before Congress during 1949, it was repeatedly pointed out to the United States officials that the projected legislation might interfere with Canadian procurement of military equipment in the United States. Repeated assurances however were given that Canada's special interest would be safeguarded either by change in the legislation or by administrative arrangements. The interpretation so far given MDAA by United States officials in so far as purchase of equipment by Canada is concerned has been even more restrictive than the Canadian Government had feared. If nothing can be done to meet Canada's position in joint defence, present effective arrangements may well be impaired.

9. While satisfactory arrangements for procurement under MDAA, particularly in the case of the F.86A, is of the utmost urgency and should be pressed forward as vigorously as possible, we should not, of course, wish to prejudice the achievement of better procurement arrangements than those obtaining under MDAA at present. The recent recommendation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff for special legislation to meet the Canadian position is of great interest to us and you should impress this on Mr. Acheson. What we should hope is that such legislation would be designed to meet the over-all requirements of adequate joint defence arrangements. To be specific, we should hope (a) that it would permit purchase by the United States in Canada for defence purposes in order to make possible the integration of production facilities for joint defence; (b) that it would permit off-shore purchases in Canada for grant-aid in order to permit of Canadian production facilities being made available to other North Atlantic nations; and (c) that it would facilitate Canadian procurement by amendment of the present onerous financial provisions under MDAA. Ends.

CANADIAN MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

1. I attended the meeting which had been arranged by Perkins on our procurement problem, accompanied by Pierce and Ignatieff this afternoon, Wednesday, 25th January. Perkins was evidently well briefed about the interview which Heeney and Pierce had with Steinhardt and Harrington and he had also been briefed by Snow on the talks which have been going on here during McIntyre's visit the last few days on the method of payment. I took the occasion to stress the unacceptability of the draft United States reply to our note of January 5th. I also emphasized the generally unsatisfactory nature of the present M.D.A.A. legislation as a means of meeting our overall procurement requirements under joint defence arrangements and referred to the effort which is now being undertaken by the Defence Department to obtain special legislation to meet our position. I said that I hoped to see Mr. Acheson in a day or so to bring to his personal attention our concern over our procurement problems as they affect our relationship between the two countries on defence question. Perkins said he quite understood and hoped that the present meeting would remove some of the details which were giving trouble. I also asked Pierce to give Perkins the facts of the present situation on the F.86, stressing the urgent necessity for immediate action.

2. Perkins said that he thought that it was possible to reach a mutually satisfactory arrangement on the basis of our note of January 5th. On the letter of credit, he recalled again that the use of such an instrument had been agreed by all concerned in principle. He understood that, as a result of talks which Mr. McIntyre had had with Treasury and M.D.A.A. officials, a new approach was being worked out on the United States side which would exclude the demand provision from the letter of credit and enable the drawings on the letter of credit to be related strictly to the terms of the contract. Vigderman, the Legal Councillor of the M.D.A.A., who was there, explained that what they had in mind would be that the contract entered into by the U.S.A.F. on behalf of Canada would specify the conditions on which payments would be made to the manufacturer, i.e., on progress and delivery. We would be required to furnish an irrevocable letter of credit which would provide that payments would be made as required under the contract but the United States Government, as the principal in the contract, would have the deciding voice as to when the conditions of the contract had been met and payments therefore made to the manufacturer. Vigderman stressed that if the United States undertook to make the contract, United States officials, acting as agents on our behalf, would have to decide if the conditions of the contract on progress and delivery had been met, although informal arrangements could no doubt be made between the R.C.A.F. and U.S.A.F. to check the claims. A proposition along these lines was being discussed with the Defence Department and, as yet, the State Department could not say definitely that the proposal had been accepted. Perkins said that he would push for quick action on the United States side and hoped that we would soon be in a position to say whether this approach would be acceptable to us. Your early comment on this point, and also on McIntyre's report contained in my message WA-169 of January 24th,† would be appreciated.

3. As regards conditions of transfer, Perkins said that the State Department had come to the conclusion that it would be possible to waive a bilateral agreement with us altogether but certain conditions to govern the transfer of equipment, even though purchased on a cash basis, would have to be included in the United States reply to our note, otherwise, the United States Government would be put into an intolerable position vis-à-vis other Governments wishing to purchase equipment under the M.D.A.A., particularly the Latin-American States. We pointed out that conditions 3 and 4 in the United States draft note were, in any case, unacceptable. Perkins agreed that these would be waived on the understanding that some wording was included to the effect that materials transferred would be used in a way consistent with our obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty. He thought that some provision would also have to be included for the observance of security provisions in respect of equipment transferred and also that, in the case where the United States equipment transferred constitutes a substantial component in the end-product, agreement (not consent) would have to be sought from the United States Government before transfer.

4. As the position stated by Perkins substantially met our objections, I agreed to Perkins' suggestion that a new draft of the United States note incorporating the points he had made should be drawn up immediately. Perkins made the point also that the language of the draft must be such that it cannot be construed as a new international agreement, but only the response to a particular request on the part of Canada to purchase certain items of military equipment. I agreed with this view also and it was arranged that Pierce and Ignatieff will meet with officials of the State Department and M.D.A.A. designated by Perkins tomorrow to consider a revision of the United States draft reply.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Draft of United States note on procurement. Following is the text now under consideration by the United States officials. My comment follows. Text begins:
Excellency:

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of Your Excellency's note No. 6 of January 5th, 1950,† concerning the procurement of defense equipment by Canada from the United States Government under the terms of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, there being discussed, first, the question of the need for the conclusion of an agreement, and second, the question of payment by means of an irrevocable letter of credit. It is noted that Your Excellency expressed the desire that no new undertaking be required and that an irrevocable letter of credit be accepted as a means of payment under the provisions of the above-cited act.

My Government considers, in view of the understandings already existing between our two Governments respecting mutual defense and standardization, and the obligations which our two Governments have assumed under the North Atlantic Treaty, that Your Excellency's Government will be willing to accept the applicable stipulations in the Mutual Defence Assistance Act: i.e. that the Government of Canada will observe such security classifications as may be established by the United States of America and shall take adequate measures to prevent the disclosure or compromise of classified military articles, services or information furnished by the Government of the United States of America; that the Government of Canada will not, without the agreement of the Government of the United States of America, transfer title to or possession of any of the equipment, materials, information or services furnished, although this limitation will not apply to components of relatively minor value which are to be installed in or assembled with other articles; and that the equipment and materials procured will be used in furtherance of the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty.

An indication by Your Excellency that your Government agrees to this elaboration of the existing understandings between our two Governments will meet, we feel, the wish expressed in Your Excellency's note under acknowledgment.

With respect to the use of a letter of credit, my Government agrees that in principle, such an instrument can satisfy the requirements of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act of 1949, provided the letter of credit incorporates the elements of irrevocability and of payment as called for under the procurement contracts. The exact terms of the letter of credit will, of course, have to be worked out between our two Governments to the satisfaction of both.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

MILITARY PROCUREMENT

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: In a separate message I have sent you the text of a draft reply to your note of January 5th which was discussed at a meeting at the State Department this morning which Pierce and Ignatieff attended. I have been trying to reach you on the telephone to emphasize the importance of clearing this draft in Ottawa immediately (on the assumption that it is acceptable) so that we can receive and acknowledge the note tomorrow if possible. Pierce agrees that if Clark and you concur no other clearance on the official level is needed in Ottawa. I expect, however, that you may wish to clear also with Mr. Claxton. One reason for speed is that the State Department now has the initiative, but if we do not act fast and sew the matter up, we fear that difficulties may arise in the Pentagon over the concessions that the State Department has made to meet our views. Incidentally, the exact terms of the note have not yet been agreed with the Pentagon.

2. I may discuss this with you later on the telephone, but I have to leave the office early this afternoon, in which case you might communicate with Ignatieff. Can you give this your personal attention?

3. I am seeing Acheson tomorrow afternoon. He has already personally interested himself in a solution of the immediate problem, and I hope to be able to confine my talk with him to the need for satisfactory new legislation. Ends.

Your WA-195 of January 26, Procurement.
Following from Heeney, Begins: We have consulted Clark, Drury and Foulkes and we all agree that the text of the latest State Department draft note appears to be as satisfactory a solution of the present problem as can be expected. It will still remain however to work out the details of the letter of credit, which may prove to be somewhat difficult.

2. You may advise the State Department that the proposed text appears to be a satisfactory solution to meet the present emergency, although we shall have to reserve our position as they have done with respect to the details of the letter of credit. You should however impress upon the State Department that this is not a satisfactory solution of our long-term procurement problem and that we feel strongly that new legislation will be necessary in order for us to fulfil our responsibility in joint defence arrangements with the United States and as a party to the North Atlantic Treaty. I understand that you are seeing Mr. Acheson at an early date and if so you should take the opportunity of impressing upon him the need for new legislation. Ends.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-155 of January 27th. Procurement.

1. I saw Acheson and Perkins this afternoon. On the immediate problem Perkins said that some difficulty had arisen in the Pentagon over the use of a letter of credit to effect payment on the lines developed at the meeting in the Treasury attended by McIntyre (see my WA-169 of January 24th†). He expressed confidence that the difficulty would be surmounted, but said that this might take a day or two. I mentioned that I had suggested that McIntyre or another official competent in this field should be in Washington on Monday, and Perkins said that he thought that would be helpful.[10]

2. I then took up with Acheson the desirability of new legislation which would straighten out our difficulties in purchasing here and authorize United States defence purchases in Canada. I told him that the Secretary of Defence on recommendation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff had instructed legislation to be drafted as a matter of urgency. We hoped that this would cover both main aspects, so that it would make Canadian procurement through the United States no more complex than ordinary commercial procurement, and would supersede or qualify the provisions of the Buy American Act with respect to United States procurement in Canada of defence equipment and materials.

3. I also mentioned our desire that the United States should make some purchases in Canada for other North Atlantic countries, saying that, while this was permitted under the M.D.A.A., we understood that the present policy was restrictive and that no such purchases were likely. I said that at the very least the United States components of Canadian equipment destined for North Atlantic countries should so be furnished, citing the wartime system developed under Mutual Aid and Lend Lease.

4. Acheson was very sympathetic towards these ideas and was interested to learn of the initiative taken by the Secretary of Defence. He asked Perkins to discuss their plans with the Department of Defence and to bear in mind the various points which I had made. He remarked that they might have some difficulty in singling out Canada for preferred legislative treatment, but he thought that emphasis on the North Atlantic commitments and the Canadian-United States partnership in the North American Regional Group might get around this. I commented that one of our needs was to end a situation in which Canadian requests to purchase equipment were judged in the light of the effect they might have as precedents in dealing with requests from such Latin American figures as Trujillo or Somoza.[11]

5. He thinks that any legislative proposal will not have smooth sailing in this Congress and that a direct attack on the provisions of the Buy American Act is out of the question just now. An indirect attack, however, might be feasible through surmounting the provisions of the Act with regard to reciprocal defence purchases only.

6. I took advantage of the occasion also to suggest that approval of the recommendation of the P.J.B.D. of October 12th, 1949,[12] would provide additional grounds for special legislative treatment of Canada. I said that so far as I knew this recommendation was stuck in the Munitions Board at the Pentagon and that we should like to see it pried loose and approved by the President as quickly as possible. He agreed that this would be useful and asked Perkins to look into the matter.

7. This discussion should bring about consultation at a high level between the State and Defence Departments on new legislation. My guess is that there is a real possibility of legislation to simplify Canadian procurement problems in the United States but that prospects of a broader measure authorizing reciprocal United States purchases in Canada are obscure. I shall renew the attack after an appropriate interval. Ends.

CANADIAN MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Following for MacKay from Ignatieff, Begins: Reference my WA-239 of February 1st.†

Following is text of draft reply from our side. Text begins:[13] I have the honour to refer to my note No. 6 of January 5th, 1950 and your note in reply thereto, concerning the procurement of defence equipment by Canada from the Government of the United States of America under the terms of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act of 1949. I am happy to note that the Government of the United States of America is in accord with the view of the Government of Canada that no new agreement is required, subject to the elaboration of understandings between the two Governments stated in your note under reference.

The Government of Canada is willing, in view of the understandings already existing between our two Governments respecting mutual defence and standardization and the obligations which our two Governments have assumed under the North Atlantic Treaty, to accept the stipulations set forth in your note under reference:

"That the Government of Canada will observe such security classifications as may be established by the United States of America and shall take adequate measures to prevent the disclosure or compromise of classified military articles, services or information furnished by the Government of the United States of America; that the Government of Canada will not, without the agreement of the Government of the United States of America, transfer title to or possession of any of the equipment, materials, information or services furnished, although this limitation will not apply to components of relatively minor value which are to be installed in or assembled with other articles; and that the equipment and materials procured will be used in furtherance of the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty".

With respect to the use of a letter of credit, the Government of Canada agrees that such an instrument can incorporate the elements of irrevocability and of payments as called for under the procurement contracts, it being understood that the exact terms of the letter of credit will have to be worked out between our two Governments to the satisfaction of both.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration. Text ends. Message ends.

CANADIAN MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

The United States reply to our note of January 5th concerning the procurement of defence equipment from the United States was received this morning. The note is marked "restricted", dated February 3rd, and signed "Dean Acheson". Although the text is the same as the draft which I communicated to you in my message No. 195 of January 26th, I am transmitting it to you as now received so that you will have the authentic text to work from.

2. I hope that you will now let me have immediately your authorization to communicate our agreement with this note, as suggested in my message WA-241 of February 1st, in order that the legal authorization for procurement can be completed as soon as possible.

3. With regard to the question of adding a paragraph to our note in reply, referring to our broader procurement difficulties unless there is new legislation in the United States, which I understand has been discussed between Eberts and Ignatieff, you might consider the addition of a final paragraph to our note along the following lines:

"I should like to take this opportunity of recalling that I have already discussed with you the hope of the Canadian Government that further steps will be taken to facilitate the procurement of Canadian military equipment in the United States of America, and to establish a measure of reciprocity through the purchase of military equipment in Canada by the United States Government, in furtherance of our agreed policies of joint defence and standardization".

4. I think that we should show our reply in draft to the Department of State before despatching it officially, since Mr. Acheson's note is really a product of joint draftsmanship. I do not want to include in our answer anything likely to give rise to difficulty or to require reference to the Pentagon. I prefer that no addition be made to our draft, but if one is made I think it should be on the lines just proposed.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: I hear that argument is still going on in Ottawa over the terms of our reply to Acheson's note of February 3rd. This states what we must accept if we want to procure under the Military Defense Assistance Act, and it is evident that, if we are to get on with the contract for F-86 parts, our reply must include what was proposed in the draft prepared in the Embassy and sent to Ottawa on February 1st. I gather that some in Ottawa wish to include a good deal more, and especially a repetition of the arguments made many times to the State Department and the Pentagon about how unsatisfactory the procedure is and how badly something better is needed. I think we should keep separate this exchange of notes and our desire for better treatment. The latter is not going to be forgotten; it has been put very recently to the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Wrong from Heeney.
Reference WA-300 of February 7 and previous correspondence regarding Exchange of Notes on military procurement.

The text of the Canadian reply given in WA-241 of February 1 has now been approved and it is agreed that it would be desirable to let the State Department see it before it is signed.

It is appreciated here that our dissatisfaction with the present procurement arrangements has recently been expressed to a number of senior people in Washington. However, as the feeling is so strong here that the proposed financial arrangement can only be applied to our most pressing needs and that, in general, more satisfactory arrangements are urgently required, it has been decided that, when a signed Canadian Note is delivered, it should be accompanied by a more informal communication — possibly a letter to Acheson — which would again record the Canadian views. The communication which has been prepared for this purpose is given in my immediately following teletype.

With reference to WA-241, I take it that, in the phrase, " ... the obligation which our two Governments ... ", in the first part of paragraph 2, the word "obligation" is intended to be in the plural (as in paragraph 2 of the U.S. Note).

With reference to WA-219 of January 28† and WA-239 of February 1,† it is agreed here that it would be desirable for the three Notes to be classified as "Restricted" and that, as suggested by the Legal Division of the State Department, this exchange of correspondence does not entail any new international obligations and, therefore, does not require registration with the U.N. Secretariat. I assume that, should the State Department find it necessary at a later stage to show the correspondence to a Congressional Committee, it will endeavour to arrange for disclosure of the Notes to take place at an Executive session of such a Committee. The attitude here to disclosure of the Notes will, of course, depend on circumstances existing at that time.

Following for Wrong from Heeney, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding teletype re Military Procurement. Following is the text of the supplementary communication.

I am today sending you a Note indicating the Canadian Government's acceptance of the arrangements set forth in your Note of February 3 for the procurement of military equipment in the United States under the terms of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act.

In this connection, I should like to refer to the discussions we have had and to recall to you the expressed view of the Canadian Government that the present arrangements for military procurement do not meet the needs of the common defence activities and policies of our two countries. The United States Government understands, for example, that the financial arrangements contemplated in the present exchange of notes for Canadian purchases in the United States are such that they can only be applied, as an entirely exceptional measure, to meet the most pressing needs of the Canadian Armed Forces pending the conclusion of more adequate and satisfactory arrangements.

For this reason I wish to record the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that permanent arrangements will be made at the earliest possible date which will permit us both fully to implement our common defence programmes and to ensure the unobstructed movement of defence supplies between our two countries.

Your EX-241 of February 8th. Exchange of notes on military procurement.

1. A note addressed to the United States Secretary of State, the text of which is contained in my WA-241 of February 1st, was left at the State Department on February 8th. The text had been informally agreed to by Snow before delivery. I have also sent a letter to Acheson containing the Canadian views on the exchange of notes on military procurement, along the lines of your suggested text in EX-242 of February 8th.

2. While discussing the long term inadequacy of the procedures agreed upon for the F-86 items with Snow, it was revealed that revisions of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act were being considered at the working level of the State Department, and that there would be an attempt to delete the "full cost in advance" provisions contained in section 408E of the present Act. It was hoped that provision might be made for a revolving fund which could be drawn upon by the United States agency procuring on behalf of a foreign Government. The revolving fund would be replenished when deliveries of military equipment had been effected at which time the foreign Government would be expected to pay cash in full for such equipment. This procedure, you will recall, had been followed by the United States during World War II and provision for it had been included in the first draft of the M.D.A.A. of 1949. Snow was cautiously optimistic that such a revision would be accepted when the Act came up for reconsideration in April of this year.

3. On the question of reciprocal purchases by the United States in Canada Snow did not think that any provision for this would be included in the revised Mutual Defence Assistance Act. He recalled that there was a legislative impediment additional to the "Buy American Act" contained in the Armed Services Appropriation Bill which would preclude United States forces to a large extent from using their appropriations for purchases in foreign countries. (See section 634 of H.R. 4146 sent to you with our despatch No. 3118 of December 16th, 1949).†

4. With respect to military equipment which Canada could produce, Snow recalled that the Canadian list submitted last fall had been reviewed by the United States Munitions Board. The Board had found that the items which we had stated could be provided were made up very largely of equipment for which there was at present a surplus capacity in the United States.

5. In this respect, you will be receiving my WA-328 of February 10th† which is a record of a meeting held in Col. Colonna's[14] office on February 6th for the purpose of helping the three United States services to draw up a list of military equipment which could be purchased in Canada. The fact that the United States services have been instructed to submit to the Munitions Board by March 1st a list of the military equipment which they might purchase in Canada, indicates that our representations on the higher levels have had some effect, and that the United States authorities are prepared to give sympathetic consideration to our need for reciprocal purchasing.

6. While this ad hoc approach has some merit it does not provide an adequate solution to our long term problems. It seems to me that the United States authorities must be convinced of the desirability in their own interests of making sizeable defence purchases in Canada, particularly with respect to items of military equipment which we can produce more economically or in the production of which we have special skills. For strategic as well as for economic reasons the United States must be convinced of the necessity for applying the concept of an integrated military production programme to the greatest extent possible. To place before United States authorities a list of equipment for which we have idle productive capacity or which we were able to produce economically during the last war, does not face the issue squarely. As you know, United States industry producing military equipment is not at present operating to full capacity and the United States services would find it extremely difficult to cut back United States production in the interests of reciprocal purchases for Canada. While it may be true that United States industry as a while would not suffer if there were a balance in defence purchases, the Buy American Act could still be cited by a particular United States manufacturer if some of the military equipment which he could produce were to be purchased in Canada. The United States forces have very real obstacles to overcome before they would be willing to purchase in Canada, and they will have to be convinced that the items which they propose to purchase are not only cheaper in Canada but superior in quality to their own domestic items (or unobtainable from a United States source). It seems to me that we will have to engage on a real selling job here and in doing so we should concentrate on certain special military equipment for which a real demand would exist in the United States. I doubt that the United States authorities will do more than look with sympathy upon a list of equipment which we could make available if that equipment could also be obtained in the United States.

7. It seems apparent that the liaison between the State Department and the Pentagon at the Snow-Colonna level has been defective as Snow was not aware on February 8th of the instructions of the Munitions Board which brought about the meeting in the Pentagon on February 7th. We are taking steps which should correct this.

I. CANADA-U.S. ARRANGEMENTS FOR MILITARY PROCUREMENT

1. The Chairman welcomed Mr. Ignatieff to the meeting and asked him to review the progress in Washington of Canada-U.S. procurement arrangements.

Mr. Ignatieff began by saying that, now that provisional arrangements had been completed for financing F.86 aircraft parts by means of a Letter of Credit, the Department of State wished to have a formal order from the Canadian Government; the State Department would, of course, pass the order to the Department of Defense, but State was responsible, under the M.D.A. Act, for handling military procurement transactions with foreign governments.

2. Mr. Ignatieff added that the State Department would like our comments on any aspect of procurement of classified military equipment, and were anxious to know, as soon as possible, in specific terms, what were our difficulties in procuring military equipment in the United States by means of the present procedure laid down in Article 408(e) of the M.D.A. Act; the reason for haste in forwarding our comments on this particular point was that the State Department were at present preparing some revisions of the M.D.A. Act and hoped to be able to meet our difficulties.

3. Mr. Ignatieff then reported that the State Department had suggested that we consider transmitting to the State Department a quarterly statement of our incidental requirements, together with a cash deposit or a Letter of Credit to cover the full-cost-in-advance requirement of the M.D.A. Act; this would enable us to avoid unnecessary delays in the procurement of routine classified material such as military handbooks, and also to reduce to a minimum the time between the presentation of our order, with our money, and the time of delivery.

4. The Deputy Minister of National Defence raised, as a specific example, the order which his department would like to place in the United States for seventy-five Avenger aircraft, to be purchased "off the shelf" for cash, and to be delivered to our representatives in the United States at the time of payment, by prior arrangement with the U.S. Defense Department. He wondered whether our Exchange of Notes covering the Letter of Credit arrangements for F.86 procurement limited us to transactions financed by Letter of Credit, or whether we could purchase for cash.

Mr. Ignatieff stated that the Exchange of Notes did not prevent cash transactions; we were simply permitted, in addition, to finance such purchases as F.86 "kits" by means of a Letter of Credit, which would be regarded as the equivalent of cash under the M.D.A. Act.

5. The Deputy Minister of Finance stated that we should stick as close as possible to cash on delivery and that we must press for some sort of arrangement which would enable us to purchase military equipment in the United States from the U.S. Government without breaking our own law and normal business practice; he added that he did not think the Canadian Government would wish to change our basic accounting law to enable Canadian funds to be paid out on the authority of a representative of a foreign government.

The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee observed that Mr. Johnson's principle of "cash on the barrel" was not inconsistent with Canadian requirements, but that the M.D.A. Act went much further in providing "full cost in advance".

Mr. Ignatieff said that the State Department was now inclined to agree that the full cost in advance provision must be modified; they were thinking of widening the scope of the M.D.A. Act in order to provide a means of procuring arms for the threatened areas of South East Asia (which might be given loans for this purpose) and they were thinking of a revision of the M.D.A. Act that would simply commit foreign governments to guaranteeing that they would be responsible for the full cost before the contract was let, but that would not require that the full cost be provided with the order.

General Foulkes thought that another reason for the United States authorities to amend the M.D.A. Act might perhaps be that they were thinking of machinery that would enable Western Europe to purchase military equipment in the United States after mutual aid comes to an end.

6. The United States authorities, Mr. Ignatieff added, had not contemplated new bilateral legislation providing special procurement arrangements for Canada at the present time; their approach to the problem was essentially multilateral. Moreover, he thought it was unlikely that they would introduce new legislation or amendments to the financial provisions of the M.D.A. Act, which would involve asking Congress for additional funds, however small. Both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Johnson had committed themselves, in hearings in Executive Session of Congress prior to the passage of the M.D.A. Act, to the position that the procurement arrangements proposed would not in any way involve expenditures of U.S. funds; it followed that even a proposal for a revolving fund would be unlikely to be put forward to Congress in its present mood of protectionism and economy, especially in view of the present uneasy relations between Congress and the State Department.

The Deputy Minister of Finance then observed that the State Department might be as wrong in saying that new bilateral legislation to cover Canadian requirements was impossible, as they were when they said we could not reach a satisfactory solution on our Letter of Credit proposal for the F.86. We could, and should, make a good case for special Legislation to cover our particular requirements on the basis that what we are wanting was simple and, in terms of money, was insignificant — the "peanuts" approach.

The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee added that we should not, however, underplay the potential importance of arrangements that would enable us to maintain in Canada a nucleus of defence industries which would be of great importance, in the event of war, to joint defence, and that we should continue to press, on these grounds, the U.S. Department of Defense to carry out Secretary Johnson's promise that special legislation to meet Canadian requirements would be introduced. Mr. Claxton would undoubtedly be reminding Mr. Johnson of his promises at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee.

Mr. Ignatieff pointed out that one of the difficulties which the Administration would face in introducing new legislation was that there were no formal Treaties of mutual defence between Canada and the United States, but only Declarations made under the President's executive powers; if Congress were asked to pass any special legislation for Canada, it would open up a general debate on Canadian-U.S. joint defence and might also bring about Congressional pressure upon the Administration to ask Canada to make a mutual aid contribution under the North Atlantic Treaty.

7. Mr. Ignatieff said he recognized the desirability of new legislation to cover Canada's needs, but that he thought we were more likely to get immediate results if we were to concentrate our representations upon asking the U.S. Administration to meet our requirements by:

(a) minor revisions of the M.D.A. Act, and,

(b) the use of "executive discretion" to find a way through some of the loopholes of the "Buy American" Act, on the grounds that it was "in the national interest" to support, in some measure, Canadian defence industries by making purchases in Canada for the U.S. armed forces of certain items that the Munitions Board would, in a week's time, be recommending to Secretary Johnson for his approval.

General Foulkes and Dr. Clark nevertheless urged that we should continue to press for new legislation rather than spending endless time trying to buy in the United States through loopholes and back doors; if the United States authorities were interested in encouraging the Canadian Armed Forces to standardize on American equipment, they would have to make it possible for us to buy the equipment.

8. Mr. MacKay wondered whether, if we were to press for new legislation, we might not run a serious risk of upsetting the encouraging new approach which the U.S. Munitions Board were at present making to secure approval for the purchase of some items of military equipment in Canada. However, General Foulkes thought that this would never be satisfactory in the long run, certainly not in the event of war, as the list of items which the U.S. Munitions Board might be permitted to purchase in Canada would be too small, and the procedure would lead to further lengthy debates on the interpretation of U.S. legislation.

9. Mr. Ignatieff then remarked that the U.S. authorities had admitted that they would have no difficulty in meeting Canada's wishes in the event of war; it almost appeared as if a national arrangement would be so difficult for the United States Congress to approve that we would be left in the position that our defence industries would be allowed to run down until the time of mobilization, when it would be impossible to mobilize them as rapidly as the situation would demand.

10. The Panel then turned to a discussion of an Aide Mémoire on procurement (Panel Document ED 8† circulated at the meeting) drafted by the Department of External Affairs in a form in which it could be given to the State Department as an outline of our views on all aspects of the problem. After further discussion, it was agreed that:

(a) The Department of National Defence would ask the Department of External Affairs to convey a formal order to the State Department for F.86 "kits", (see para. 1 above).

(b) The Department of Finance would complete their statement of Canadian objections to Article 408(e) as quickly as possible (see para. 2 above) so that representations through our Embassy in Washington could be made, it being understood that our representations for the revision of the M.D.A. Act would be without prejudice to our principal objective, which was to secure the passage of special U.S. legislation covering the unique circumstances of Canada-U.S. procurement which, the Panel believed, could not satisfactorily be met by the revision of any multilateral legislation such as the M.D.A. Act.

(c) The Department of National Defence and the Department of Finance would provide the Department of External Affairs with their comments on the State Department's suggestion for the establishment of quarterly requirement lists (and payments) for our minor requirements (see para. 3 above).

(d) The Department of External Affairs would redraft Document ED 8, in consultation with the Secretary to the Cabinet, and the revision would be cleared as soon as possible with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and presumably with Cabinet.

(e) The presentation should emphasize that what we want:

(i) is in the best interests of the joint defence of our two countries; and,

(ii) would not involve, at least in peacetime, any substantial sums of money, nor would it vitally affect the interests of any segment of United States industry; yet,

(iii) it would greatly strengthen the potential of our defence industries, and very materially reduce the delays of industrial mobilization; while,

(iv) in the absence of satisfactory Canada-U.S. procurement arrangements, we should be forced into inefficient high cost production by having to manufacture in Canada equipment we could more efficiently obtain from the United States, thus duplicating their industrial effort and reducing the scope of our more efficient defence industries.

(f) The Department of Finance would revise Panel Document ED 7† (circulated at the fifth meeting of the Panel), so as to present their points without suggesting the exact wording of any U.S. legislation that would be required, and offering, by way of reciprocity, similar legislation to facilitate U.S. procurement in Canada and offering also the buying and inspection services of the Canadian Commercial Corporation for U.S. procurement in Canada.

MILITARY PROCUREMENT

1. Towe and Ignatieff saw Snow and Wight of the Canadian Desk yesterday afternoon in order to expedite clarification of outstanding procurement questions.

2. Snow was told of Mr. Drury's visit this week and we took the occasion to emphasize that it was desirable to take advantage of this visit to clear up outstanding procurement difficulties. These include the procedures governing the procurement of items other than the F.86A components, the consideration of our objections to the present provisions of section 408E of the M.D.A.A. and the problems connected with reciprocal purchases. We took occasion again to stress the inadequacies from our standpoint of the present M.D.A. legislation and indicated that we would continue to press not only for amendment of section 408E, but also for special legislation which would facilitate the movement of military equipment and supplies across the border. In particular we would hope that new legislation would be possible which would eliminate the present situation in regard to payments for material purchased in the United States and enable such payments to be related to delivery of goods or services rendered. We also hoped that the legislation would enable the United States services to purchase in Canada overriding in this respect the provisions of the Buy American Act.

3. Snow thought that such special legislation would have little chance of getting Congressional approval particularly if it involved a new appropriation for a revolving fund. With respect to the Mutual Defence Assistance Act, he admitted there was still some tendency in the State Department to regard section 408E, particularly if it were amended to formalize the letter of credit arrangement, or similar means of payment, as meeting most of the financial difficulties which Canada had encountered thus far. He said that it would be helpful if we would submit an aide mémoire outlining the inadequacies of the present M.D.A. legislation from our standpoint, and the revisions which we would wish to see incorporated in the M.D.A.A. of 1950 (such an aide mémoire could, of course, be submitted without prejudice to our desiderata for "special" legislation). On the question of United States purchases in Canada, Snow said that he was almost certain that no provision of this nature could be inserted in a revised M.D.A.A., and that our best chance of success on this score at the moment lay in administrative use of the present escape provisions of the Buy American Act.

REVISION OF THE M.D.A.A.

I understand that it has been agreed with officials of the State Department that written comments on our difficulties under Section 408(e) of the M.D.A.A. might be left informally with the State Department. The following telegram represents an agreed comment by the Deputy Ministers of National Defence and Finance.

In presenting the written comments to the State Department you might suggest orally that while we appreciate their difficulties we hope that they have given or will give very careful consideration to the following: (a) the establishment of a revolving fund from which payments might be made, the Canadian Government to replenish the fund on delivery of the articles being purchased or subsequent to performance of partial performance of a contract; (b) the insertion of a separate title in the M.D.A.A. setting forth the special Canadian-U.S. relationship and making provision for meeting the requirements of our general accounting legislation.
